sisting of more than 2000 veterans, accustomed to a southern climate, who arrived in the latter end of October.—As to the situation of the country, the Spanish part and the southern part were in a state of perfect tranquillity. In the canton of Jeremie alone some accidents had happened. Some hundreds of the brigands, profiting by the excessive heat, which rendered all action impossible, committed ravages, and even burnt some plantations in the plain of the Cape; but it is well known, that in the midst even of the most tranquil departments it is impossible to arrest the incendiaries.—Of 60,000 musquets which were in the possession of the blacks, 45,000 have been returned into the magazines; and general Leclerc reckoned, that after the first fifteen or twenty days of the rainy season had passed, he should be able to march, towards the latter end of November, for the purpose of dispersing the remaining assemblies formed in the mountains, completing the disarming of the blacks, and destroying the means of subsistence which they had collected.—The Cape was almost entirely rebuilt, and all the towns which were burnt a year since, are rebuilding with the greatest activity (Moniteur.)

Six battalions, of different corps, chosen from amongst the strongest men of the demi-brigade, embarked on the 10th or 11th ult. at Toulon. It is thought that their destination is for St. Domingo. The chief of brigade, Borthon, has also embarked for that island, where he is to fulfil the functions of director general of artillery.

They write from Zurich, that in the night between the 13th and 14th of November, the citizens arrested in that city were carried away in two carriages, under a French escort, but where is not positively known.

Paris, Dec. 4.—On Wednesday the Conscrip's of the 6th Division, quarrelled among themselves. The guards interfered, but were attacked by the Conscrip's. A patrol of Dragoons came to the support of the Guard, and overpowered the Conscrip's. One man was killed, several wounded, and twenty-three of the mutineers have been arrested.

Brest, Nov. 28.—The Corvettes La Torche, from Martinique, and La Curiex, from Cayenne, have been released from quarantine, and have entered the Great Road. The Epidemic Fever which raged at St. Domingo and Guadaloupe, had not extended its ravages to Martinique.—The vessel La Rhinoceros has entered L'Orient, from St. Domingo.

The Banks of the Mein, Nov. 27.—We have received from Vienna, the important intelligence that a great part of the city of Constantinople has been destroyed by an earthquake, on the 26th of October last. (We doubt this.)

BRITISH COLONIES.

Gibraltar, Nov. 10.—On the 5th inst. Gonzales, a Spaniard, who had assassinated a Spanish gentleman in Grenada in August last, was delivered up to the officers of justice sent in pursuit of him by the Spanish government. Another murderer was at the same time requested to be given up, who had assassinated several people some years ago, and had also taken refuge in the garrison. This, H. R. H. the governor unfortunately found himself restrained from doing, by the late treaty of peace. H. R. H. was therefore under the necessity of expressing to the Spanish commandant the regret he felt at being precluded from delivering the assassin into his hands, but that he should instantly order him to be turned out of the place, which was accordingly done, by landing him on the neutral ground, where he would probably fall into the hands of the Spaniards.—An English frigate under a crowd of sail passed, on the 3d inst. through the Streights, to the westward. She was probably charged with dispatches from the fleet, for England.—Orders have been received here not to reduce Watteville's Reg. which is at present in Egypt.—No intelligence from Egypt or Malta has been received this fortnight past.—The rainy season has set in with great violence; the troops are all extremely healthy, except the remains of the ophthalmia, which is still unsubdued in one or two regiments. H. R. H. pays the most unremitting attention to the health of his own regiment, regularly inspecting every man himself daily.—Nov. 11.—This morning the St. Fiorenzo frigate, Capt. Bingham, put in here in distress, she having sprung a leak in her passage to Madeira, with sealed orders.

NOVA SCOTIA.—The King's College established at Windsor in the province of Nova Scotia, for the education of youth in the principles of religion, and for their instruction in those branches of science and literature, which are taught in the Universities of Great Britain, was lately opened. A copy of the Royal Charter will be found in vol. i. p. 1054.

DOMESTIC.

Advices from Gibraltar of the 29th of October, state, that a ship from Moca brings intelligence, that the Indian army under the command of General Baird, put in there for refreshments, and had again sailed for India five days before Captain Bullock left Moca. Seven of the transports had been wrecked, on their passage down the Red Sea, though but few lives were lost.—Lord Cavan was shortly expected at Gibraltar on his way from Egypt, as he was to leave that country whenever General Stewart arrived.

The persons fully committed to take their trial for High Treason before a Special Commission, are Col. Despard, Thos. Broughton, Sam. Smith, Arthur Graham, John McNamara, J. S. Wrattler, Wm. Lander, Thos. Winterbottom, John Francis, John Wood, Dan. Tyndall, T. Phillips, alias Jackson, John Connelly, John Doyle, and Thos. Newman. Three of them are soldiers, two ballast-heavers, one a carpenter, and the others shoemakers. They are separately confined in Newgate, and the New Gaol in the Borough. The Special Commission will be appointed immediately after the Session at the Old Bailey shall have ended. The trials will probably take place at Guildford.

MEETING OF SHIP-OWNERS. At a general meeting of ship-owners, held at the London Tavern, Dec. 1, 1802, to receive the report of the committee of ship-owners, for the Port of London, respecting the duty on the tonnage of ships, and on oil and skins, the produce of the British fisheries, and on other business of great importance to the shipping interest: Mr. Hill in the chair. The chairman stated, that the secretary had transmitted to the out-ports, the rules and regulations of the society, and that the ship-owners at North Shields, &c. &c. had appointed committees to co-operate with the committee for the Port of London; that the committee had received several communications from the ship owners in London and at the out-ports, on many important subjects relative to the shipping interest; that the object of the committee had been the present depressed state of the shipping of the country, and to obtain the repeal of the duty on the tonnage of ships and on oil, &c. the produce of the British fisheries. The most important subjects are the following, viz. The inconvenience of taking out a licence, and giving a bond to the commissioners of the customs; the claim recently set up by the directors of Ramsgate harbour, for payment of the harbour dues on colliers; the present rates of pilotage from the Downs to Gravesend and from thence to London; the recent disputes between the ship-builders and their workmen; and the real state of the shipping interest at this critical and trying juncture. In addition to the objects before stated, many other matters were submitted to the consideration of the committee, and disposed of, they hoped to the satisfaction of the parties. The committee begged leave most earnestly to recommend a strict adherence to the spirit of the navigation laws, and deprecated any attempt to endeavour to relax those maritime regulations which had so effectually contributed to the greatness and power of the country, at a time when all the maritime nations of the world viewed with jealousy the superiority we had gained by our carrying trade. The resolutions of the general meeting of the 30th of Sept. last were then read. The chairman reported the result of the second interview with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and stated that the committee had not been able to convince him of the impolicy of the tonnage duty. It was then resolved, that a petition be presented to the House of Commons; that the committee be requested to adopt such further means for the repeal of the duty as they may think proper; and that they be instructed to take into consideration the present situation of the ship-owners with respect to Mediterranean passes. The whole of the interesting papers on this important subject will be given in the SUPPLEMENT to this volume.

SUMMARY OF POLITICS.

The intelligence from the United States of America, which comes down to the 5th ult. represents the yellow fever as having subsided; but the ever-burning fever democracy appears to have raged with redoubled fury. It is well known, that the democratic, or French party, gained the ascendancy at the elevation of Mr. Jefferson to the presidency. This party is certainly sinking at this time: several exposures have taken place, and have produced great effect on the public mind. Strange and lamentable as is the fact, it is nevertheless perfectly true, that about half a dozen English, Scotch, and Irish democrats, who escaped from the hands of justice in Europe, have, with the aid of so many printing-presses, brought about the fall of the federal party in America. When their triumph was accomplished, they, of course, looked for that reward of patriotism, the LOAVES AND FISHES. The President had one good place (printer to the United States' Government) to bestow, for which, unfortunately for the cause of patriotism, of liberty, and of republican virtue, there were two candidates: one JAMES THOMSON CALLENDER, a Scotchman, who was the author of the "Political Progress of Britain," and who escaped from the officers of justice, at Edinburgh, about the year 1793; the other, WM. DUANE, an Irishman, who was, for seditious practices, banished from India, by Lord Cornwallis. To these two men Mr. Jefferson certainly owes his seat in the presidential chair; but, he could not make them both printer to the United States, and neither would yield his pretensions. DUANE was the happy man. CALLENDER, to whom the President was most indebted, was enraged beyond measure: the enemies of Jefferson enabled the Scotchman to establish a weekly paper, which he has hitherto devoted almost exclusively to the exposing of his former patron. Amongst other things, he has asserted, and, indeed, we think, positively proved, that Mr. Jefferson paid him 200 dollars for the writing and publishing of works, the principal object of which was, to defame, and to destroy the characters of, Washington and Adams, and that, too, at the very time, that he (Jefferson) was publicly extolling the talents and virtues of the persons so defamed. Another fact, which he has published, is, that Mr. Jefferson keeps a negro concubine, by whom he has had five children, and whom he has kept, and still keeps, under the same roof with two young ladies, his daughters by a deceased wife!

These are matters not spoken of in a corner, but promulgated and discussed in all the public papers of that country, which are not less than three hundred in number.—But, notwithstanding the discredit which disclosures of this nature may be expected to cast on the democratical party, we are sorry, for the sake of America and of the world, to perceive, that as far as the annual elections had gone, their result indicated but little decline in the influence of that party.—TOM PAINE had arrived at Baltimore. If this traitor to his king and blasphemer of his God receives some encouragement from seeing a “temple of reason,” where infidelity is openly preached, at New York, he must be somewhat mortified at meeting the works of Burke, coming from an American press. The Editor of this Register sent 40 sets of the new edition of Burke’s Works to America, yet the demand for it has encouraged two booksellers of Philadelphia to put it to press, preceded by the life of the author, written by Dr. Bisset. This is a fact of no small political importance. It shows, that there is yet a sound part in America: for Burke’s writings are the true touchstone in politics. Indeed, as to property, morality, and even numbers, the far greater part of America is politically sound in sentiment; but, what the other small part wants in every other virtue, it has in the great and all-commanding virtues of courage and perseverance: it has the sinews and bones of the country; its opponent has nothing but the flesh, the dull, the heavy, the soft, the trembling flesh.—Was it not so in France?—And is it alas! not so in England?

The plunder of Germany and the subjugation of Switzerland, have been prominent topics in our political remarks for many weeks past. The former goes on, and will, in all probability continue to go on, with more or less dispatch, until a complete revolution of the Empire is effected. The subjugation of Switzerland is accomplished. The senate, Buonaparté’s senate, has imposed a war-contribution on the Cantons, amounting to 900,000 livres, for the support of the French troops! This puts us in mind of the conduct of the French vessels of war, which made the American merchantmen pay, in a certain proportion (at about three guineas per ball), for the balls, *which, during a chase, the former fired at the latter! And, indeed, these two facts, when the neutral and even amicable conduct of Switzerland and America towards France, are considered, form, of themselves, no very unsatisfactory refutation, if refutation were still wanted, of the opinions of those who contend, that England might, by the means of neutrality, have avoided the insolence and hostility of France.—It has been stated, in some of the foreign journals, that REDING and his associates have been set at liberty. We shall be agreeably surprised, if this intelligence should prove true; but, at present, we can give no more credit to it than to the tale of the Ministerial Paper, which represents “poor Toussaint” as kept in a dungeon “up to his knees in water!” A tale nearly as incredible as that which is related respecting the “stark naked” goddess of reason, exhibited at Nottingham. Such exaggerations do infinite injury to whatever cause they are intended to serve.

The affair of his Excellency Count Stahrenberg, mentioned in p. 736 of our last sheet, is, in the main, confirmed. He was ordered to quit Paris, and France; but, as to the time allowed him for so doing, report was erroneous. Six hours were given him to quit the capital, and a reasonable time to quit the Republic.—That this mandate of the Consul is positively contrary to the law of nations, it would, perhaps, be too much to assert; but, that it is a violation, and a very gross violation, of those usages of nations, which have grown almost into positive laws, no one can deny*.—The Count, however, as we observed before, must feel that, for this insult and injustice, he is amply compensated by the honour conferred on him by the hatred of the Corsican.—As a counterpart to this act of insolence towards the Ambassador of his Imperial Majesty to the King of England, it is intended, we are told, to send General Lasnes back to the Court of Lisbon; and, indeed, we have been well informed, that the Portuguese minister, of whom Lasnes complained, is already dismissed from his employment!—How long will it be ere the same sort of influence will be felt at Whitehall?—Nay, start not, reader! Has not the hand of Buonaparté already been felt in our courts of justice? Has he not snatched a condemned traitor from the gallows? And has not his official journal signified his wish, that our present “prudent ministry” may keep their places?—Connected with this topic is the daring act of sending hither a complete set of “commercial agents,” after they had been refused to be received. The ministers have, through their official paper, informed the public, that these persons are not acknowledged by them in any public capacity; and that, therefore, they, "are subject to the Alien Laws, and liable to be, at any time, sent away for mal-practices;" but, would the ministers dare to send them away? That's the question; and, for answer to this question, we have only to remember their conduct with respect to Lundberg, the Swede, who came over with Lauriston.—Another mark of insolent contempt for other nations has lately been shown at Hamburg, where RHEINHARD, the French Envoy, seeing the Dukes of AVRAY and POLIGNAC (two French emigrants, the former, at least, in the service of England) decorated with the orders of Cordon bleu, St. Louis, and St. Esprit, preferred a complaint to the Senate, who, the next day issued a mandate, forbidding the wearing of the insignia of any suppressed order, on the part of foreigners! Not a word of remonstrance was made on the part of the English Chargé-des-Affaires!—Thus is our mortal enemy daily and hourly rising over us in every part of the world. Why, then, will our correspondents continue to blame Sir Joseph Banks? Sir Joseph, though, by no means, overburdened with wit or learning, is a prudent man, and a "safe politician." Rats, by instinct, quit a falling house; and, after the Hawkesburian preliminaries, after the surrender of Napper Tandy and the abandonment of the Chouans, who could blame Sir Joseph for laying the Royal Society prostrate at the feet of the Institute*?

Since our last there has been circulated much pretended information, or rather misinformation, respecting the situation of St. Domingo, and the French forces in that Island. On the 3d instant, the True Briton announced, that the government (by which was, we dare say, meant the ministry) had received accounts from Jamaica, stating most fully, the "disastrous issue of the French expedition to St. Domingo;" and further stating, that, "it was understood, at Jamaica, that LECLERC had actually re-embarked with the remnant of his army, and that a body of five hundred French had joined the blacks."—On the 4th, that is to say, the next day, the same paper stated, and from "good authority," that "one thousand five hundred only of the whole French force remained, which had re-embarked with general LECLERC."—This intelligence our well-informed ministers, our "safe politicians," received, it seems, from Admiral Duckworth, in a dispatch dated Jamaica, 16th of October, and, it would appear, that his news was then eight or nine days old. The intelligence was, then, dated at St. Domingo on the 7th of October, about nine days after general BOUDET, whose report has just been published officially in the Moniteur, left the colony for France. From the report of this general (which see p. 756), it appears, that, when he sailed, the French force consisted of twenty three thousand five hundred white men and four thousand blacks, and that between eighteen and nineteen thousand of the whites were fit for duty.—When this official report was received in London, which was on the 6th instant, the "prudent ministers" looked rather abashed. Their intelligence was admirably calculated for producing effect in the debate on the army estimates, but the contradiction came too soon; Boudet unfortunately arrived before the exhibition began! The True Briton fretted, accused the Moniteur of foul play, and, in short, discovered evident marks of disappointment at the bad luck of the savage negroes and the tardy progress of the yellow fever! And these, these are the people, who deprecate "irritating language!" It is absolutely impossible but the French government and the French people must at once suspect and despise them.—Unwilling to let go their hold, to give up the aid of their honourable auxiliary, the yellow fever, they have trumped up another tale, which has passed through that common sewer of news, the United States of America. This last intelligence is "dreadful" again; but, as it is ten days, at least, later than their Jamaica news, it may be relied on, so far, at least, as it completely does away the ridiculous story (which, as we said before, was merely intended for St. Stephen's) about the re-embarkation of Leclerc and his army.—Why the news which, relating to St. Domingo, comes through Jamaica, or through the United States of America, ought seldom to be believed; and why the people of this country are so easily led to give credit to it; the causes of all this falshood, deception, credulity, and infatuation, are fully explained in the Register, Vol. I. p. 731, et seq. to which we beg leave to refer the reader. We do not say, we have never said, that the French may not have a good deal of trouble with the blacks; but, we know, that they have already so far succeeded, as to add greatly to our annual expense of ships and men, and that even the double of this expense will not shelter our most valuable colony from the danger, which our ministers have contributed to place at its threshold.

* Having strayed into a mention of this knight of the Bath, we might appear partial in omitting to notice the recent election of Mr. Fox, who, in opposition to HORNE TOOKE, is now become a "professor of morals and politics" in the National Institute. An honour most justly bestowed; but, we have our doubts, which was the worthiest object, Mr. Fox or Horne Tooke. Either of them is, perhaps, a very fit associate for Sir Joseph Banks.—The election of Mr. Fox took place on the 23d ultimo.

As it comports with our plan to notice every thing, however unimportant, low, and despicable, that tends to elucidate the political situation or feeling of the country, we hope we shall be excused for saying a word or two about the meeting of the Whig Club, which, as the newspapers inform us, has held a meeting at the same public-house, which, a few months ago, opened its doors and its muddy hogsheads to Sir Francis Burdett and his gallows-hating citizens. This miserable rump of Whiggism was, as usual, headed by Mr. Fox. Neither Mr. Grey nor Mr. Sheridan were present: their absence did them much honour, and the club, as if resolved to add to the honour of the latter, omitted to drink his health, while they drank that of Sir Francis Burdett and his crew, and of the late Sheriffs of London, with three times three cheers. The Demagogue made a speech, in which, after a vain attempt to explain away what he had before said about there being no danger in the aggrandizement of France, he declared the preservation of the peace with that country to be the bond of union of the Whig Club. He then spoke of the liberty of the press, but with that sort of shyness, with which a man is apt to speak of a cast-off acquaintance, and not in that warm, bold, enthusiastic strain, which formerly characterized this ever-recurring part of his harangues. He insinuated, that, in order to preserve the blessings of peace, we ought to abstain from irritating language against "the person at the head of the "government of France." He forgets his former opinions: he forgets his cowardly insults on the ashes of the Stuarts, and those which he has, during almost every day of the last ten years, been heaping upon the Bourbons; he forgets, he surely forgets his irritating language against the lawful sovereigns of Europe, sovereigns in real peace, in amity, and even in alliance with his King. We will endeavour to refresh his memory: "the "minister was offended at the expression of "German Despots; but his honourable friend, who "had made use of the expression, had styled "these monarchs properly; for they had manifested to the world, that their uniform intention "was to make the INCREASE of THEIR POWER the "rule of their conduct." * Oh, most apt and applicable definition! and yet now, we should not be surprized, if he were to make a formal complaint against any one, that should venture to call his great friend a despot. The wonder is, not how a man can hold up his head, but how he can bear to exist under the proof of such glaring, such shameful tergiversation!

The last papers from Paris inform us, that Lord Whitworth presented his credentials to Buonaparte on the 4th instant.—The same papers bring an account, that Moreau de St. Mery has received the homage of a deputation from the citizens of tiacencia. He assured them, that, in annexing their country to France, the only object of the First Consul was to make them happy; a declaration the sincerity of which is strongly corroborated by Moreau's having prevented the Marquis of Venturia from carrying off the library and other moveables belonging to the late Duke of Parma, and which the honest Frenchman wished, doubtless, to preserve for the good of the citizens of the Duchy. We know something of Moreau de St. Mery, and we are greatly mistaken if he would not find himself perfectly at home amongst those moveables.—And is it possible, is it a fact, that this low-lived overseer of a negro plantation, with his creole wife and mulatto relations, do really inhabit the ducal palace of Parma! And do the Howards and the Russels still sleep?—God's will be done! Why should poor worms like us fret away our existence in anxiety for those who care not for themselves?

The Dutch minister, M. SCHIMMELPENNINCK, landed at Dover on the 2d inst. He will, of course, be presented at the next levee.

We regret being obliged to postpone our remarks on the late proceedings with respect to the navy and the army, more particularly as the assertions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer call aloud for refutation.—We regret exceedingly, that we have not room to remark on the very important information, which Dr. Laurence extorted from the Minister during Thursday's debate, and from which it appears, that poor Old England is, at last, to make a pecuniary compensation to the Stadtholder!!!—Thus is our prediction in this respect also accomplished. (See Register, Vol. I. p. 380). What now becomes of the treaty of Amiens? What becomes of the interpretation given to that treaty by the Ministers and by the Negotiator?—Oh, humbled, disgraced, and spiritless nation!

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MR. J. TIETENSER'S Letter, in answer to CANDIDUS (a writer in the Star), proving (and, as we think, satisfactorily), that the latter, and not the former, is, in reality, the "insidious defender of Mr. Addington," shall appear in our next. It was not, as appears by the date, written till the 9th instant: of course, we could not receive till yesterday.—We take this opportunity of requesting our Correspondents to be earlier in their communications, as, on account of the great number of sheets we have to publish, we are obliged to send to press by Friday noon, and to have almost all our matter in the hands of the printers by Thursday noon. Communications of any considerable length should, in order to appear the same week, reach us by Wednesday at 3 o'clock.

GENERAL POST-OFFICE.—Communications respecting this scene of insolence and abuse of office, have poured in upon us from all quarters. The writers may be assured, that we shall not stop short of obtaining justice; or, of proving that it is not to be obtained: the latter, we hope and trust, will not fall to our lot.—Since the publication of Mr. Cobbett's Letter to Lord Auckland (a third edition of which is in the press), the penny, heretofore demanded and received at the Post-Office, for each English newspaper sent to Ireland, has not been demanded or received. We should like to be informed of the cause of this reformation, and to know what became of the pence so received.

READING BALL ON THE PEACE.

SIR,—When taking up my pen in defence of Mr. Addington, I silenced the pretended lover of truth and decorum, I did hope that we should have had no more ironical praises of our respectable minister. But a writer in the Star, under the signature of Candidus, has thought proper through my sides to make a malevolent attack on my friend and the worthy inhabitants of this place. The intention of this masked satirist is hardly disguised. For who knows not Mrs. CANDOUR in the School for Scandal? A seeming officiousness of weak palliation and excuse is the most effectual way of betraying the character to ridicule or censure.

With your permission, Sir, I shall begin by noticing his second letter, because in that he is pleased directly to apply himself to me. And he denies me to be an “inhabitant” of this place; not from any intrinsic evidence in my letter; not from any inquiry of the parish officers or tax gatherers; not from any information derived through the election committees of our worthy representatives Mr. ANNESLEY and Mr. SHAW LE FEVRE; but truly, because there is no “inhabitant of Reading who does not venerate the public character and admire the private conduct of Mr. Addington.” What is this, but impudently to beg the question, that he is the real, and I am the “insidious defender” of that great and illustrious statesman? This boldness, however, I am sure will not deceive a discerning public. Let us come to the proof.

What a treacherous account does this candid gentleman give of the origin of the ball! On the first mention of peace he tells us, that the notion of a ball and supper was taken up from a pure abstract love of peace, by a number of gentlemen, who did not all agree in their opinion of the terms of the treaty. And this he calls “an expression of feelings congenial to the English character,” to celebrate unanimously an event about which no two of the company, perhaps, thought precisely alike. His meaning, if he has any, must be, that a ball and a supper can never come amiss to Englishmen and Englishwomen. Otherwise it is such a libel on old English sincerity and plain dealing, as can have been written by no man, but one of those admirers of the First Consul of France, who affect the warmest attachment to Mr. Addington, for their own sinister purposes. Observe too, what a foolish figure he makes of my friend, when he paints him swallowing down, with the greatest self satisfaction, as a compliment to the leading measure of his administration, an entertainment given by persons, a majority of whom, this “insidious defender” hints, disapproved, more or less, of that very measure. I leave the world to judge, whether the true and plain account which I gave, is not much more creditable to Mr. ADDINGTON, that it was a tribute of respect from some former patients of his excellent father. Some of them, however, I am afraid, people will think not to have been perfectly cured, if CANDIDUS is one of the number, and really intends to be serious. But it is impossible that he can. Every line that I read in his letter convinces me to the contrary. Could anyone who was in earnest, have passed over a whole year in silence, and told us nakedly that the proposal adopted in October 1801 was carried into effect in October 1802; just when every body knows that the minister, very wisely and spiritedly in my opinion, sent orders to stop the execution of the treaty, and began to arm again in a manner that caused an alarm of war from one end of the kingdom to the other? I accounted, satisfactorily I hope, for this interval. My account is not contradicted: but this great chasm is left by CANDIDUS, merely I believe, because it must strike every man of common observation, as an opening to ridicule not to be resisted.—Indeed, Sir, this is too glaring.

In his short abstract of my friend's speech, this writer represents him as having talked of “the firmness of parliament, the valour of our fleets and armies, and the loyalty of his countrymen.” On this part he says, “all the quiver of the arrows of invective has been emptied.” Now here, Sir, it happens that there is a very short issue between us. Your readers, as far as I am apprized, have before them all that has been written on the subject except the idle paragraphs with which it began; and I will rest every thing on this point:—There is not any where a single syllable of invective aimed against either of these topics. If I remember right, there is no direct allusion to either of them. What then could have been the possible object of such a gross misrepresentation, so easily to be detected? What, but that its grossness might lead to instant detection; and that under the flimsy pretence of indignation at the attacks of "insignificance and obscurity" (as he is pleased politely to characterize the writers in the Morning Post and the Political Register, the "Lover of Truth and Decorum," myself, and your correspondent N. V. who dates from WHITEHALL, all lumped together) he might thus expose my respectable friend "the Chancellor of the Exchequer to fresh "laughter." I appeal to that truth, that genuine candour, and that common sense, whose names this false and scandalous MR. CANDOUR so boldly uses, whether the absurdity of addressing a speech on the blessings of peace to "dancing misses, and negus-swiggig fiddlers," the charge which I originally met and confuted, is half so great as the poor, trite, common-place cant, which Mr. Addington is here said to have delivered to the same audience; for the paltry distinction, that he addressed what he said to the stewards, can only be meant to disgust the Public still more, by the meanness of the subterfuge. What a total disregard to dramatic consistency of character, what a want of all probability is there in the fiction, that a minister of peace and anti-jacobinism should renound the gentlemen and ladies of the "firmness of parliament," in voting so long for war, to obtain that indemnity and security which he persuaded them to abandon; of "the valour of our fleets and "armies," in making conquests, which he surrendered; and of the "loyalty of his coun-trymen," evinced, I presume, by a greater number of assassination plots and attempts against the life of the King, than were ever suspected in all the former part of his Majesty's reign, or in the reigns of any of his royal progenitors; and by the whole train of strong measures, suspending or superceding the great constitutional guards of personal liberty; measures which the spirit of the times unfortunately made too necessary; and which have been all of them renewed, and some of them carried further, or introduced for the first time on our statute-book, during the present administration. I will maintain the propriety of these strong measures, as necessary evils; I will maintain the peace, as Mr. ADDINGTON himself did, who declared it was the best he could do, and that "he had never attempted to apply to it "any epithets of praise."* But, against the imbecility which this "CANDIDUS" ascribes to my friend, I see no defence, but in denying the fact. I do, therefore, deny it; and in the name of all the Minister's true friends, call upon this false friend to prove his malicious imputation if he can.

Having thus endeavoured to injure Mr. Addington, by attributing to him what he did not say, he makes a passage in his real speech the vehicle of ridicule on the inhabitants of this place. The "affectionate manner" in which he is said to have expressed his concern at the necessity of quitting the county, is represented as at once the cause and effect of "those sentiments of esteem, which were "pathetically manifested by the company." It could only have been the cause, I presume, of the pathological manifestation which followed, and the effect of the pathological manifestation which preceded. But, what with cause and effect, the world is thus to suppose that the whole ball and supper was a continued display of sentiment and pathos. Fiddlers pathetically scraping; misses pathetically jigging; beaux pathetically hobbling after; stewards pathetically scolding waiters; and fiddlers, misses, beaux, and stewards all pathetically eating and drinking. Now, Sir, I can assure you there was not a single tear shed from the beginning to the end of the entertainment. My friend paid a proper compliment, neither more nor less than became him, to the neighbourhood. But it is a burlesque upon him, to hold out that there was any over-acted tenderness and regret professed by him, at having sold Woodley for several thousand pounds more than it cost him, and received, from the favour of his Sovereign, a much handsomer and more convenient residence, the like of which no former minister ever had influence to get. His old neighbours, on their part, could not but be glad of his promotion, whether they might or might not share in the good effects of it. All this was, in my opinion, just as it should be. The only impropriety was in publishing it; and that was the act of Mr. Addington's secret enemies, or injudicious friends, whose foolish paragraphs first provoked the "Lover of Truth and Decorum." Who that writer may be, I neither know nor care; but, from the manifest superiority of his style to that of "Candidus," I am satisfied they are not the same person, as I might be led to suspect from the apparent conformity of their designs. Against both I shall be ever ready to enter the lists, in behalf of my friend, Mr. Addington.

I have now gone through all that relates to the Reading Ball. With your permission, Sir, I may take some future opportunity of exposing the malignity which CANDIDUS betrays in some other parts of his second, and the whole of his first letter. Here he plainly discovers the cloven foot. He openly does that, which I will take upon me to say, my friend considers as the most mischievous of all things to him: he seeks to embroil him with Mr. Pitt, by endeavouring to build his reputation on the ruins of his predecessor's glory. I am, Sir, your obedient humble servant, J. TIETENSER.

EXTRACT FROM THE MONITEUR, RESPECTING INDIA.

The Moniteur copies from the Mercure de France a long article attacking England. The two following passages are the most remarkable:—"A company of English merchants exercises imperial power in India, wastes its population, and dethrones its princes at will. What is held to be in Europe outrageously revolutionary, is thought by them to be in India perfectly just and lawful; as their philosophers allow that politics and morality change with the climate. In the late war, by which this merchant-company deprived the Sovereign of Mysore of his life and dominions, their servants got into their hands that prince's papers.—Nothing can be more natural, than, that the inhabitants of India, and their princes, should view with jealousy the grasping, oppressive ambition, of such a company of merchants; and should wish to join in confederacy with those who are in arms against them." [Here follows an account of the deposition of the Nabob of Arcot.]—"Most of the English papers prose a great deal about the ferment there is in men's minds. Not a sloop can be armed, in any British harbour, but they will insist, that Europe is going to be deluged with the blood of a new war. They are so blind, as not to see, that the affairs of the Continent have been settled to the entire satisfaction of all the great powers; and, that the voice of experience still speaks too loudly, and too decidedly, to leave a possibility, that any government should consent to the interference of the English in the new arrangements which have become necessary in consequence of the peace.—Switzerland, drawn into the vortex of our revolution, which she once thought that she might view as an unconcerned spectator, can no longer return to that which was her condition in 1789. There are, in politics, situations which cannot be restored. Were that country left to itself, it might exhaust and agitate the neighbouring powers, but could never renovate its former existence. The interposition of France had become indispensibly necessary."

FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

Ratisbon, Nov. 26.—The Deputation of the Empire, on the 23d inst. completed the Deputation's recess, or general conclusum in 54 sections, which was yesterday presented to the Imperial Plenipot. for ratification. The Sub-delegate of Bohemia gave his vote for the conclusum in contemplation of a speedy adjustment between Austria and France, which may be expected every day. The conclusum has been sent off by the French Legation at Paris by a Courier.—Immediately after the ratification the general conclusum will be laid before the Diet.—The day before yesterday 350 Menz troops entered this city, and to-day the Count De Benzel took civil possession, in the name of the Elector Arch-Chancellor.

Banks of the Meise, Nov. 27.—A new Deputation, it is said, will be appointed to consider of the new distribution of the German Empire, and the constitution of the circles, and to prepare a plan to be laid before the Diet.

Vienna, Nov. 21.—According to intelligence from Peterwaradin, of the 18th inst. the first reports respecting the earthquake at Constantinople were much exaggerated. It was nevertheless very violent. In the neighbourhood of the Scraglio several houses were shaken, and a great part of those in the suburb of Galata, together with the Mosques, overthrown. The Grand Seignior fled to the Mosque of St. Sophia, where a great multitude of people also took refuge.—Nov. 24.—Prince Esterhazy has left this city for Paris, and Gen. Count St. Julien, who accompanied the Grand Duke Constantine to the frontiers of Austrian Poland, has returned to Vienna.—The Palatine of Hungary will set off for Petersburg, about the end of the month.

Berne, Nov. 30.—It is said that the English Secretary, Mr. Moore, has repaired to Constance incog. where General Bachmann is at present with several Swiss emigrants.—The public papers have announced that M. Reding has been set at liberty; it is not, however, Aloys Reding, but one of his cousins.

Ratisbon, Dec. 2.—The Imperial Plenipot. has not yet acceded to the Defin. Conclusum of the Deputation.—The ministers of the mediating powers, are occupied with the discussion of a project for the organization of Germany, upon the principles established in the plan of Indemnities, in which will be particularly determined the relation of the two prevailing religions, and the powers of the directors of public worship.—There still exists a violent quarrel between Bavaria and Baden, respecting the library at Manheim.

Berne, Dec. 3.—The Diets assembled at Lugano and Bellinzona, have charged Citizen Ruttiman, First Statthalter, at present at Paris, to represent those cantons in the Congress. The Diet of Zug, on the refusal of the Ex-Director Laharpe, has appointed for its Deputy, Gen. Andermatt.—The Editor of one of our Journals has been conducted under a military escort before Gen. Ney, in consequence of an article which appeared in his Journal. The Gen. declared that the Journals of Berne should pass under the censure of his office.

Basle, Dec. 3.—The Helvetic Government has received intelligence that the Preliminary Negotiations have already been set on foot respecting the Indemnities claimed by Switzerland for the loss of its possessions in Germany, which promise complete success.—Gen. Ney has been authorized by the Minister at War to transport all the artillery, muskets, &c. arising from the disarming of the inhabitants of Switzerland, to Lausanne, where they will be guarded by the second Helvetic battalion of the line.—The Deputies of Uri and Schwitz have set out for Paris.

Brussels, Dec. 6.—Letters from Paris continue to assure us, that the journey of the First Consul into ci-devant Belgium, will take place in January next, and that after having visited Brussels, Antwerp, and Ghent, examined and given the necessary orders respecting the opening the canal between Charleroy and Brussels, for the purpose of forming a junction between the Sambre and the Scheldt, he will proceed directly to Mayence. It is added, that the Minister at War will join Buonaparté on the banks of the Rhine, in order to examine the plan formed for the purpose of establishing a military line on the left bank of that river, between Frankenthal and the frontiers of the Batavian Republic.

Paris, Dec. 7.—(Extract from the Argus).—Madame Buonaparté's Drawing-Room.—The Drawing Room at St. Cloud, on Thursday se'nnight, in point of brilliancy and fashion, eclipsed all former precedent. Mad. Buonaparté entered the Drawing-Room at $\frac{1}{2}$ past 3 o'clock, when the following presentations took place, viz.—Her Grace the Duchess of Dorset, the Duchess of Gordon, with her beautiful and accomplished daughter, Lady Georgiana.—The Duchess of Newcastle—Countess of Cholmondeley.—Lady Conyngham.—Lady Eliz. Monek.—Lady Eliz. Foster, daughter of the Earl of Bristol, Bishop of Derby.—Mrs. Orby Hunter.—These were the principal English Ladies that were presented to Mad. Buonaparté. The foreign circle of Ladies were very numerous. Lord Whitworth, the English Ambassador, was likewise presented, together with the list of Noblemen and Gent. presented to the First Consul on Sunday last. The rest of the company consisted of M. Talleyrand, Minister for Foreign Affairs; M. Maret, Secretary of State, with the other Members of Government; the Foreign Ministers and their Ladies; Sir John, Lady, and Miss Callander; Col. Roche; Lt. Col. Matthew; Lord Frederick Montague; Maj. Staples; the beautiful and accomplished Mrs. Orby Hunter; and a large party of fashion and beauty, of all nations, too long for recapitulation.—Her Grace the Duchess of Dorset was honoured by Mad. Buonaparté with the most marked attention. By mistake her Grace was placed at the left, instead of the right hand of Mad. Buonaparté. This occasioned a temporary derangement, which, however, only served to display the affability and politeness of Mad. Buonaparté in a more conspicuous light.—The Duchess of Gordon was likewise noticed in the most gracious and flattering manner, and as well as her lovely and charming daughter, Lady Georgiana, constituted the object of general admiration. Nor ought theauteous and fascinating lady Conyngham to be omitted in this glorious constellation of female loveliness, this lucidum cæli decus, of which she formed so bright and sparkling a star! May such sweet irradiation ever shine and cheer the political horizon of the courts of Europe, and more particularly shed its benign influence over the cabinets of France and Great Britain!—The ceremony of presentation being over, the company were ushered through the long gallery, to a spacious apartment, where refreshments were served up, consisting of the choicest wines, fruits, and other dainties. The present being the first time of this custom taking place, we may consider it as a compliment to the English embassy. About 5 o'clock the company withdrew, highly satisfied with the polite reception they had experienced, and loud in their praises of the urbanity and winning kindness of Madame Buonaparté. The Duchess of Gordon, in particular, expressed herself in terms of rapture at the elegant and conciliatory manners of that lady.

Paris, Dec. 7.—By a decree of the Consuls a real entrepôt is established at Cherbourg.—Gen. Menou is to replace Gen. Jourdan, as administrator Gen. in Piedmont; the latter will sit in the council of state.—Dec. 10.—The deputies of the Helvetic Cantons convoked at Paris to give their opinion on a plan of constitution for Helvetia, have nearly all arrived here.—The government has appointed a commission of four, viz. Barthelemy, Desmeuniers, Roderer and Fouché to confer with the deputies in order to receive and discuss their observations and plans.—Dec. 11.—They write from Algiers, of the 10th Nov. that on the preceding day, a shock of an earthquake was felt there, so violent, that for forty seconds the inhabitants expected to be buried under the ruins of their houses. Several houses were much damaged, and almost all were cracked.—At the distance of six leagues from Algiers, a village, consisting of 200 houses, was entirely destroyed, and all its inhabitants perished.—Two English ships of the line felt the shock strongly at 30 miles from land.

The principal presentations were Count Schimmelpenninck, envoy and plenipotentiary from the Batavian republic, his Grace the Duke of Bedford, on coming to his title; and the Right Hon. the Attorney General of Ireland.

On Thursday the 9th inst. Her Majesty held a drawing room at St. James's Palace. The principal introductions to Her Majesty were Count Schimmelpenninck, and his Grace the Duke of Bedford.

Ordered.—The house having resolved itself into a committee of the whole house. Mr. Addington then entered into a statement of the supply for the year, and the ways and means for raising it. As we shall have repeated occasions to refer to these important documents before the publication of our SUPPLEMENT, we are induced to present our readers with the following abstract of them, the accuracy of which may be depended upon, as we have received them from an official source.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer first observed, that he was induced to bring forward the motion, of which he had given notice, for granting to His Majesty a sum on the growing produce of the consolidated fund, at a season of the year earlier than usual, by the very satisfactory circumstance of the extraordinary produce of the rev. during the last half year. It would be recollected, that four millions and a half had been voted on the credit of the consolidated fund, for one year to the 5th April next. Of that sum, no less than £3,800,000 had been realised on the 10th of Oct. last, and there was little doubt that on the conclusion of the ensuing quarter, on the 5th Jan. the surplus of the consolidated fund would exceed the £700,000 necessary to complete the sum which had been voted. The committee therefore would be aware, that unless a power were given to His Majesty's gov. to apply such further surplus as might accrue, to the public service, a considerable sum might remain dead and useless in the exchequer, while money must be raised by other means to defray the necessary expenses. He then shortly recapitulated, the principal measures of finance in the year 1802, and observed, that the unfunded debt in exchequer bills and navy debt, which, in Nov. 1801, had amounted to upwards of £37,300,000 had been reduced to about 19½ millions; making a reduction of near 18 millions, which in the course of the year had been either funded or paid off.—Of the remaining sum of 19½ millions, three millions, which had been advanced by the bank as a consideration for the renewal of their charter, bore no interest, and was not payable till 1806, and £900,000 were charged on the annual taxes of the present year, the arrears of which would be sufficient to discharge them. Deducting these sums, and £4,500,000 of navy debt, the remaining Exch. bills scarcely exceeded 11 millions. That in order to effect this reduction, to provide for the current services of the year on that extensive scale which the circumstances of the state had required, and to relieve the country from the pressure of the income tax, it had been necessary to make provision for 97 millions of funded debt, of which 11 millions arose from the funding of exchequer bills, 57½ millions from the stock charged upon the income tax, and about 30 millions from the loan of the present year. That the charge accruing from so large an addition to the funded debt amounted to above £3,100,000, for which taxes were provided, which were estimated at four millions, but which in the first quarter in which they had become productive had brought into the Exchequer about £920,000, although scarcely any thing had been received on the additional assessed taxes, which were estimated at one million. Adding, therefore, one-fourth of this sum to that which had been realized, it would appear that the produce of the taxes of 1802, in the quarter ending the 10th of Oct. in that year, might be estimated at no less than £1,170,000. He had the satisfaction to state, that so far as a judgment could yet be formed, the services of the year would be defrayed by the grants of parliament, with the single exception of the extraordinaries of the army. Gent. would recollect that he had expressed his apprehensions in the spring that a considerable excess would arise on that service, and a large addition of expense had undoubtedly been occasioned by the detention of our troops upon foreign stations longer than had been expected. He had reason to believe that the excess beyond the sum of £1,600,000 provided by Parliament, would exceed one million; but he had the consolation of being able to state to the committee, that the total expense of the extraordinaries of the army in 1802 would not exceed one half of its amount in the preceding year. It was also satisfactory to reflect, that the economical management of the naval service had effected a reduction of no less than four millions and a half of navy debt. He next stated the supplies proposed for the year 1803, and the ways and means by which they were to be defrayed as follows:

He next proceeded to consider the supplies of the year as distinguished between permanent services and such as were only occasional. Under the former head, he observed, might be included the navy, the army (except that sum which might be voted to make good the excess of the extraord. of the present year, which he estimated at one million,) the ordnance, the miscellaneous services of Gr. Britain and Ireland, and the interest on exch. bills, although on all those services it was possible that reductions might hereafter take place. The total amount of those charges was about 16 millions, of which the British proportion would somewhat exceed £14,100,000. In the latter class might be placed the corn bounties, the excess of the army extraordi. of 1802, the repayment of exch. bills, and of the advances of the Bank and E. I. Comp. amounting in the whole to £6,800,000. He was strongly impressed with the conviction, that whatever our necessary permanent expenses might be, they ought to be provided for by a permanent revenue equal to the charge; and he trusted, that in this opinion he was supported by a general concurrence of the House, and of the country. That we must not attempt to accommodate our expenditure to our revenue, but must resolutely determine to raise our revenue to a level with the expenditure. He did not, however, at present, feel it necessary to recommend to the committee any such effort. The only operation of finance which he had at present in contemplation, was at some late period of the session, to propose that from six to eight millions of exch. bills should be funded, in order to prevent any inconvenient accumulation in the market. The committee would be aware that unless a bargain could be concluded with the holders of those bills, on terms advantageous to the public, it might be necessary to raise a loan to this extent, for the purpose of discharging them. In either case, he trusted, that the means of defraying the charge which would be brought upon the public, might be found without any very material addition to the burthens of the people.—He next proceeded to state to the committee, that it might be observed that he had proposed to vote no more than four millions as the produce of the consol. fund, although he had stated his expectation of a sum of $6\frac{1}{2}$ millions in the general account of the ways and means of the year. He had proposed a vote so moderate, because it would be sufficient for the immediate purpose, and would avoid any inconvenience to the public service in case the hopes which he thought himself well warranted in entertaining, should not be realized by the experience of the two next quarters. He had, however, to state the produce of the three preceding quarters in support of his expectations. The actual amount of the surplus of the consolidated fund in $\frac{3}{4}$ of a year ending the 10th Oct. 1802, amounted to 5,508,067*l*. To this was to be added the bounties paid on corn within that period, and not yet repaid by Parli. being 431,729*l*. and the sum which might be expected from the produce of the taxes of the present year, which had not taken place in the two first quarters of that period. The total would be 7,939,796*l*. From which, deducting the whole of the sums received on account of the income tax, amounting to 2,054,893*l*. the total produce of the three quar. would appear to be 5,884,903*l*. If the ensuing year proved equally productive, the surplus, in four quar. would be no less than 7,845,000*l*. and he therefore could not consider himself over sanguine in expecting a clear surplus of 6,500,000*l*. It was also satisfactory to observe, that the above sum of 7,845,000*l*. was little less than double the surplus of the consolidated fund in any former year; as the largest produce ever known, which was in the year ending the 5th Jan. 1792, amounted to 4,320,000*l*. In comparing the produce of the taxes, it would be found that a progressive increase had taken place, not indeed in every year, but in every period of a certain number of years compared with periods preceding it. This was an undeniable proof of the prosperity of the country, and a satisfactory indication of its increasing resources. Supposing the produce of the rev. to continue equal to what it had been of late, which he was far from venturing to predict with confidence, it would afford the means of providing for the defence of the country in a very ample manner. In confirmation of which, he stated the supply and ways and means as follows:—The naval service, in its different branches, might be estimated at about 4,230,000*l*. a sum capable of supporting an estab. nearly double that which had been maintained in any former peace.—The army (allowing 500,000*l*. for extraor. and supposing a reduction of one million below the present estimates,) would amount to 5,200,000*l*. For the ordnance he should allow 800,000*l*.; and for the miscellaneous services of the United Kingdom 1,300,000*l*. The total joint contribution would be 11,530,000*l*. Adding 500,000*l*. for the separate charges of Britain, to the British proportion of the above sum, the total to be provided by Gr. Britain would be 10,533,000*l*.

To meet this expense, we might estimate land and malt tax.....	£2,750,000

a sum which would leave a clear surplus of upwards of a million.—But there were other indications not less satisfactory and decisive, of the increasing prosperity of the country. It was not possible, till the conclusion of the year, that the acco. of the commerce of the country should be completely made up. But from the best acco. which at present could be procured, it appeared that the real value of the principle articles of Brit. prod. and manuf., exported in the year ending Oct. 10, 1802, amounted to 27,900,000*l*.; while, in the preceding year, they were somewhat less than 24,500,000*l*. and that, supposing those articles to bear the same proportion to the whole of the exports, which they had done in former years, the total value of Brit. manuf. exported in the year 1802, would not fall short of 50,000,000*l*. being an increase of eight millions above the year preceding, which was itself greater than any former year.—The account of the shipping of the country was still more imperfect, as, till the close of the year, returns were only made up for the port of London: but it was not less satisfactory, so far as it could be ascertained, particularly in the important circumstance of the increase of Brit. shipping. In the year ending the 10th Oct. 1801, 1726 Brit. ships, measuring 418,631 tons, and manned with 23,095 men, had entered that port, and 1331 ships, measuring 350,634 tons, and carrying 24,070 men, had cleared outwards. In 1802, the Brit. ships which entered inwards were 2459, tons 574,700, men 33,743.—The Brit. ships which cleared outwards were 1953, tons 419,067, men 28,112.—The diminution of foreign shipping was not less remarkable than the increase of British. In 1801, the number of foreign ships which entered inwards, was 3385, tonnage 452,677, men 20,388. The foreign ships which cleared outwards were 3381, tonnage 445,651, men 23,302. In the year 1802, the number of foreign ships entering inwards was reduced to 1549, tonnage 214,117, men 10,555. The foreign ships which cleared outwards were 1868, tonnage 262,006, men 14,826. Such were the proofs of the increasing prosperity of G. Brit. But that of the other part of the United Kingdom was not less remarkable.—The rev. of Ireland had increased between the 5th of Jan. and the month of Aug. last above 900,000*l*. compared with the corresponding period of the preceding year. An increase which in proportion to the total amount of the Irish rev. was even greater and more rapid than known. He then took a view of the state of the sinking fund—a measure which had originated in the sagacity and abilities of the late minister, and had been established by the wisdom and firmness of Parliament. In 1787, the sinking fund bore a proportion to the interest of the national debt, of about one to ten—it now had risen to the proportion of one to three, and amounted to no less than six millions—a sum which, annually added to the productive capital of the nation, cannot fail to produce the most extensive and salutary effects.—Mr. Addington concluded with moving his resolutions, which were agreed to, and the report ordered to be received on Monday.—The Indemnity Bill read a third time and passed.

SUMMARY OF POLITICS.

We shall begin our remarks with that part of our statement, with respect to the affairs of St. Domingo and Jamaica, which, for want of room we were, last week, compelled to postpone.—We remain thoroughly convinced, that the Island of St. Domingo will finally be completely restored to its former opulent state, that it will be what it was before the revolution, the first colony in the whole world. There are yet troubles, and very serious troubles in the island; and, at some of the posts, the distress and danger of the troops and inhabitants are, undoubtedly, very great; but this is not generally the case, and we repeat our assertion, that if the amount of imports and exports be a criterion of the magnitude of trade, the trade of St. Domingo is now greater than that of Jamaica. But it is not, as we have so frequently said, in a colonial point of view that we have so much reason to fear the French at St. Domingo; it is not a rivalry (or as Mr. Fox, in his Paris jargon, calls it, a rivalité) in trade and commerce, which is, in this quarter, the immediate object of our dread; it is the arms of St. Domingo, which, from the very first, we have dreaded and which we still dread. "If we have the policy to unite the industry of the colonist with the warlike spirit of the buccaneer, the West India islands will soon become to her [St. Domingo] what Europe is to France."* This is the notion, and these are the words of the French rulers.—But, whether the French succeed in their views with regard to this island, or whether they do not, the folly (to give it no harsher term) on the part of our peace-making ministers, in suffering the French armament to go thither, previous to the signature of the definitive treaty, will be equally apparent, and equally injurious in its consequences; for to say nothing of the mighty difference which the sailing and safe arrival of that armament must have made in the tone and the terms of the treaty, it is, now at least, clear to every one, that our West India islands, Jamaica in particular, has been, by the permission of which we are speaking, placed in a state of danger a year sooner than they otherwise would have been. The ministers, having been compelled to open a way for the French armament, or relinquish that peace on which their places depended, affected, by way of justification of their conduct, to see great dangers in the black government of St. Domingo; and, on that ground, they seemed to wish the nation to consider the French expedition as undertaken almost at their request. When, indeed, the news of Toussaint's resistance, and the exaggerated account of the mortality amongst their new friends, reached England, they could not disguise their exultation; but still they persisted in defending the measure as a wise one, because it tended to hasten the destruction of the black government, the example and the probable hostility of which were, as they pretended, much more dangerous to our colonies than any French force in St. Domingo could possibly be. In answer to this Mr. Windham, in the Appendix to his speech of 4th Nov. 1801, after remarking on the doubtfulness of the result of the French expedition, said*: "The probability is, that France will succeed: but should she not, then all the terrors, affected to be felt at the establishment of the black empire, will return with tenfold force; for the blacks will remain masters,—and masters after having tried their powers in a regular contest with European troops,—not to mention the hostility, which they may be well expected to conceive against us, who, after various treaties and negotiations with them, finally lent our assistance to the sending out a force, intended for the purpose of bringing them back to slavery. Should the other event happen, and France obtain possession of St. Domingo, it may then well be a question, how long we shall remain in possession of Jamaica." Mons. Charmilly, whom subsequent events have proved to possess a most accurate knowledge of every thing relating to the West Indies, has these remarkable words: "Je le répète, Monsieur, et je n'hésite point à l'affirmer: si St. Domingue étoit abandonné, on remis aux François, la Jamaïque seroit promptement détruite, et bientôt après, toutes les colonies des Antilles &c."—This will, probably, be subject of derision with Lords Hawkesbury and Castlereagh; but that derision will be affected, as all their sorrow at the gloomy prospects of the French has been. Their measures, with respect to the object before us, have constantly been in direct contradiction to their professions: they professed to believe, that the French armament would carry out security to our islands, particularly Jamaica; they now profess to believe that it has carried out such security; but, to prove the insincerity of these professions, we have nothing to do but take a comparative view of the ships of the line on the West India station.

In the month of September, 1801, the month before the preliminaries were signed, there were at Jamaica and the Leeward Islands..... 6

In March, 1802, that is in six months after the preliminaries were signed, and in two months after the French armament had arrived at St. Domingo, there were, at Jamaica alone... 22

At the present time, after a year of peace, after the French have brought home their fleet, and after the "black empire," has been so far destroyed as to lose its emperor, who has been brought away and imprisoned in old France, there are, at Jamaica alone 9

And, after this view, cannot one believe the ministers to have been sincere, when they declared, that they regarded the sailing of the French expedition, and the success of that expedition, as absolutely necessary to the security of our own colonies? If they really thought so, why did they upon the sailing of that expedition, augment our naval force at Jamaica from 6 to 22 ships of the line? If they really think now, that we derive security from the French force being in St. Domingo; if they do really and sincerely believe, that the situation of our colonies is grown more secure in consequence of the destruction, in part at least, of the "black empire," how will they answer to their country for the keeping up of nine ships of the line at Jamaica, three more than were thought necessary during the heat of the war as well as during the zenith of the "black empire?" And, lastly, if the peace, as considered with respect to our colonies, be not pregnant with danger, how will they account for keeping up nine ships of the line, where, during the last peace, we had no ship of the line at all? During the last peace, our naval force at Jamaica was one fifty gun ship, and a few frigates, about three, and two or three sloops of war: it now is, nine ships of the line, nine frigates, and nine sloops of war, as will be seen by a reference to the distribution of the navy, in our last sheet, page 758.—If we look, too, at the military force, in Jamaica, we see, if possible a still stronger proof of the insincerity, or the gross ignorance, of His Majesty's ministers, who, instead of announcing to the colonists, as was usual at a peace, a reduction of their expences, called upon them for a very considerable augmentation of those expences, for the purpose of maintaining five thousand additional troops, five thousand more soldiers than were thought necessary to the defence of the island during the war, and during the existence of the terrific "black empire!"—After all, however, we shall, perhaps, be told, that these dangers must have been the necessary result of any peace with the Republic of France, and that, to avoid them, we must have continued the war for ever. Allowing, for argument's sake, the truth of these premises, and the justness of this conclusion; allowing that the dangers we have been speaking of must have followed any peace with the terrible Republic, yet we contend, that, in point of time, much was in our own power. To suffer the French armament to sail previous to the conclusion of the definitive treaty, was highly injurious to that treaty, both as to its terms and the time of its conclusion; but, with respect to the expedition, time was every thing: if it had been delayed till after the conclusion of the definitive treaty, it could not have taken place till September; or, taking place in May, the troops would, upon their very landing, have been met by that mortality which put a stop to their movements in June last; and so would they have been lost to our enemy, instead of having, before that same month of June, conquered the black empire, and sent the black emperor to inhabit a prison in the mountains of the Jura. If, therefore, our ministers had acted with wisdom and firmness, if they had preferred the honour and interest of their country to the accomplishment of a popular measure, calculated to prolong the duration of their power and emoluments, Toussaint would at this moment be to be subdued, and, having had a twelvemonth to prepare for resistance, the war might have cost 150,000 of those troops, who are now employed in the subjugation of Switzerland, and in other enterprizes, all having a tendency, either direct or indirect, to the destruction of the independence of Europe in general, and of England in particular.

France and her willing satellites look to the proceedings in parliament with a watchful and scowling eye; while the nations who still wish for deliverance from her yoke, look to them with uncommon anxiety. Spite of our degradation; spite of the relinquishment of our place in scale of nations; spite of Napper Tandy; spite of the Hawkesburys and Addingtons; still some of the unfortunate nations look to England for help; strong and clear as is the evidence of our debasement, loud as we have proclaimed it to the world, still, still do they hope, that we are not what we seem. The truth is, that such was the vast stock of our reputation for liberality, honour, and courage, that the world cannot, all at once, form an adequate conception of our present state. We still retain the name and the outward appearance of the English nation; we have still the hide, the limbs, and the carcass of the lion; but the nations will, one after another, find out that we have no longer his teeth or his claws; one after another they will learn to know, to despise, and to insult us. The topics of public discussion, to which we think it necessary more particularly to call the attention of our readers, are, 1. The Navy; 2. The Army; 3. The Revenue and Commerce: 4. The Indemnity to the Stadtholder: 5. The affair of Capt. D'Auvergne. As to the navy, it must give every one who loves England, and who wishes to preserve her from the power of France, great pleasure to perceive, that a stop has been put to the dismantling and disbanding system of Lord St. Vincent. The 50,000 seamen, voted for the whole year, must, in great part, be enlisted upon a new bounty, from those already discharged; but this is a trifle when compared to the alarming mischief which would soon have been accomplished, if his lordship's æconomical measures had not received a check. We have at this moment fewer ships of the line in commission than France has, if we include (as, in all such calculations we must) those which she has at her command, belonging to Spain and Holland; and, in Europe, we have not half so many in commission as France. Our ships of the line at this time in Europe, and in commission, are 9 in number, or 10 at most; and, our readers may rest assured, that these have not hands enough on board to man more than 6 for sea. We have about 50 frigates in commission in Europe, some of them manned with about one-third of their complement. Not more than 30 of these could put to sea with their present strength of hands. Mr. Addington has, indeed, told the country, that we can, at any time, get fifty ships of the line ready for sea in the space of a month! And here we have a striking instance of the lengths to which your modest, well-meaning men, who are everlastingly talking of their conscience, will sometimes go. Fifty ships of the line ready for sea at a month's notice! Forty additional ships, with all their tackling, rigging, guns, stores, and men, amounting to 24,000 seamen and 5,000 marines, to be got ready to sail out of port at a month's notice! The very press-gangs, for the impressment of the 24,000 seamen, would not be organized in that space of time. But why do we occupy the time of our readers with comments on a statement, which, if it be not (as we hope it is) a joint fabrication of the newspapers, is upon a level with any of the statements of Baron Munchausen. Mr. Addington contradicted certain reports, which had been circulated with respect to the strength of the French fleet at Toulon, and, upon the authority of Admiral Bickerton, assured the House that there were but 5 ships of the line in the harbour of Toulon; but, until it be proved to us, that Admiral Bickerton has better information respecting the French fleet at Toulon, than Admiral

Duckworth has respecting the French army in St. Domingo (which was a week ago reduced to 1,500 men, who, with their commander, had actually taken to their ships) we shall be disposed to give very little credit to his intelligence; and, indeed, we shall never be in great haste to believe the foreign intelligence of a minister, who, in March, 1801, stated the French army in Egypt to consist of twelve thousand men, and who had, a few months afterwards, to inform the nation, that twenty five thousand men of that very army had laid down their arms! The comparative statement which he gave of our navy, and of that of France and her two principal satellites, was, that France had 39 sail of the line, Spain 70, and Holland 16; and that, to oppose these, we had 192 sail of the line. Whether he meant to include the ships building, those unserviceable, in Holland, France, and Spain, we know not; but this we know, that he did not include them. According to his statement, we have 60 ships of the line more than the three powers; but, from so conscientious and candid a man, one might have expected a deduction from this balance of 18 ships building, 8 of the ordinary, 18 receiving ships, and 3 of the guard-ships, all unserviceable, which would leave us a balance of no more than 13; and, as the Italian states have more than this number, the numerical balance is certainly against us. Far be it from us, however, to augur any evil from this circumstance. We have ships enough; and we have entered into this examination only for the purpose of showing, that the sort of calculation on which Mr. Addington proceeded, was fit for nothing but the amusement of children. He did not remove, nor attempt to remove, the serious apprehension, which every thinking man must entertain, of the consequences of the emigration of British sailors to France; a thing that never was heard of at the end of any former war.—We rejoice, however, that, whether by the opponents of the peace, or by Buonaparté, the ministry have been goaded into an augmentation of the fleet; and we rejoice still more at the augmentation of the army; for, however we may hope to the contrary, it is on this army that we must finally depend for the preservation of our independence. The Secretary at War, in bringing forward his estimate (see preceding sheet, p. 754), attempted a defence of the precipitate measures of reduction, in which he completely failed, if a speaker ought to be said to fail in not defending what is indefensible. Our pleasure, however, at perceiving, that it was resolved to maintain an efficient army of a hundred and thirty thousand men, made us willing to overlook an attempt (perhaps laudable enough "upon the whole and under all existing circumstances") to draw a veil over past errors, particularly when accompanied with such thumping atonement. Before we dismiss this subject of naval and military establishments, justice to those who opposed the peace call upon us to remind our readers of their sentiments, formerly given, applicable to establishments as connected with the measure, of which they disapproved. Mr. Windham, in his speech of the 4th of November, 1801, said, "The chief question, as to the expenses of peace compared to those of war, will be, not between an ordinary peace establishment and a war, such as, from circumstances, ours has hitherto been, involving expeditions to all parts of the globe; but between a peace establishment, such as that which is now declared to be necessary, and a war, which had become, and was likely to continue, merely defensive; in which we should have had nothing to do, but to maintain a competent force, with little prospect of being obliged to make use of it. The advocates for the present peace must find themselves always in an awkward dilemma, between economy and safety. We make peace in order to save our money: if we reduce our establishments, what becomes of our security? If we keep up our establishments, what becomes of our savings? Whatever you give to one object, is unavoidably taken from the other. The savings of the present peace, therefore, can be looked for only between the narrow limits of a high peace and a low war establishment; or, to state the case more correctly, between a high peace establishment and a war, reduced in the manner that I have described. I wish that a correct estimate were formed of the difference, in point of expense, between these two states; recollecting always that among the expenses of peace are to be counted the provisions necessary against the new dangers brought by the peace itself; the new dangers for example, with which Jamaica, and all our West-India islands are threatened by the establishment of the French in Saint-Domingo, and other parts in that quarter of the world; the new dangers to which our empire in the East is exposed, by the re-entry of the French into the peninsula of India, and the cession to them, for such in effect it is, of the Cape and Cochin: in general, by the

"free passage now given to their ships and armies into every part of the world, and the establishment of them every where in the neighbourhood of our most valuable possessions.—Against all these dangers war provided, as it were, by its own single act. The existence of our fleets upon the ocean, with an admiralty order "to burn, sink, and destroy," shut up at once, as under lock and key, all those attempts, which are now let loose, and require as many separate defences as there are parts liable to be attacked. A fleet cruising before Brest, therefore, was not to be considered as so much clear expense, to be charged to the account of the war; without deducting the expense of additional troops and additional ships, which the absence of the fleet might require to be kept for instance, in the West-Indies."—How correct was this reasoning! How minutely correct have these calculations proved to be! The expense of the five thousand men added to the establishment of Jamaica since the peace, and that of the four ships of the line, at least, added to those on that station, the amount of these expenses (which are so much higher in the West-Indies than in Europe), the amount of these expenses alone, which is entirely an addition to the war establishment of Jamaica, would, if we take into the account the greater loss of lives there than in the Channel, more than have maintained a squadron of 12 ships of the line and 4 frigates to blockade the port of Brest, which blockade not only defended Jamaica, but all those other numerous points of the British empire, which, being exposed by the removal of that blockade, must now be guarded by an addition to their war establishments, as long as this armed truce shall continue. Leaving our readers to apply the reasoning of Mr. Windham to our present circumstances, we shall proceed to our third topic, to wit, the Revenue and Commerce. Mr. Adington's statement relative to which we have given correctly and at full length in p. 778 of the present sheet. On a subject so complicated we cannot be expected here to go into detail; we shall, therefore, content ourselves with some general remarks, which we preface with an unfeigned expression of pleasure to find, that our financial affairs are in so flourishing a state, and with a request that our readers will believe, that if we endeavour to shew, that the great excess, of which the minister speaks, is owing to temporary and not to permanent causes, we are actuated by a desire, not to delude, but to prevent that delusion, which must finally end in bitter disappointment.—The increase of the excise is partly owing to the money which the disbanding of soldiers and sailors has scattered over this country instead of its being spent abroad or locked up in the chests of agents; and partly to the two last abundant harvests, which, by causing an immense reduction in the cost of the necessities of life, have left a greater portion of the earnings of the people to be employed in the purchase of taxable commodities; in other words, the earth having produced more money, more money is come into the treasury, through the medium of the excise. The former of these causes may, indeed, fairly be ascribed to the peace; but the latter never has, we believe, except by a poet in the Morning Post:

" 'Tis thro' Addington's peace that fair plenty is " ours;
 " Peace brighten'd the sunshine, peace soften'd the
 " show'rs;
 " What yellow'd the corn-fields!—what ripen'd
 " the hay?
 " But the peace that was settled last Michaelmas
 " day!"

As to tonnage and sailors employed in our mercantile marine, the reports of the port of London only are made up. According to them an increase has taken place; but, if there should be a falling off at the ports of Bristol, Liverpool, Glasgow, &c. &c. as we are inclined to think there is, there will, probably be, upon the whole, a considerable diminution in this most important branch of our national resources: it is certain, that English shipping has diminished in value from 35 to 40 per centum.—The imports and exports remain, then, to be considered. And here we must beg leave to repeat the opinion, which we gave on a former occasion; that, the vast disproportion between the first quarter and the succeeding ones proves, beyond contradiction, that the increase is not of a permanent nature, but has arisen in great part, at least, from those temporary circumstances, which are well known to be inseparable from the conclusion of a long war, especially after a long negotiation. How many cargoes, to and for this country, were kept in waiting for that diminution in the rates of freight and insurance, which peace must inevitably produce? The negotiations were going on for eight months, during the whole of which time the shippers, out and home, were keeping back all the goods which it was not absolutely necessary to send off. Let it be observed, too (what, indeed, was frequently observed during the discussions on the peace), that the magazines on the Continent were all empty; that an increased demand in all the lately belligerent countries, was, at first, and even for two or three years, to be expected; unless France, before that time, chose to put an end to our exportation by renewing the war. To and from all the Colonies, which are to remain in our possession, an increase of imports and exports was to be expected, for the causes above mentioned, for the first twelve or eighteen months; and with respect to the colonies which are about to be, or which actually are, restored to France and Holland, it is easy to account for an extraordinary trade. The ministers, by neglecting to obtain a longer time for the shipping of produce, &c. from those colonies to Great Britain, compelled the proprietors to ship the whole home, previous to the surrender of the colonies, or, to incur the immense loss attending a transit through the custom houses of France and Holland; while, on the other hand, the persons remaining in colonies, well knowing that British goods would be immediately prohibited, laid in as great a stock as possible before the day of prohibition arrived. Thus, with respect to the imports and exports of Martinico, St. Lucia, Tobago, Curraçoa, Surinam, Berbice, Demarara, and Essequibo, the minister has had a double year; but it is the last; let the country remember that—it is the last!—These circumstances, we think, fully account for the excess, which the minister, for want of knowledge and experience, and not for want of candour, ascribes to permanent causes. Some people think, indeed, that Mr. Addington's display bears a striking resemblance to that of Shakespeare's apothecary:—

" Remnants of packthread, and old cakes of roses, " Were thinly scattered to make up a shew.
 " Noting this penury, to myself I said—&c. &c."

But we, for our parts, sincerely believe, that, though things may have been made the most of, the statement of the minister is less exaggerated than is generally thought; yet, as something was certainly wanted, by way of a set-off to the accumulation of disappointment and disgrace in our foreign affairs, something to weigh against 50,000 seamen and 130,000 soldiers, the dark and intricate recesses of the treasury might perhaps be regarded as the safest scene wherein to hatch the pious fraud.—In taking leave of this topic, we cannot help bestow-

* The poet means the peace of the first of October, 1801; but that day not suiting him so well, he takes the preceding one.—This is a very happy little piece, and being of a political nature, we propose to give it a place in the Supplement to this volume.

ing a remark on that sort of affected triumph, which the makers and supporters of the peace affect to enjoy on this account, over the opposers of that measure; as if the opposition of the latter had no other foundation than that of the dread of an IMMEDIATE diminution in our commerce and revenue. So far from this being the case, no one of the noblemen and gentlemen in parliament, who opposed the peace, ever expressed his apprehension of an immediate diminution; but, on the contrary, all of them argued upon the supposition, that there might be a permanent increase, until Buonaparté or his successor, finding himself distanced in a fair commercial race, should pick a quarrel with us, and ask us if we could draw our sword; and, Mr. Addington may be well assured, that his consolatory statement, the statement which has so charmed the patriots of 'Change Alley, will make a good deal of mauvais sang at St. Cloud.

The indemnity to the Stadtholder, which is, it seems, in great part, to come, at last, out of the pockets of the people of this country, we are very far indeed from grudging. But, we are equally far from giving the ministry any credit for the proposed act of justice, which is to be ascribed solely to the remonstrances and reproaches of those, who have opposed the treaty of Amiens. By that treaty it was stipulated, that "The branch of the house of Nassau," [observe the degrading phraseology] "which was established in the ci-devant republic of the United Provinces, now the Batavian Republic, having experienced some losses, as well with respect to private property as by the change of constitution adopted in those countries, an equivalent compensation shall be procured for the losses, which they shall be proved to have sustained." This stipulation was hardly made, the treaty of Amiens was hardly signed, when the French and Dutch plenipotentiaries retired into a corner, and entered into a separate convention (See Register, Vol. I. p. 361), by which it was resolved and agreed, that Holland should contribute nothing towards the compensation mentioned in the treaty. Remarking on this curious transaction, at the time, we made use of the following words:—"Who, then, is to discharge this indemnification? Have we obtained permission to do it ourselves? or are we to assist in extorting it from some defenceless bishoprick of Germany?"—Both, as it now appears! yea, verily, both! We are to contribute a sum of money, and the defenceless and unoffending bishop of Fulda is to be robbed of his bishoprick! Our readers will imagine, perhaps, that some supernatural agent enabled us so precisely to point out the result of this transaction; but, if they knew the Hawkesburys and Addingtons as well as we do, they would not be surprised at our describing beforehand their divers acts of folly and meanness.—When the Definitive Treaty came to be discussed, the opposers of that treaty, the men who felt a concern for the honour of their country, having previously seen the separate convention (to which we have above alluded), between France and Holland, demanded an explanation relative thereto. In calling to the recollection of our readers what passed, in parliament, on the subject, we shall confine ourselves to the debate in the House of Lords, on the 5th of May last,* when Lord Carlisle moved for a copy of the separate convention executed at Amiens, with respect to the compensation to the House of Orange. His Lordship prefaced his motion, by observing that the compensation was certainly intended, by the treaty, to come from Holland; but that the convention, of which he had called for a copy, would, if carried into effect, render the stipulation in favour of the House of Orange of non-effect. Lord Pelham replied, that "no such communication had been made to his Majesty's Ministers, nor was he apprized, from any authority, that such convention had been entered into." Lord Cornwallis, being pressed by Lord Carlisle, for an explanation of the matter, said, that "he could not conceive that there was any ground to suspect that the 18th article of the definitive treaty would not be solemnly fulfilled. Neither could he conceive that a separate agreement, entered into by two of the contracting parties to the definitive treaty by themselves, as it were in their closet, without the concurrence or consent of the other contracting parties, could possibly be liable to be considered as affecting the due execution of a treaty, for which the good faith of all the four contracting parties was pledged. With regard to his having deserted, or suffered the interests of the Prince of Orange and his adherents to be deserted, he disclaimed the imputation; he had deserted no interests that this country was bound in honour to maintain, and he had not the smallest doubt that a full and ample compensation would be procured for the Prince of Orange and his adherents."—"The Lord Chancellor contended strenuously that the pledged faith of nations was an ample security for the stipulation to procure a "full compensation for the losses suffered by the House of Orange."—Here, then, we have the interpretation of the article of the treaty relative to the compensation to the House of Orange: and this interpretation comes, too, from the nobleman who negotiated the treaty, and from him who drew it up. That these noble lords looked to Holland for the compensation, or, at least, to some other country than England, is evident. Indeed, it is notorious, that the ministers and their adherents never supposed it possible, [that any demand of the sort would come upon this country: when charged with ingratitude towards the House of Orange, they endeavoured to diminish our obligations to that house; and Lord Hobart, in the very debate above quoted, "denied that the Dutch colonies had been delivered into our hands by the Prince of Orange, or by his means." In fact, it is well known, that, from the beginning to the end of the long and repeated discussions on the peace, the ministers, upon every occasion, insisted that they had procured, by negotiation, a full and adequate compensation to the House of Orange. And, will they now pretend that they meant to procure it from the people of England! Was it necessary to obtain the consent of France, Spain, and Holland to this? Or, did those nations, seeing us basely inclined to desert our faithful friend and ally, resolve to bind us down to do him justice!—Oh shame! shame! shame!

We now come to the last of our proposed topics: the affair of Captain D'Auvergne, which, agreeably to a notice given by Dr. Laurence, is to be discussed after the recess. In the mean time, we think it necessary to put our readers in possession of the leading facts relative to the subject. The newspapers have represented Lord Pelham as saying, in reply to Lord Spencer, that (we quote the True Briton of the 14th inst.) "With respect to the gallant officer, Captain D'Auvergne, no possible imputation could rest upon ministers. It was true, that he had been arrested by an officer of police, and for a short time confined in Paris; but, the moment it was known to the British Minister, application was made to the Minister of Foreign Relations, and by that means, he was instantly released." Now, we positively assert, that the newspapers have combined to misrepresent his lordship, or that his lordship has been kept in the dark, and grossly deceived with respect to this unjust and insulting transaction. The facts are as follows:—Capt D'Auvergne, (Duke de Bouillon), and Mr. J. Dumaresq, sailed from Jersey on the 22d of August last, for Granville. On their arrival, they waited on the Mayor of the Municipality with their passports, that of Captain D'Auvergne being signed by Lord Hawkesbury, and countersigned by Mr. Otto; that of Mr. Dumaresq, by Mr. Otto alone. They were required to deposit their passports in the Mayor's office, which they did; whereupon they received two others in their room. They then proceeded to Paris, where they arrived on the 27th of August. As the Captain's business was to consult a gentleman of the law, who had already his papers in his possession, his first care, on his arrival, was to wait on him. On the 7th of September (twelve days after the arrival of the two gentlemen at Paris), at seven o'clock in the morning, a commissary, accompanied with two runners of the police, entered the bed-chamber of Captain D'Auvergne, made him get up, and, after ransacking his papers, and taking them, took him to the office of the Minister of Police, where he underwent several examinations, the general tendency of which was to extort from him information respecting the secrets of his Majesty's government, during the late war. He was kept, in a nasty room, with two runners, from eight o'clock in the morning to ten o'clock the same evening, at which time he was told that he must go to the Temple, as Fouché, the Minister of Police, was gone to the opera. He was taken to the Temple accordingly, and forced to lie that night on straw, as the bedding was so miserably filthy.—The moment Mr. Dumaresq was informed of the arrest of his companion, which was in about half an hour after it took place, he went to Mr. Merry, the English Plenipotentiary at Paris, and requested that he would either go, or write to Mr. Talleyrand, demanding the immediate release of Captain D'Auvergne. Mr. Merry instantly wrote, but received no answer. He desired Mr. Dumaresq, in case the Captain should not be released that night, to inform him of it early in the morning. Mr. Dumaresq did so, and Mr. Merry, thereupon dispatched a courier to London, to inform his court of what had happened.—On the 9th of September (two days after Captain D'Auvergne was arrested) Mr. Dumaresq was also taken up, in the same way, carried to the police-office, and after a few interrogatories, was also sent to the Temple, previous to which, however, he requested to be informed as to the charge against him, but could obtain no answer.—On Sunday, the 12th of September, both the gentlemen were released. On the Monday, they went to the office of the Minister of Police, in order to recover their papers, and to find out, if possible, what were the charges alledged against them, and who were their accusers; but all knowledge of this kind was refused them.—On Wednesday, the 15th of September, they received their passports to quit France, and the next day they set off from Paris.—As we pledge our word for the correctness of this narrative, it follows, of course, that Lord Pelham must have been misrepresented by the news-papers, or must have been, as we said before, kept in the dark and grossly imposed upon, with respect to this shameful transaction. His lordship is made to say, that “the moment” [the Captain’s arrest] “was made” known to the British Minister, application was made to the French Minister of “Foreign Relations, and by that means,” he” [the Captain] “was instantly released.”—But, the fact is, that Captain D’Auvergne, instead of being instantly released upon the British Ministers application, remained in a filthy prison six days after the making of that application, which, besides, was not even answered by Talleyrand!—Lord Castlereagh has been pleased to speak of this matter as too trifling to give rise to a national dispute. “We have an alien law,” says he, “and we should not suffer any other nation to interfere in our execution of it.” True, my gentle Lord, and to avoid such interference, on the part of France, you will never attempt to execute it against any of the friends or agents of Buonaparté. Lundberg! Lundberg! Lundberg! The pronunciation of that name is a sufficient answer to every thing that ministers can say as to the reciprocity of the alien laws of England and France.—When the ill-treatment of Captain D’Auvergne is brought regularly before Parliament, our readers will see it fully and ably discussed; but we could not, in the mean time, refrain from submitting to them a few facts and observations on so interesting a subject.

After having gone through the preceding distinct and important heads, it was our intention to have remarked on other speeches, attributed, by the newspapers, to members of parliament; such, for instance, as that, where a general is represented as declaring that “if the war had been kept up, they” [the members] “would not, perhaps, have been now debating in that House.” And again, where an English country-gentleman is made to say, “that he wished to see no change of ministry, be“cause as the present ministers were known to be of a peaceful disposition the turning of them out might furnish an ambitious neighbour with a pretext for renewing hostilities.” It was our intention to have shown how exactly this gentleman had verified our opinions, as stated in the present Vol. p. 343, 573, &c.; but, we must content ourselves with barely referring to those pages. The curious answer of Mr. Addington, too, respecting the libels against His Majesty in the French official paper, would, had we room, demand our animadversions.

As to M. Sheridan’s speech, we had prepared several pages on that delightful topic, which we most reluctantly postpone till our next. Of parties, however, we must say a few words. Mr. Thomas Grenville, Lord Temple, and Lord Grenville, having all expressed a wish to see Mr. Pitt again at the head of affairs, the old opposition and their adherents, who, it seems, are never to be cured of their rancour towards those men who prevented them from revolutionizing the country, have made this call a handle for describing all those who opposed the peace of Amiens, as a faction struggling for power and place, than which nothing can be more false. Mr. Windham and Dr. Laurence have clearly expressed their conviction, that, unless the temper of the country be previously changed, a change of men would be of no use. These two gentlemen, therefore, and many others who opposed the peace, have made no call for Mr. Pitt; and, we are well assured, that neither Lord Grenville, nor Mr. Grenville has any view to office. It is not for them, however goaded, to make profession of a desire to remain out of office; for, their rank, their talents, their integrity, their many great and statesman-like qualities, mark them out for the service of their King; but we know, that their opinion is, that Mr. Pitt should be prevailed upon to join the present ministry, for the purpose of putting a stop to that system of submission, which, if suffered to proceed much longer, must bring upon us swift and complete destruction.

POSTSCRIPT.—It is proposed by France to give Parma to the family of Spain in exchange for the Floridas! Cochin has been given up to France by the Dutch!—Our readers will remember that we foretold both these cessions nearly a twelvemonth ago. —Tobago (poor little Tobago!) was surrendered to the French on the 7th of October.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The letter of W. A. we should rather keep to insert with the succeeding ones in the Supplement to this volume; and we beg leave to observe, that the sequel should, for this purpose, reach us by the 1st. of January, at furthest.—DETECTOR, on the modesty of ministers, TYRREUS, on the fraternization of Messrs. Fox and Addington, and CYPRIAN, to the Bishop of London, shall appear in our next.—MR. WILBERFORCE, when he perceives how matter has pressed upon us, will, we make no doubt, excuse us till next week.—Next week we shall publish two numbers, for the purpose of getting out several interesting articles, and, in particular, AN AUTHENTIC NARRATIVE OF THE TAKING OF THE INVINCIBLE STANDARD IN EGYPT, by ANTOINE LUTZ, a French royalist, and a private soldier in the Queen’s German Reg. of Foot. “Rendez, therefore, honour to whom honour is due,” is a precept, which, with respect to this affair, has been much too long neglected.

OF THE

ON THE 21ST OF MARCH, 1801.

Render, therefore, to all their dues :
tribute, to whom tribute; custom, to whom custom; fear, to whom fear; honour, to whom honour.

ROM. xiii. 7.

The precept, inculcated, in the words which I have chosen for my motto, has, with respect to the taking of the Invincible Standard, not only been unobserved, but directly and flagrantly disobeyed. Honours upon honours have, indeed, been rendered to this meritorious and gallant achievement; but, they have been withheld from him, who, alone, has any claim to them, and lavished upon others to whom they do not belong. The columns of our public papers, the windows of our print-shops, the canvas of our public exhibitions, the scenes of our theatres, the proceedings of public bodies, have proclaimed to the army of England, to the people of England, and to the whole world, that the honour of taking the Invincible Standard is due to some persons of the 42d or Royal Highland Regiment; whereas, the whole of that honour belongs to ANTOINE LUTZ, a Frenchman by birth, and a private soldier in the Queen's German Regiment. In doing justice to this gallant, though friendless, foreigner, I could have wished to avoid every thing like controversy with any body, and particularly with any part of the army of Egypt; but I am compelled to controvert and to refute too, or to leave my duty undischarged. The Highlanders have claimed the honour: to them the meed has been awarded, through every channel which a nation has of conveying its sentiments to the world and to posterity: there is but one wreath of invincible laurel; before I can restore it to LUTZ, I must take from the brow of the Highlanders.

Most of my readers will remember, that, for some time after the unofficial accounts of the battle of the 21st of March arrived, public report ascribed the victory of that day almost entirely to the 42d regiment: not only, in every narrative that was heard, was the Queen's German Regiment totally overlooked, but no other regiment found a place, except by way of a foil to the forty-second.—The Highlanders!—the brave Highlanders!—the more than invincible Highlanders!—were, as in Mr. Porter's Panorama, always in the foreground; always active, always victorious. It was, in short the Highlanders who won the battle, and, therefore, it was perfectly natural, that to them should belong the honour of taking the Invincible Standard, which was regarded as the sign and proof of that victory.—The London newspapers, “never last to hand “about a lie,” soon began to lend their aid; whether gratuitously or not is more than I can say. In the month of February, 1802 (I have lost the day), the following paragraph appeared in the ministerial paper, the True Briton: “Lieut. Corbett [not Cobbett] has arrived from Egypt with the “official dispatches of the battle of the “21st of March, and brought with him “the Standard of a French corps taken in “that battle, entitled ‘The Invincible Legion of Buonaparté,’ and which was seized by the 42d regiment, who were the particular object of the attack of that French “corps. The whole of them were cut to “pieces, and their Standard remained in “the hands of our gallant soldiers as a trophy “of their victory.”—After verbal and newspaper report had passed for some time uncontradicted, the Highland Society held a meeting, at which certain resolutions were passed respecting the battle of Alexandria; and, what is more important, the question respecting who took the standard was inquired into and settled. The proceedings at this meeting were published in the True Briton of the 25th of February, 1802; and, as will be perceived by the remark with which they are introduced, they were evidently published, if not by authority of the Society, at least by that of some active member of it. I must further premise, that the resolutions, which make part of these proceedings, have since been published by order of the Society, and have, so lately as the month of August last, been transmitted, in a circular letter addressed to each member of the Society, by Mr. John Mackenzie, their Treasurer.—I shall now insert these proceedings at length.

HIGHLAND SOCIETY. — Erroneous statements of the proceedings of this Society having appeared in several of the London papers, we are happy in laying before our Readers the following accurate account of what passed, which we have collected from the information of an intelligent member.

The second Monthly Meeting of this Society was held at the Shakespeare Tavern on Wednesday the 17th instant. A favourite air on the pipe, agreeably to ancient Caledonian custom, having announced dinner to be ready, the company entered the Shakespeare Room, when the Right Hon. Lord Macdonald, as the President for this year, took the Chair.—The table was ornamented with various characteristic designs, particularly that of a Highlander seizing the Standard from the officer of the Invincible Legion.—The cloth having been removed, many loyal and patriotic toasts were delivered from the Chair, in the Gaelic tongue, according to the usage of the Society. That of "the King" having been given, the popular air of "God save the King" was sung by Mr. Watlen, in which the following stanza, written by himself, was introduced:

"Ye Sons of Scotia's land,
A great and warlike band, Defend our King: Against all Invincibles, Tyrants and great Consuls,
May you protect our Rights,
God save the King."

The health of the Queen, and the rest of the Royal Family, next followed, after which,—The Duke of Athol said, that he would not interrupt the conviviality and harmony of the evening by entering into the detail of what passed at an open Committee of the Society held on the 13th instant, at which his Grace was called to the Chair; he would merely state the substance of the Resolutions, which were,—
I. That the 42d, or Royal Highland Regiment had, by their heroic conduct in Egypt on the memorable 21st of March, 1801, nobly maintained the hereditary glory of the Caledonian name; and that, as an honorary testimony of the applause and admiration of the society, a Medal is to be struck, with appropriate devices and inscriptions, to perpetuate their highly distinguished and gallant achievement.—II. That one of those medals is to be presented to every officer and soldier now surviving, with the name of each inscribed, and also to the lineal descendant of every one who fell on that day, inscribed with the name of the fallen hero. It may be remarked, that no core of glory is the most striking passion of the human heart. All that the hero asks, in return for his efforts and his toils is, that his fame be celebrated; that the glory of his name be united with the merit of his actions. His soul swells with delight by the habitual consciousness, that the attention of a great number of men is directed towards him. How appropriate then is the measure now proposed. It will be considered in the families of these brave men, as an inestimable inheritance of glory, carrying down the tide of time, to ages yet unknown, the illustrious deed of that day.—

III. That an elegant and characteristic cup, (of the value of 100 guineas), with suitable devices, be presented to the mess of the regiment; that thus, even in their convivial hours, the achievement of the 21st of March may never be forgotten.—IV. That a voluntary subscription be immediately opened among the members of the Society for defraying the expenses that may attend the same; and that each Subscriber of two guineas be entitled to one silver medal; Subscribers of five guineas to two silver medals; and Subscribers of ten guineas and upwards, to three silver medals.—V. That a Committee be appointed to carry the above resolutions into immediate execution, composed of the following noblemen and gentlemen,—His Grace the Duke of Athol, the Right Hon. the Earl of Breadalbane, the Right Hon. C. F. Greville, Sir Hector Munro, K. B. Sir John M. Murray, Bart. Sir John Sinclair, Bart. John Mac Arthur, Esq. Geo. Mackenzie, Esq. John Grant, Esq. and the Secretary.

The noble Duke then observed that the final arrangement of the measures thus proposed, was to be submitted to the consideration of the committee just named, who would, however, be happy to receive the suggestions of others equally well disposed with themselves.—These resolutions having received the unanimous approbation of the society at large, his Grace drank "success to the subscription, and may the Highlanders stand firmly by each other."—The subscription paper was then handed round the table for the signature of the members, all of whom signed.—The Duke of Montrose concurred in any mark of distinction, honour, and regard, which could be conferred on the gallant and meritorious 42d regiment, as no corps in any nation, had more uniformly distinguished itself, or reflected more honour on this country by its arms and its soldierlike conduct, at all times and in all places.—The Hon. C. F. Greville expressed his sincere desire to promote the object on which the society was engaged, and added, that he would use his utmost endeavours to render the execution of the tribute offered, worthy of the donors, and of those for whom it was intended. The 42d Regiment, as being composed of the different Highland clans, and levied in almost all the Highland counties, he thought peculiarly deserving the marked attention of the Highland Society, in which all the principal noblemen and gentlemen of those clans were associated.—Sir Hector Munro (Colonel of the 42d) informed the meeting, with regret, that General Whitelock having ordered an inspection of the 42d regiment at Winchester, whither he himself had gone, the society, on that account, would be deprived of the company of many of the officers who otherwise would have been happy to have attended.—The president then called on Mr. Mac Arthur, a very active and zealous member of the committee, to read the resolutions, together with the names of the subscribers, and the amount of their respective subscriptions, viz. 170 guineas, of which 100 guineas were subscribed by an unknown member.—Mr. Mac Arthur afterwards made some animated observations on the subject, in substance nearly as follows: that medals, in commemorating and transmitting to posterity, some great and illustrious action, such as the one now meant to be perpetuated, are obviously of great importance and utility to historians; and even when the page of history shall be destroyed, they will remain infallible documents, to the latest ages, of the truth of past actions. Medals too, ascertain, with accuracy, the chronology of past events, when other documents have failed, as may be instanced in the histories of Egypt and Syria. They elucidate some parts of the Greek and Roman history more effectually than tradition, or even the written documents of authors. They are no less useful in geography, by describing the relative situation and absolute position of cities or towns, by their vicinity to some noted pillar, river, or mountain, when time shall have swept away such cities or towns, and “leaves not a wreck behind.” Hence Pompey’s Pillar in the middle ground of the proposed design, will mark the scene of action, and its proximity to the ancient city of Alexandria.—With this pillar will be associated, in the mind, the idea that true fame resembles the descent of a pyramid—most minute at first, but swelling to an enormous base, which stands firm on the earth, and defies every tempest, and even the silent waste of time. But to bring the subject home more immediately to the feelings and attention of the society, he observed that there was no other testimony that could be presented, so flattering to the Highland race at large, and that would be so much cherished by the brave remains of the 42d regiment, and their latest posterity, and which would always tend to excite them, were it possible, to more glorious and valorous deeds. When in future times, and, perhaps, of great emergency, it might be necessary to call forth, into the service of their king and country, the descendants of these brave men, they would, in recounting the deeds of their forefathers, view them, probably, in the same light as we do at present, the fabulous feats of ancient chivalry, were the truth of such heroic actions not confirmed by the infallible record and tribute now proposed to be prosecuted. And well, indeed, might the descendants of these hardy sons of the North, exclaim in the energetic language of their sublime bard—“Ye grim ghosts of my fathers, behold my deeds in arms—I may fail,—but I shall be renowned. Where the danger threatens, I rejoice in the storm.”—The elevated sensations which these sentiments produced in the hearers, having, in some degree, subsided, the usual conviviality of the meeting was resumed. Many characteristic Highland toasts were given, preceded, however, by one, “To the memory of the ever to be lamented chief, Abercromby, and the brave men who so gloriously ‘fell in the battle of the 21st of March last.’” Sir John Sinclair, at this moment, arose, and noticed, that a serjeant of the 42d regiment, by name Sinclair, who had, with Major Stirling, taken the Invincible Standard, was attending at the bar below, and would, if called upon, communicate to the society the particular incidents relative to that capture. This he thought essentially necessary for the society to know, as several different accounts had been circulated of that event.—Serjeant Sinclair was accordingly ushered into the room, in the uniform of his regiment, at that moment when the band were performing an appropriate piece of music to the sentiment just delivered from the chair. He, with becoming diffidence and unaffected simplicity of manner, told the particulars subjoined, giving clear and distinct answers to the several questions put to him.

Substance of the Serjeant’s narrative. } That the 42d regiment of Highlanders, forming the right wing of the British army, having the 28th regiment a little on their right, advanced about two hundred yards, were, on the morning of the 21st of March last, and before day-light, attacked by three bodies of French infantry, who, in driving in the pickets, charged and pushed on with great impetuosity. A French corps, bearing the name of “Invincibles,” soon got between the 28th regiment and the 42d, situated as already noticed. Here the battle became warm and furious, and the French had succeeded, before day-light, in turning, or rather throwing the British right-flank into confusion. At day-light, the body of Invincibles, who had a little while before engaged in front, was discovered to have passed beyond the rear of the 42d regiment. This latter corps instantly changed its front, and attacked the Invincibles with great spirit; inasmuch, that, in a very short time, the greatest part were cut to pieces.—The remainder gave way, and were driven to take refuge in an old ruin, or castle, on the right-flank. On being followed up by the Highlanders, the remainder of the Invincible corps called out for mercy, and many of them immediately surrendered.—At this instant Col. Alexander Stewart, of the 42d, who was present, went to the body of the regiment, when Major Stirling, of the same corps, followed by Serjeant Sinclair, went up to the French officer bearing the Invincible Standard, and desired him instantly to deliver it up with his sword. On his refusal, the Major struck him across the head with the flat of his sword, and snatching the standard forcibly from him; the Frenchman then threw his sword on the ground, exclaiming “Vive la République!” Serjeant Sinclair picked up his sword, and Major Stirling delivered to him the Invincible Standard, directing him at the same time to take care of it, and to station himself by a four-pounder field-piece which had been taken by the 42d regiment.—At this post Serjeant Sinclair remained for upwards of one hour, in charge of the colours, and protecting the four-pounder, when a body of French cavalry (about 300) advanced in full charge to the spot; and the officer, in passing, made two cuts at him, the one cut through his bonnet, and the second wounded the serjeant in the neck, after cutting through half of a thick club of hair, near the tie, and his neckcloths, having fortunately two on that day. Stunned by the blow, and thus cut, he lay for some time on the sand in a state of insensibility, and on having recovered he found himself alone, and the French cavalry in confusion, having been repulsed in their attack; being still in possession of the French officer’s sword and his own. He could not, however, on looking round, find either the French Standard or his bonnet. He therefore, in pushing to the left, where the regiment was engaged, met with six soldiers of the French cavalry dismounted, whom he escorted as prisoners to the right of the 42d regiment, where they were taken care of by Dillon’s corps. While conducting these prisoners, he perceived a soldier of General Stewart's foreign corps carrying into the rear the Invincible Standard, which he had picked up while Serjeant Sinclair lay as already noticed.—The left wing of the French, which had been put to the rout, at this time began to rally, when Serjeant Sinclair, finding a wounded soldier's musket, fired at this third attack no less than 12 rounds. He thinks that the right wing of the British army was in action a full hour after this last attack, until the French army was completely defeated.—Being asked by one member of the society in particular, how he escaped with so little injury from such a perilous situation? he modestly replied, "That he had always put his trust in God, and that God alone could have protected him amidst imminent dangers."—Serjeant Sinclair is an athletic young man, about six feet high.—The serjeant having retired amidst the plaudits of the company; the glass, enlivened with the song, went round; and every gentleman departed highly gratified by the proceedings of the evening. It was previously moved and agreed to, that in commemoration of the battle of the 21st of March, the third monthly meeting of the society shall be held on that day annually; but falling this year on a Sunday, it will of course take place on the day following.

These proceedings gave a more decided character to the thing. The honour of taking the standard was now formally and publicly claimed. The carrying of it into the head quarters was, indeed, left to the German regiment; but the capture was fixed as the right and property of the 42d regiment.—The press having thus lent its aid, that of the pencil was next called into the service. A panorama of the battle of Alexandria was made, by Mr. ROBERT KER PORTER, and was, for many months, exhibited to crowds of spectators, in London, whence it was, in October last, removed to Dublin, in order to be shewn to the people of Ireland also. At this exhibition there was an explanatory pamphlet, sold to such of the spectators as chose to purchase it, entitled, "An Historical Sketch of the Battle of Alexandria, and of the Campaign in Egypt," in which historical sketch the name of LUTZ, or that of his regiment, is never once even mentioned, in any way whatever, good, bad, or indifferent. With regard to the Invincible Standard, we find (p. 17 of the pamphlet) the following remarkable passage:—"Our reserve, the Forty-second and Twenty-eighth regiments, finding the enemy in their rear, faced about, charged them with the bayonet, and drove them backward step by step, into the inclosure of the ruin. Six hundred of these Invincibles were already extended upon the ground; the remaining two hundred and fifty called for quarter, and obtained it; not a man of them returned! This was the business of twenty minutes. It was at this time that the Invincible Standard was taken; the palm of numerous honours gained by this legion, and on which was inscribed their victories. It was wrested from the brave possessors after a gallant fight, in which they began assailants and ended defendants; this trophy will ever be honourable to Great-Britain, as won from some of the bravest warriors of the age. Mr. Baldwin's conduct, as before related, entitled him to as much honour as it was possible to bestow; and there could not be a greater than to make him the bearer of Buonaparté's Invincible Standard to London.—This standard of Buonaparté's own invincible brigade, brought home in the Flora, is so much shattered and defaced by service as well as by blood, that the inscriptions recording its victories can with difficulty be traced.—Le Passage de la Piaré, Le Passage du Tagliamento, Le Passage de l'Isounza, and La Prise de Gratz, are tolerably distinct, but scarcely any vestige remains of the inscription relative to the affair of the Pont di Lodi."—But, besides this pamphlet, Mr. ROBERT KER PORTER, the historian and historical painter, handed to his spectators another, containing the outlines of the several parts and figures of his panorama, and also printed explanations of the same. These explanations contained the following passage: "next is a party of the Minorca regiment" (the Queen's German regiment was called Stuart's, or the Minorca regiment) "attacking [with the bayonet] the officer, who held the French standard, now at Lord Hobart's office. This standard was taken by one of their grenadiers.—Below them lies the Frenchman, supposed to have assailed Sir Ralph, bayoneted by a party of the 42d, and a little onwards is a serjeant of that regiment in personal conflict with General Roize, who was killed:—Menou's orders for the attack were found in his pocket.—To the right of these are the French INVINCIBLE Regiment met by a party of the 42d: their colours are, seized by Serjeant Sinclair, who being afterwards cut down, left them somewhere in the field."—Begging the reader to pay good attention to the very material variations in all these different statements, I shall now mention one more fact, and then proceed to the evidence on the other side.—Mr. Watson, Goldsmith and Jeweller, No. 149, near Somerset House in the Strand, had an order (which, I believe, he is now executing) to make the silver cup, mentioned in the resolutions of the Highland Society. In the month of August last, I saw, and examined a drawing of this cup, on which there is to be, or, at least, there was to be, a medallion, representing a Highlander with the Invincible Standard in his hand, and with a French officer lying at his feet.

Such are the statements of the Highlanders and their partizans : such are their pretensions, and such the evidence on which those pretensions are founded. Before I analyse this evidence (which to say the truth, stands in need of no such process), I shall lay before my readers authentic documents to establish the claim of LUTZ, previously stating the circumstances, which led to the obtaining of those documents.

Till I read the narrative of Serjeant Sinclair (who was, it seems, brought forward by Sir John Sinclair), I took it for granted, as most people did, that the Invincible Standard had really been taken by the Highlanders : but, that narrative, so full of the marvellous, and even of self-contradiction, staggered my belief ; and, when I came, soon afterwards, to compare its statements with the statements and representations at the Panorama, I could no longer believe a single word of the story. It then became matter of regret with me, that I knew not where to apply to ascertain the real state of the case ; and to contribute my mite towards restoring the laurel to the brow of its rightful owner. Some months, however, having passed away in discussions on the definitive treaty, the Invincible Standard, together with the poor German soldier who picked it up, while the gallant and modest Serjeant Sinclair lay in a transe, were almost forgotten, when, in the latter end of July, or early in August last, happening to cast my eyes on a news-paper, under the head of "Winchester Assizes," I perceived "that a man named ANTHONY LUTZ, had been arraigned there for murder ; that it appeared his offence was nothing more than man-slaughter, and that, in the course of the proceedings, the Adjutant of the Queen's German regiment, to which corps the said Lutz belonged, appeared as a witness to his character, and, amongst other commendations of him, stated that he was the very man, who took the Invincible Standard from the French, in the battle of Alexandria."—This was the first gleam of real light, which had been thrown upon the subject. Here was not only the declaration, but the declaration of an officer, and, upon oath too, in direct contradiction to the statements of Serjeant Sinclair and Mr. Robert Ker Porter. This was testimony, on which reliance might be placed. It at once revived a desire to do justice to this German (for such I then took him to be), and pointed out the means of doing it. The first step was, to see and converse with the man himself. MR. WINDHAM, who, on all occasions the lover of truth, of justice, and of honour, on all occasions the friend and protector of the loyal and the brave, obtained leave, from MAJOR WILSON, then the commanding officer of the regiment, for LUTZ to come to London from Gosport, where the regiment then lay. He arrived in Pall Mall, on the 10th of August, accompanied by a serjeant, who was intended to serve him as an interpreter, an office, however, which was unnecessary, as LUTZ could converse with us very well in French. He was, of course, dressed in his regimentals, and (a circumstance of which I shall speak more particularly by-and-by) wore a badge upon his left breast, representing the Invincible Standard, as perfectly, at least, as a taylor, with pieces of coarse cloth, could make out such a representation. But, to my great surprize, and, as if for the express purpose of discrediting Mr. Ker Porter's Panorama, instead of a huge German Grenadier with monstrous whiskers on his face, I found a little, young, smooth-faced Frenchman ; well-set, indeed, and of a manly countenance and deportment, but only five feet six inches high, and no more than twenty-five years of age, though he had already been ten years a soldier, and in fourteen different battles.—During his residence in London, I collected, from his own mouth, the following particulars.

Antoine Lutz, is the son of Gregoire Lutz, of Rosheim in Alsace, where Antoine, was born the 5th of July, 1777. Gregoire Lutz was a vineyard labourer, and had, besides this son, two other sons and a daughter. In 1792, the father and family emigrated, with many other persons, into Germany, to avoid the requisitions and other persecutions of the Republicans ; but, some time previous to this emigration, Antoine was taken in requisition, and sent to join the 13th regiment of foot, then serving in the army of the Rhine. He served in this regiment about three months, when he got away and returned to his father's, where he remained seven weeks, at the end of which time a party of French cavalry came after him, and carried him back to the regiment; but he was not punished for his elopement. He remained with the regiment nine months, during which time he was in two battles, at no great distance from Landau. In July, 1794, (the first fair opportunity he had) he escaped from the Republicans, and went over to the army of the Prince of Condé, which then lay at and about Fribourg. He enlisted in the legion de Mirabeau. During the time he was in the army de Condé he was ten times in battle. He was wounded slightly in the knee by a musket ball in the second of these battles. In 1797, the army of Condé being, in part, disbanded, and the soldiers having liberty to choose, amongst the allies, what service they would go to, Lutz chose the Russian service, and joined the Legion of Damas at Lutzcow, in Polish Russia. Here he remained four months, and then was exchanged to the Austrian regiment of Green London, which then lay at Limburgh in Galicia, with a detachment of two companies of which regiment he went into Italy in 1799, joined the army of Kray and Melas near Verona, and, in the first engagement after his joining, was taken by the army of Moreau, at Castel Nuovo. He was sent prisoner to Cremona, where he saw a French soldier who had known him in the republican service. Fearing that this man would inform against him, he escaped from Cremona to Milan, where, with about 225 German soldiers, he was kidnapped by the Spaniards, and conveyed to Genoa; there he was put on board a ship bound to Barcelona, in Old Spain. On the 22d of May, 1799, the ship was taken by an English cutter and carried into Minorca, where, on the 27th of May in the same year, he enlisted into General Stuart's corps, now the Queen's German regiment, which regiment having embarked on the 29th of August, 1800, and having touched successively at Gibraltar, off Cadix, on the coast of Barbary, at Malta, and at Marmora, arrived at Aboukir and landed there on the 8th of March, 1801, but without being engaged with the enemy till the 21st of the same month.—On that memorable day, the Queen's German regiment, the regiment of Dillon, and that of De Rolle, forming what General Hutchinson calls the foreign brigade, and commanded by General Stuart, composed a sort of reserve, the Queen's German regiment being upon the right of the brigade, and nearest to the 42d regiment who led the attack. Soon after the battle began, which was before day-light, the 42d having had to meet the violent and desperate effort of the French, were thrown into confusion,* which induced General Stuart to push on his brigade to their assistance. So complete was the confusion of the 42d, so entirely were they broken and dispersed, that, when the German regiment came up, many of the men of the 42d fell into the ranks of the German regiment, by ones, twos, threes, fours, fives, &c. and actually fought there to the end of the engagement. The Queen's German regiment began by a well-directed and most dreadful fire by files, at the distance of about 40 yards from the front rank of the French infantry; but, as both sides kept advancing, an instant brought them to within musket length of each other. The battle now became extremely furious and bloody; some were firing, others fighting with the bayonet, and others with the butt-ends of their muskets; and this, too, at a time when the morning afforded but just light enough to distinguish one man from another. In about a quarter of an hour after the Queen's German regiment had been at close quarters thus, the French began to retreat, and were pursued by the Germans for about forty or fifty yards, when Gen. Stuart, perceiving the enemy to be covered by their cannon and other artillery, which kept up a constant fire from some heights, towards which the fugitives were approaching, or-

* The forty-second regiment was, indeed, in such a state, that, had not General Stuart marched up his corps (which he actually did without orders) not a man of them would have escaped either death or captivity. Their confusion (not to say defeat) was, and is still, attributed to their "impetuosity and indisciplin." But, be the cause what it might, the effect is well known by every man of the army of Egypt, and is frankly acknowledged even by the officers of the 42d regiment themselves, who, I am well assured, are ready to avow, that, had it not been for General Stuart and his corps, they must inevitably have perished, or been taken, to the last man.—I have always heard the 42d regiment highly praised: were I a general I know of no soldiers I should like better than Scotchmen, they are sober, honest, obedient, hardy, brave, and faithful to their colours: I love and honour the Scottish nation, because I have, wherever I have been, found them, generally speaking, distinguished for their loyalty, and because I have, in almost every stage of my life, experienced from them friendship the most ardent and most sincere:—but, not any, not all, of these reasons, will induce me to withhold one single syllable from the cause of truth and of justice.

dered his men to halt. In this pursuit, however, the irregularity of which every reader may easily conceive, some soldiers of the Queen's German regiment, more active and more eager than the rest, ran rather forward after the enemy. Amongst these was ANTHONY LUTZ, who, having got so close as within about eight paces of the officer who carried the Invincible Standard and who was a few yards behind his flying soldiers, he shot him, with his musket, in the back. The officer fell forward upon his face. LUTZ, perceiving him fall, re-loaded his musket, went and took up the standard, and was about to cut the gold epaulets from the officer's coat, but the tremendous fire from the French batteries, and more particularly the appearance of a body of the enemy's horse, induced him to make off as fast as he could. He had not gone far from the spot where the officer lay, before he found it necessary, in order to avoid a party of French horse, to throw himself into a hollow place, and to lay down as if he were dead, covering the standard, as well as he could, with his body. This party of cavalry having overlooked him, he got up and was hastening towards his regiment, when two French dragoons rode towards him, one of whom shot at him with a pistol, upon which LUTZ threw down the standard, shot at the dragoon, and, missing him, killed his horse. The other dragoon, receiving, as LUTZ thinks, a shot from another quarter, rode off. The wounded horse fell; his rider, whose foot was entangled in the stirrup, begged his life, and presented LUTZ the butt of his pistol, in token of submission. LUTZ spared his life, went and took up the standard, and thus, in the midst of this bloody battle (for the heavy charge of the French cavalry had not yet been made), did he return to his regiment, with the enemy's colours in one hand, and a prisoner of war in the other. Thus he presented himself to his officer, Lieutenant Moncrieff (whom I have since conversed with, and who pledges his honour for the correctness of this part of the statement), offering him the standard—"No, my brave fellow," said the Lieutenant (giving him, at the same time, a dollar, which was all the money he had about him) "the standard is yours, and I will not rob you of it. Go and carry it instantly to head-quarters, and take your prisoner with you."—This order LUTZ obeyed. He lodged his prisoner with an officer of the provost, and carried the standard to the tent of the commander in chief, where he delivered it into the hands of the assistant adjutant-general.

Such is the narrative of LUTZ, as taken down by me, from his own mouth, and as fully confirmed (as far as relates to the bringing in of the standard) by Lieutenant Moncrieff.—I now beg the reader's attention to some documents a little more authentic than the narrative of the modest Serjeant Sinclair, and the no less modest representation of Mr. Ker Porter and his Panorama. I shall begin with an order or two relative to the conduct of the whole of the Foreign Brigade, and particularly that of the Queen's German regiment, which corps, it appears to me, i.e., from first to last, been studiously kept in the back-ground, though it certainly was in the front of the battle.

Extract from the General's Orders of the Army, 24th March, 1801. } The support given to the reserve by Brigadier General Stuart and the foreign brigade was as gallant as it was prompt, and entirely confirmed the fortunate issue of that brilliant day.

Extract from the Brigadier's Orders of General Stuart's Brigade, 25th March, 1801. } It was with the most heart-felt satisfaction that the Brigadier General contemplated in yesterday's general orders the honourable reward offered to the brigade in the flattering testimony of the commander in chief's approbation of their conduct in the action of the 21st. Sincerely and warmly attached to each corps from long and peculiar circumstances of connexion, the Brigadier General acknowledges his own obligations to their exact obedience and discipline, and he cannot but participate with them in the credit of having rendered themselves conspicuous on a day which, independently of the glorious events which have so recently preceded, must ever add lustre to the character of a British army.—Regret for the loss of those brave men who fell, is a tribute due to their worth, and for none can the Brigadier General sympathize more fully with the brigade than for that of his late esteemed and valuable Brigade Major.

The following documents relate solely to LUTZ and the standard, and I beg the reader to peruse them with attention.

Copy of a Certificate, } I do hereby certify, that given by the Adjutant-General ANTHONY LUTZ, private soldier in the regiment of Minorca or Soldier in the Regiment of Stuart, did (on the 21st of March, 1801, during the action between the English and French armies, commanded by Sir Ralph Abercrombie, and the French General in chief Meneu, on the above day, within three miles of Alexandria) take from the ENEMY a standard, which bore several marks of honourable distinction, such as the passage of the Plava and Tagliamento, when under Buonaparte, in Italy, and in the centre of which is a bugle horn within a wreath of laurel—I do also certify that the said ANTHONY LUTZ, brought the standard to the head quarters of his Excellency Sir Ralph Abercrombie, where he delivered it into my hands, when he, at the same time, received from me, by order, a gratuity of 20 dollars, for so signal an instance of good conduct. And I do farther certify, that I forwarded the standard, thus taken by the above Anthony Lutz, to Sir Ralph Abercrombie, then ill of his wounds in his Majesty's ship Foudroyant, that his Excellency received it accordingly, and that it is now in our possession.—Given under my hand at the Adjutant General's quarters, in the camp before Alexandria, this 3d day of April, 1801. (Signed) JNO. McDONALD, Assis. Adjut. General.

Copy of a Regimental Order, in the Regiment of Private, ANTHONY LUTZ, who took the standard Minorca, or Stuart, now called the Queen's German FROM THE ENEMY, ON the 21st last month, is Regiment, 4th April, 1801. directed to wear the representation of a standard (according to the model prescribed by the Brigadier General) as a mark of his good behaviour, on his right arm*—and the Brigadier General notifies that, as soon as the regiment is in an established quarter, he will institute a valuable badge, in a certain proportion per company, to be worn by such men as shall have been proved, upon sufficient testimony, to have distinguished themselves, by acts of valour, or by personal instances of meritorious service; and officers are, on this account, to make note of the conduct of individuals.

Now, here is nothing about picking a standard up! Here are two official documents, positively declaring, that the standard was “taken from the enemy” by LUTZ. Neither the Assistant Adjutant-General nor General Stuart did, indeed, actually see the achievement with his own eyes; but, it was very improbable indeed, that either of them should have so positively ascribed it to LUTZ, and that the latter should, by a public order, have awarded him a badge of honour, without having previously obtained very accurate information on the subject, especially as we see the certificate and the order are dated a fortnight after the standard was taken, which gave ample time for inquiry. As, however, the contrary was barely possible; and as an attempt might still be made to oppose the declaration of the modest Serjeant Sinclair to the records of the army, it was thought necessary to trace the standard back to the time, if possible, when it came into the hands of LUTZ. With this view there was held a regimental committee of inquiry, a copy of the proceedings of which is here subjoined.

COPY OF PROCEEDINGS of a Regimental Committee of Inquiry, held in the Queen's German Regiment at Gosport, on the 28th August, 1802, to examine into the Circumstances which attended the Capture of the Colour, taken in the Action between the English and French Armies, near Alexandria, on the 21st of Murch, 1801.

The Deposition of Cor- } Corporal JOHN SCHMID
poral John Schmid. } declares, that the Regiment had already taken post in front of the enemy, and had suffered considerably from loss of numbers, when he found himself near ANTHONY LUTZ, who, with private WOHLWEND, himself, and several other men, advanced still nearer the enemy, now greatly dispersed by the heavy fire from the redoubt; that LUTZ, notwithstanding the danger of the enterprize, rushed forward, discharging his musket, and, presently afterward, returned, bearing upon his shoulder an infantry standard. A body of cavalry appearing at this moment, LUTZ, in order to secure his prize, threw himself into a hole (or rather hollow place), and lay upon it. Several minutes elapsed, before he saw LUTZ again, when he found him still in possession of the colour, and also of a dismounted dragoon, whom he had made prisoner. He further says, that the smother and confusion of the moment were too great to admit of his distinguishing whether the colour was in the hands of the infantry or the cavalry; but, he positively asserts, that no other than ANTHONY LUTZ captured the standard.

The Deposition of Pri- } Private WOHLWEND cor-vate Wohlwend. } roborates, in every point, the deposition of Corporal Schmid; and, he further declares, that he saw ANTHONY LUTZ, as he was retiring to the ranks of the regiment, closely pursued by two of the enemy's cavalry, one of whose horses he shot and made the rider prisoner: the other horseman escaped.

Separate Examination. } Question.—Did you observe tion of Corporal Schmid. } a serjeant, or any other person, of the 42d regiment, lying wounded near the spot where the colour was taken?—Answer.—None. I saw no red coat whatever (except LUTZ, Wohlwend, myself, and a few others of our reg.) so far in front.—Question.—Did you see the colour in possession of the enemy?—Answer.—Yes: I saw it, though indistinctly, through the smother, wavering over their heads.—Question.—What might have been the space of time, from the moment when you saw the standard in the hands of the enemy, to that when it became the property of LUTZ?—Answer.—Some few minutes, probably seven; but I cannot now be correct to a minute.—Question.—What might have been the interim, between the instant when LUTZ pushed on forward from the place where you were, and that when you saw him with the colour?—Answer.—About one or two minutes.—Question.—What distance do you suppose you might have been from the colour?—Answer.—About forty or fifty paces.—Question.—Do you conceive, that there was time sufficient, from the moment that LUTZ left you, to that when he again appeared to admit of its being taken by any other person previous to the taking of it by LUTZ?—Answer.—No; it was too momentary.—The same question being put to private WOHLWEND, he answered nearly to the same effect, except as to the following point, where his testimony is rather more positive than that of Corporal Schmid:—Question.—Did you see the colour in possession of the enemy?—Answer.—Yes; very distinctly.

This copy of proceedings, which was transmitted to me on the 29th of August last, by MAJOR WILSON, the Commanding Officer of the Regiment, completes the testimony, on the part of LUTZ. Before, however, I proceed with my remarks on the evidence, I must again trespass on the patience of the reader, while I give some account of the conduct of LUTZ, while in London. His having been arraigned for killing a brother soldier naturally excited a fear that he might be a violent and dissipated man; but the whole of his behaviour proved him to be exactly the contrary. He was lodged in a public-house, where, as to expenses, he had carte blanche; yet, I saw him twice every day, and he never had the least appearance of that mortal military vice, intoxication. He several times breakfasted and dined at my house, where every one that saw him was delighted with his good sense and unassuming manners: But I had a still stronger proof of his general good behaviour in the assurances of Captain McKennon and Lieutenant Moncreiff of the same regiment, who both confirmed my observation, that he was not less remarkable for his good-nature and docility, than for his bravery; and, the former gave a strong mark of his approbation, by taking LUTZ with him to a dinner which he gave at an hotel, and by placing him by his side in a front seat at the Hay-Market Theatre. Both these officers assured me, that the unfortunate affair of manslaughter by no means originated in the fault of LUTZ, who, being attacked by a drunken man, pushed him away from him, and he unfortunately fell against a naked bayonet, the point of which was projecting over the side of an empty birth. His death was, indeed, purely accidental; and, had the matter been rightly understood, LUTZ would, most assuredly have been bailed, instead of being kept 27 days, in the first instance, upon bread and water, and two months in jail and in irons! But, it was to this suffering that he owes the restoration of his honours; for, had he never seen Winchester jail, it is very probable, that he never would have seen London, and that London would never have had the honour to see him.—During his stay in town his portrait (of which I shall presently have to speak more particularly), was taken, though very much against his will. As to the story of Serjeant Sinclair, it was not, till after he had been several days in town, that he could be made to consider it as any thing more than a joke on our part; nor could he be convinced of the contrary, till the serjeant who came with him read and translated to him, in German (which is the native language of the lower orders of people in Alsace, and which he understood rather better than he did French) the modest and pious narrative above extracted from the True Briton. When he found a real attempt had been made to rob him of his honour, he expressed his surprize; but, it was not till he went to Lord Hobart's office, to look at the standard, that he discovered any thing like resentment on the subject. The instant it was brought into the room all the ideas of the moment when he took it, seemed to rush into his mind; he snatched hold of the staff, and, stamping it upon the floor, while his face reddened with anger, "now," said he, in German, "let that serjeant come, and claim this standard if he dares!"—He had, before he saw the colour, described every part of it very accurately, and he now showed us the large hole near the middle, which he had told us was made by a bomb shell, after he took it, and while it lay on the ground during his capture of the French dragoon.—After staying in town from the 10th to the 25th of August, he returned to his regiment, where he has since, I understand, been promoted to the rank of corporal, a promotion which he had declined to accept of before, and which now, I trust, is only the precursor of something much more advantageous and distinguished.

It was my intention, now to enter into an analysis of the statements on both sides, as to the claim with respect to the taking of the standard; but, really, upon a review of the whole of the evidence, that on the side of the Highlanders (if, in truth, it can be called evidence) bears, on the very face of it, such striking marks of error (to give it no harsher term); it contains such palpable self-contradictions, that it seems almost an insult to my readers to trouble them with any remarks on it. I cannot, however, refrain from just pointing out a few of its most prominent features.

I will, for a moment, suppose it possible, that MAJOR STIRLING (of whom, by the bye, we have heard nothing directly,) after having taken an Invincible Standard, should not only give it into the charge of another, but that that other should be no more than a non-commissioned officer, and that he should then send that non-commissioned officer, with the standard in his hand, to protect a four pounder; I will further suppose it possible, that Serjeant Sinclair might be "cut down," as Mr. Ker Porter calls it, that he thus lost the standard, that he afterwards rose up again, that he met with the six

French soldiers whom he conducted to the right of the forty second regiment, and there put them in charge of Dillon's corps; I will suppose it possible, that the serjeant found a musket and fired fifteen rounds after his transe; but, willing as I am to suppose even almost impossibilities, I cannot suppose, that the serjeant, though endued, perhaps, with the second sight, could, while he lay "in a state of insensibility," see what it was that "picked up" the standard.—Mr. Ker Porter tells the world, in his "Historical Sketch," that the "Invincible Standard, brought home by Mr. Baldwin," was taken by the forty second regiment.—Now, observe well how this agrees with his panorama picture, as described by himself. "Next" (says he, in the true showman like style), "Next is a party of the Minorca regiment attacking the officer who held the French standard, now at Lord Hobart's; it was taken by one of their grenadiers—Below them, lies the Frenchman supposed to have assailed Sir Ralph, bayonnetted by a party of the 423, and a little onwards is a serjeant of that regiment in personal conflict with General Roize,* who was killed:—Menou's orders for the attack were found in his pocket.—To the right of these are the French Invincible regiment, met by a party of the 42d; their colours are seized by Serjeant Sinclair, who being afterwards cut down, left them somewhere in the field."—So! here are two standards! And, which is still more surprizing, the standard which Mr. Porter himself tells us (in his history) was the "Invincible Standard, brought home by Mr. Baldwin," is now left somewhere in the field, and the standard, "now at Lord Hobart's," is merely a "French standard," and nothing more. But, as if the spirit of contradiction itself had possessed Mr. Ker Porter, he says, that the

Invincible standard had on it Le passage de la Piave, Le passage du Tagliamento, &c. and it perversely happens, that these very words are upon "the French standard, now at Lord Hobart's!"—The fact is, that the palpable disagreement between Mr. Ker Porter's pen and his pencil arises from the circumstance of their having been employed upon the same subject at different times. When the historical sketch was written, there was no fear at all of detection; but, before the picture was finished, there was an ugly story got abroad about a German soldier having brought in a standard; and, as it seemed to be agreed, on all hands, that there was but one brought home to England, Mr. Porter was resolved, that, since that one was not taken by the Highlanders, it should not be the Invincible standard. Hence the invention of two standards. Unfortunately, however, for the veracity both of Mr. Porter's writings and his paintings, that modest and pious youth Serjeant Sinclair declares, that the standard which was brought in by the German soldier was the very same that was taken by MAJ. STIRLING, and which he [the serjeant] lost when he was cut down by the French cavalry! But, then, which to believe, Mr. Porter or the serjeant? The serjeant says, that after being knocked down and stunned, and having got up again, and taken six Frenchmen prisoners, "he perceived a soldier of Gen. Stuart's foreign corps, carrying into the rear the Invincible standard, which he [the soldier] had picked up, while Serjeant Sinclair lay in a state of insensibility." Now, if the serjeant was in a state of insensibility, how could he see, or hear, what was doing the while? Did he, like Hudibras, send his senses out upon the scout; and did they, upon their return, inform him that a foreigner had been there and had picked up the standard? Or did he swoon, as a negro sleeps, with one eye at a time? The truth is, that this part of the serjeant's narrative places him in a most cruel dilemma, and furnishes strong grounds to fear, that if he did really think of his Maker during the battle of Alexandria, he completely forgot Him at the Shakespear Tavern:—the serjeant either saw the standard "picked up," or he did not see it picked up; if he did see it, how comes it that he, who was so vigorous as to fire fifteen rounds and take six prisoners afterwards, did not prevent another from carrying off his inestimable prize? And, if he did not see it, he has told an absolute and shameful falsehood, which has been promulgated under the apparent authority of

* This, too, is a false representation. General Roize was not hewed down as represented in the picture, but was shot, and not by a Highlander, but by Corporal Karabum of the Queen's German Regiment. The corporal, who was a native of Mentz, and who has since been discharged, took a gold watch out of Roize's pocket, and brought it in, together with a part of the embroidered collar and facing of his coat. The gold watch the corporal sold for one hundred and twelve dollars, with which money he went home to Germany, after the regiment came to England.—My authority for this statement is that of the Serjeant (acting Serjeant Major,) who came to London with Lutz, and who was astonished at the tale of Mr. Robert Ker Porter. Alas! little did he know of the secret history of Panoramas!

the Highland Society. *—One point more and I have done.—It has been stated as a possible case, as a last shift, that the standard might be first taken by the 42d regiment, then retaken by the enemy, and afterwards taken by LUTZ. On this case I shall only observe; that, if the 42d regiment should think proper to boast of having had the standard taken from them, LUTZ can have no great objection to have it thought, that he took the standard from those who took it from the 42d regiment.†

Turning, with disgust, from this tissue of misrepresentations, mistatements, contradictions, absurdities, and, I must add, falsehoods, with what pleasure does the mind contemplate the plain and honest narrative of LUTZ, supported, in every point, by authenticated documents! We see the man with the badge of honour, the representation of the standard, on his breast: we find that he has worn this

* So positive, so daring, has this proceeding been, that almost the whole nation has been deceived by it, not excepting even some of those who were in the battle. SIR ROBERT WILSON had, in the first edition of his valuable work (or in some of the copies at least) been misled, in some degree, by the accounts which had been palmed upon the Highland Society and upon the public; but, I have the satisfaction to know, that Sir Robert, though he did not obtain the name of LUTZ time enough for insertion in his work, is now about to do him ample justice, by giving a detail of his achievement in a new edition of a book which will certainly descend to posterity.

† I here wish to declare, in the most positive and explicit terms, that I have no intention to insinuate, that MAJOR STIRLING, or any of the Officers of the 42d regiment, who were in Egypt, have lent their aid in favouring the imposition of Serjeant Sinclair and Mr. Ker Porter; on the contrary, I am well assured, that they have not; but, at the same time, I must observe, that, if they were informed of the serjeant's publicly claiming the honour in the name of the regiment or officers of the regiment, they should instantly have disclaimed it in the same public manner; and which, indeed, they would, perhaps, have done before now, had they been acquainted with the mode of effecting such a purpose.—It is hardly necessary for me to say, that, to the Highland Society in a body, I cannot impute any intentional misrepresentation. Of the SINCLAIRS (the modest Serjeant and his patron Sir John) I shall leave the reader to form his own opinion, expressing, however, my sincere hope, and, indeed, my firm reliance, that, in this project in behalf of his namesake, Sir John will, finally, meet with no better success than, when, with modesty unparalleled, he called upon the people of England not only publicly to venerate Washington, but to contribute towards a fund for the raising of a monument to his memory, even in the dominions of their Sovereign, from whom WASHINGTON had snatched, what was called "the most precious jewel of his crown."

badge ever since the date of the achievement, and by a public order of his commanding officer: to prove that this order was not given without cause, we have next the certificate of the Adjutant General: to prove that the Adjutant General was not deceived, we have the testimony of Lieut. Moncrieff, to whom LUTZ brought the standard from the enemy; and, to prove that he took it from the enemy, we have the testimony of two men, on their oaths, who saw it in their hands, who saw LUTZ run into the smoke after them, and, in the space of two minutes, came out of that smoke in possession of the symbol of victory. In short, no case was ever more fairly made out: no fact was ever more fully and uncontrovertibly proved: no judge, though in the righteous, the scrupulous, the merciful courts of England, ever required clearer evidence whereon to ground a decision, even of death.

Having thus established the exclusive claim of LUTZ to the honour of taking the Invincible Standard, I shall say but a very few words as to the reward of that gallant, and, even in a national point of view, most meritorious and important achievement. Of the claims, which the hero has on the sovereign and the country that he serves, the first is, that his deeds be ascribed to himself and not to another. This, which is, in truth, no more than a mere demand of right, LUTZ is, I trust, now in a fair way of obtaining. But the reward of valour does not stop here: it demands rank and precedence, with a proportionate share of the comforts and pleasures of life: justice, because she watches over the weak and the timid, does not, for that reason, turn her back upon the stout and the brave. In considering, therefore, what ought to be done, in the present instance, a narrative, such as I have here attempted, was determined on, not only as absolutely necessary to do away the mistatements already abroad, and as a means of restoring the laurel to the brow of LUTZ, but also as a foundation whereon to proceed in any other endeavours that might be made in his behalf. Leaving to the justice of his Royal Highness the commander in chief (when he came to be fully informed of all the circumstances of the case) to award such honours as he might think proper, it was thought, that, in the mean time, some method ought to be adopted for giving the noblemen and gentlemen of the kingdom an opportunity of contributing towards a pecuniary reward. A subscription, the last resource of misfortune, imprudence, and decayed patriotism, was thought an unsuitable expedient; the man who took the Invincible Standard ought never to appeal to the charity of England. After some deliberation as to the most proper means to be employed, an engraved portrait of Lutz to be sold at a guinea, was resolved on, as at once calculated to commemorate his heroic deed, and to procure him a handsome sum, without wounding those sentiments, which he must, and which he does entertain.—The portrait was executed accordingly. It is a full length. Lutz is dressed in the regimentals of the Queen's German regiment, having the badge upon his breast, and the standard in his hand. A face of a bastion is to his left, while, behind him and to his right, the distant spires of Alexandria terminate the view. The likeness is exact; the print is in colours, and is in size nine inches by twelve. It is now ready for sale, at No. 18, Pall-Mall.—What importance has been attached to the taking of the Invincible Standard, how highly we have prized this trophy of victory, is well known to this nation and to the world: indeed, it is the great pledge of our military fame: it is the first on which has turned every eulogium, of every sort, respecting the Egyptian campaign. "We fairly defeated them," says the historian, "and the proof is, we took their 'Invincible Standard.'" This standard was sent to Sir Ralph Abercrombie to cheer him in his last awful moments: it is to be placed on his grand and costly tomb, voted by a grateful Parliament: and, shall the gallant Lutz, shall the man who took this standard, be rewarded with a worsted shoulder-knot, and two-pence a day added to his pay? Shall he, because he is a foreigner, waste his life in penury and obscurity, and finally, perhaps, drop into the grave from the wards of an hospital or a poor-house? Forbid it justice! Forbid it British justice and British honour!

TO THE EDITOR.

Boston (America), Oct. 30, 1802.

SIR,—You ask me what my countrymen think of the situation of Europe. Read with attention the following article, which I have extracted from the PALLADIUM [a Boston newspaper], and be assured, that it contains the political sentiments of all well-informed Americans. This article will also enable your readers (if you should republish it) to judge, whether, as far as relates to the information and talents of newspaper politicians, we are so far, as some of your countrymen seem to think us, behind the people, from whom we are descended.

The war of arms is at an end: the war of the custom-house has commenced between France and England. More than ever their policy relates to the concerns of other powers; and the consequences of their competition will shew, that the same act, which has given peace to themselves has scattered the seeds of discord among their neighbours. To lessen the commerce of England will be to lessen her power. Buonaparté will, therefore, try all the means that his policy can employ to make his rival defenceless before he forces her to be hostile.

It is not clear that the people of England were willing any longer to prosecute the war; but it is now unquestionably clear, that it was their great ultimate interest to pursue it. Peace has brought with it few new resources, it will soon dry up those which spring up with a state of war: for war makes many of its own means. Peace must shortly divide the commerce that war gave to her entire. Her enemies, who lately did not own a ship, are now England's competitors. Their business was to destroy—now it will be to produce and fabricate. They will want less; they will supply more. They will diminish her means and they will recruit their own. England looks at the peace with mingled shame and dread. Shame, because she is already degraded in the eyes of strangers*, if not in her own. With dread, because France has gained new power, and shews more than her old ambition.

It is too much to say, that Mr. Pitt ought to have proceeded with the war, if he understood the position of things. He might understand it, but it is alleged, and perhaps it is true, that the British nation preferred present ease, which they expected, and have failed of realising by peace, to the glory, the burdens and the distant ultimate security of war. We Americans choose to say, and we are vain-glorious enough to believe, that the people are not counted for any thing any where except in America. The truth is, the voice of the nation, when it conveys its wisdom or its deliberate mistakes, is more sure to penetrate audibly and with effect the recesses of St. James's than those of Monticello*. The British nation was, then, perhaps, weary of the war, and therefore it ended. Peace will present an aspect of danger, which the nations courage will not be summoned to face. The only question is; whether, on viewing its formidable consequences, England will be able to surmount or elude them. A nice problem it is. America is highly interested in its favorable solution.

* We have frequently said this, and we have as frequently been abused for it. It has frequently been asserted in Parliament, and as frequently been contradicted by the ministers and their supporters. But here we have the full proof of the fact. This article is extracted from a paper published in a foreign country. In a country at peace and in amity with us; and the article is written by a person evidently friendly to England.—The fact is, that the Palladium is the production of the joint talents of several very eminent public men in the state of Massachusetts; so that, we may venture to rely upon the sentiment, to which we here refer, as being the fixed and settled sentiment of foreigners with respect to our degradation.—Note of the Editor.

When we behold France, with a power so vast as to enable her to undertake almost every thing, and a spirit still more romantic and vast to prompt her to atchieve impossibilities, we are led to think of a new Roman Empire, under which the civilized world is first to bleed, and then to sweat in chains. We see again Rome, after the first punic war; and alas! we see Europe without a Hannibal, unless we look for him in England's Nelson or Smith. The little states are nothing; they are slaves, paid by the name of independence, for hewing wood and drawing water. The King of Prussia, though powerful, is no Philip, he is only an Attalus or Eumenes, under France. Spain has nothing of an independent monarchy but the title. As to Holland, Switzerland, and the Cisalpine or Italian republics, they are republics during pleasure; they are sovereign, as Atriarathes and Prusias were, tame then for subjection. They are new recruits for the French republic, committed first to the drill serjeant before they are turned into the ranks. They will be cudgelled if they prove refractory. They will be made to obey like negroes, and yet to say and to swear, on occasion, that they are sovereign and independent, as may best suit the ambitious policy of France. Old Rome was too cautious and too much in earnest in her plan to make a conquered people her subjects at once. She gave them a king, or made a pretty little snug independent republic for them, till every man was dead and gone, who was born and educated in independence. Her bitter drugs were all given in honey. So it is with France. Europe has no longer any minor powers. They are swallowed up by France. Her establishment in Louisiana, which, though certain, is delayed only to choose the moment when it will be most fatal to us, will convince even America that distance is no protection. The plagues of Egypt will be in our bosoms, and in our porridge pots. Our pity or our folly has made us weep or wonder at the events of Europe. We have had our spasm, when we saw distress and disease abroad. We are doomed by fate to scratch with a mortal leprosy of our own. Gehazi, by accepting bribes, is smitten with Naaman's pestilence. Our government has little force, and since the deplorable 5th of March, 1801, less than ever, to defend Kentucky and Tennessee from the arms of France.* Soon or late they will fall victims to her arts. In spirit and policy we are Dutchmen: we are to lose our honour and our safety, and the economical statesmen, whom the wrath of Heaven has placed at our head, will enquire what are their worth in shillings. Every penny of their folly will cost a pound.

But, say Job's comforters, France is a republic, and of course a sister republic will not only find friendship but security in the aggrandizement of France. Miserable comforters are all these! Before this boasted revolution Europe had many free republics. Alas! they are no more! France, proclaiming war against palaces, has waged it against commonwealths. Switzerland, Holland, Geneva, Venice, Lucca, Genoa are gone, and the wretched Batavian, Helvetian and Italian republics, are but the faint images, the spectres that haunt the sepulchres where they rot. So far has France been from paying exclusive regard to republics, that she has considered them not as associates, but as victims. Venice she sold to the Emperor, Holland she taxed openly for her own wants, till she drove her rich men into banishment. She "ransomed" Dutch liberty," with a vengeance, "from the hands of the opulent." From Switzerland she drained her youth to be food for gun-powder. This is not all, but the king of Etruria is tricked out in purple robes, like a play-house monarch, to tread the stage in mock dignity. The proud Spaniard finds for France gold and dollars, and for that proof of "civism" he is treated as head servant in Buonaparté's kitchen. So that to treat kings with mock favour, and to depress, plunder, and subjugate republics is the acknowledged and experienced consequence of French domination.

Let the ignorant hirelings of France prattle about the cause of liberty! Let them repeat the second million of times the silly falsehood, that we triumph with France. Her triumphs are detestable. A voice seems to issue from the tombs of the fallen republics for our warning. Our citizens are warned though our government is not, and they would be armed. France or fate did not ordain that we should be disarmed and defenceless.

TO THE BISHOP OF LONDON.

MY LORD,—A Pocket Book for the year ensuing was put, the other day, into my hands which its compositor is pleased to entitle the Christian Ladies Pocket Book. The first specimen of his Christianity is most grossly libelling your lordship, and that too in the manner best calculated to bring your sacred office into contempt.—Prenexed to it there is a front-piece, consisting of four portraits, of which your lordships is the first; your associates being Dr. Rees, in doctrine, an Arian and in discipline an Independent, Dr. Rippon, an Anabaptist teacher, and Mr. Jay, the Methodist preacher at Bath. And an union of four hands in the center intimates, that yourself, and these your companions, "give the right hand of fellowship" to each other "as fellow-labourers in the "Gospel of Christ." There cannot be, I am persuaded, a more groundless calumny than that here insinuated—or one, from which your lordship has less to apprehend amongst men of reflection and discernment, and whatever personal injury you might thereby sustain, I know you would rather pray for, than punish the offender, nor considered merely as a private wrong, should I attempt to discourage your forbearance. But your lordship is not here individually interested. You are the visible head of an integral part of our catholic body, and a blow aimed at you, is equally injurious to that.—You are not concerned for yourself alone, but are most solemnly pledged to take especial care, "ne ecclesie detrimentum capiat."—Now, though, as I said before, men of reflection and discernment will be in no danger of delusion from this contemptible artifice; but will know the volves notwithstanding their pretended cordiality with "the shepherd of the sheep";—yet by far the greater part of mankind come not under this description. They judge either according to the sight of their eyes, or the hearing of their ears; having neither the ability nor the inclination to pursue that tedious process of accurate investigation which is requisite to the attaining to a right judgment in any thing. To steal away the hearts of these it is, that this monstrous combination is formed—this "bos, fur, sus, atque sacerdos." And greatly do I fear that unless some prompt and vigorous measures be adopted to expose the treachery, it will do the most extensive mischief; and that your lordship will thus be made the instrument of betraying those "into the snare of the Devil," who, "having a zeal for God but not according to knowledge," look up to you for guidance "in the way which leadeth "unto life," and therefore seem to be objects claiming a more than ordinary portion of your vigilance and solicitude.—Your lordship is venerated, and deservedly venerated, by many who know you only by name, but who do not know that you consider the far greater part of dissenting ministers as "false apostles, as deceitful "workers, who have transformed themselves into apostles of Christ," that they may do more effectually the tempter's work. They know not that these people are rendering different ways that seamless coat which the Roman soldiers could not find it in their hearts to divide—that though at variance amongst themselves, what is the truth of the Gospel, they have made the pulling down of that pure and reformed part of the church of Christ, established in these dominions, a common cause in which they most cordially unite, and have most audaciously represented your lordship as the patron of their undertaking, that so they may lull the unwary to sleep till they have effected their design.—The contrivance, I acknowledge, appears at first sight too despicable to deserve your lordship's attention; but I need not call upon you (who are so accurate an observer of this eventful period, and who knows as well the causes producing, as the effects which in these last twelve years have been produced). not to let this seeming insignificance deceive you. I need not call upon you to "behold how great a matter a little fire hath kindled," nor need I expatiate upon the very weighty importance of that admonition of the Apostle, "to mind not high things, but "to condescend to men of low estate." Your lordship is deeply read in the writings of Barruel, and from thence, doubtless, you are thoroughly furnished with most impressive illustrations of those texts to which I have presumed to solicit your attention. — Let me entreat you, then, my lord, to exert on this occasion that wholesome authority with which you are invested, and since, upon the unhumanized affections of these reformers, lenity has had the effect rather of a corrosive, than an emolient application, to try what can now be done by the terrors of the law. If you cannot heal the distempered member, cut it off, my lord, ere the infection spreads — it may be severe discipline to the amputated limb, but 'tis mercy to every other part of the body. — That was a wise maxim though so wickedly misapplied, 'tis good that one man die for the people, and that the whole nation perish not. — But if your mild disposition is so averse to rigorous measures that you cannot persuade yourself, even on those most maliciously wicked, to inflict temporal penalties, at least smite them, my lord, with your own proper sword. I do not ask you to engage in the hopeless task either of convincing or converting these gainsayers, but for Christ's, and for his churches sake, refute them. — Publish it to those committed to your care, and now wandering about in the mountains of Gervyzim, that they are without the fold of which you are the overseer — that they have fled from those "green pastures" to which you would lead them, and are "in a barren and dry land where no water is." — That if they see you represented as indifferently attached to our primitive establishment and to the opinions of Drs. Rees, Rippon, and Mr. Jay, or any other of the ignes fatui which the folly of the present age is daily producing, and as a yoke-fellow with them, they may be assured, that "an enemy hath done this," — that as St. Paul predicted "even amongst ourselves men have "risen up speaking perverse things to "draw away disciples after them," and that, therefore, they are not to be lulled thereby into security, but as the Apostle admonishes "to watch," to scrutinize narrowly the pretensions of all who "come "to them in sheep's clothing," and to judge of them not by their professions but by their fruits. — I need not remind your lordship, of the precedent you have before you in your venerable predecessor Bishop Gibson, who, to put to silence the rebuke and blasphemy with which, in his days the church was assaulted, pursued precisely the same method which I have ventured to suggest. I need not, I say, remind your lordship of his example, for you have given public testimony how entirely it has your approbation, by recommending it so strongly as you do, to those whom you ordain. — I do not take upon me to affirm that a similar expedient would now be equally productive of success, but surely it is worth the while to put it to the trial. "What if we cannot turn the stream" (says Bishop Hall) "writing of the iniquity of his time") "yet we must swim against it, "even without conquest; 'tis glorious to "have resisted." and though you should not turn one sinner from the error of his way, yet with the guide to the church, might you sum up your fruitless efforts with this consolatory conclusion: liberavimus animas nostras. With much respect and veneration, I remain your lordship's most dutiful son and servant,

"Mr. Sheridan's fine Speech?"

We refer here to a publication, in the newspaper called the Morning Post, purporting to be a speech delivered by Mr. Sheridan, on the 8th instant. That this speech has some just sentiment, happy description, and apt quotation; that, in short, it is "very fine," is already acknowledged; and, that many parts of it, at least, are, as Sir Archy Macsarcasm says, "varé nero," will, we think, not admit of a doubt. Far be it from us to say this with a view of detracting from the merit of the performance; for, as we are now about to show, we ourselves are amongst the happy mortals, whose sentiments, and, in some instances, whose very expressions, this profound politician has condescended to verify, if not to adopt.

FROM MR. SHERIDAN'S SPEECH, DEC. 8. FROM OTHER PUBLICATIONS.

I do find a disposition in some gentlemen to rebuke any man who shall deliver any opinion with respect to the First Consul of France. * * *

But, as the question of peace or war is now at an end, and, as the old opposition do not stand committed on those other great objects of

But, says the hon. gentleman, we have no right to make use of invectives against the First Consul of France. I will abstain if I can; I say if I can, because I feel that even a simple narrative may be construed into invective. * * * But it has been said, that it is possible he may mean nothing more than rivalry of commerce. Happy, Sir, shall I be if such an idea enter into his head at all, much more if it form part of his plans. But I confess I cannot see that it does. * *

* * I perfectly agree with my hon. friend, that war ought to be avoided, though he does not agree with me on the means best calculated to produce that effect. From any opinion he may express, I never differ but with the greatest reluctance. For him my affection, my esteem, and my attachment are unbounded, and they will end only with my life.

He [Buonaparte] has discovered that we all belong to the Western family. Sir, I confess I feel a sentiment of deep indignation, when I hear (I take it from report) that this scrap of nonsense was uttered to one of the most enlightened of the human race.—To this family party I do not wish to belong.—He may invite persons if he please, to dinner, and, like Lord Peter, say, that this tough crust is excellent mutton. He may toss a sceptre to the King of Etruria to play with, and keep a rod to scourge him in the corner; he may have thought at first his Cisalpine Republic a fine growing child, and may have found it a ricketty bantling.

My humble apprehension is, that, though in the tablet and volume of his mind there may be some marginal note about cashiering the public consideration, which will hereafter present themselves, there are five modes of conduct, which lie open to their choice; 1. they may act in a detached body, as they do at present; 2. as the allies of some other party; 3. as neutrals; 4. they may set up a sort of armed neutrality; 5. they may divide, and in the quality of mercenaries, be opposed to each other, without any diminution of that mutual regard, which the virtuous Swiss are said to entertain, at the very moment when they are plunging the bayonet into each others' breasts. (REGISTER, Vol. I. p. 762-3).

Really! I did not know this before. I have read falsehood and nonsense enough under the title of speeches of Mr. Fox, but never did I know, till informed of it by the First Consul, that you had maintained, in those speeches, that the English, French, Germans, Italians, &c. (mind the et cetera) made but one family, and all lived under the same civil code. If this be so, however, it is pretty evident, that Buonaparte is at the head of all this family; France is the home of it, and England like Italy, is no more than a branch, or colony, which may be governed by a vice-president. (REGISTER, Vol. II. p. 343.)

France, from the beginning of her revolution to this moment, has never, in any one instance, let slip an opportunity of manifest-

King of Etruria; yet, that the whole text is occupied with the destruction of this country. This is the first vision that breaks upon him through the gleam of the morning—this is his last prayer at night to whatever deity he addresses it, whether to Jupiter, or to Mahomet; to the Goddess of Battles, or to the Goddess of Reason.

He says he is an instrument in the hands of providence to restore Switzerland to happiness, and to elevate Italy to splendour and importance. Sir, I think he is an instrument in the hands of providence to make the English love their constitution the better; to cling to it with more fondness; to hang round it with truer tenderness. I believe too, Sir, that he is an instrument in the hands of providence, to make us more liberal in our political differences, and to render us determined with one hand and heart to oppose any aggressions that may be made upon us. * * * I add, resistance, prompt, resolute, determined resistance to the first aggression be the consequences what they may.

ing, that one great use, that she means to make of her political power, is, to retrench, if not destroy, the commerce of England. From the savage ravings of Marat and his goary crew down to the cool and malignant speeches of the consular orators, this object has constantly been the favourite theme. The several sects as well as the several individual tyrants, whether levellers, democrats, or federalists; whether atheists, protestants, or catholics; however they may have differed as to any and to all other points, they have all been perfectly of one mind with respect to the necessity, and the justice of annihilating this country. (REGISTER, Vol. II. p. 455.)—Buonaparte is much more afraid of this press than he is of the Pope, or of the Goddess of Reason, or even of Mahomet. (REGISTER, Vol. I. p. 317).

For our parts, we most heartily rejoice at seeing Buonaparte assume the style and authority, if not the title even, of an Emperor or a King; for, from the moment he assumes any thing common to the lawful monarchs of the earth, from that moment this nation is united against him. The royalist subjects of our sovereign are ever ready to oppose the power of France, be her ruler who he may; but, there is another description of his subjects, in whose discriminating minds, in whose philanthropic breasts, there lives no hostility except to the persons and families of monarchs; they, gentle souls, would never make war upon their "fellow" "men," never would they shed a drop of blood that issued not through a royal vestment, never cut off a head unencircled by a crown. They would give up honours and power; they would yield commerce and colonies; they would surrender England itself, rather than imbrue their hands in the blood of their fellow creatures; but let a king, or any thing like a king, attempt to encroach upon us, and they will exterminate the whole human race rather than cede him a rock, which the waves may have severed from one of our islands. (REGISTER Vol. I. p. 605.)

It was by an union of valour and of industry, that we are arrived at the zenith of our greatness: what has been so gained, must so be maintained: the hope of "the coward shall perish;" if we yield up the sword, the shuttle shall be wrenched from our hands. (REGISTER, Vol. I. p. 190.) —Not our humiliation, not our impoverishment, but our political destruction, is what she seeks. (REGISTER, Vol. 2. p. 536.)

If, on the one hand, the French behold themselves placed under the despotic sway of a low-bred foreigner, they will, on the other, see, with no small gratification, that the advancement of the foreigner extends the power and predominance of their country. National glory is the ruling passion in every Frenchman's breast: so that the French are but masters of the world, they care but very little whose slaves they themselves are. (REGISTER, Vol. I. p. 604.)

And, is our country become so poor, so very poor as to possess no other man fit for a minister but Mr. Pitt? "When could they say, 'now, that talked of Rome, that her wide walls encompassed but one man.' If, however, it be really true, that England is so shamefully barren of talents, of wisdom, and of virtue, she neither can nor ought to remain an independant nation. (PORCUPINE NEWSPAPER, Mar. 1801.) —As to the other point [alluding to the words of Sir Henry Mildmay in the debate of the 8th of May last], what man, with a loyal heart in his bosom, can brook the assertion, that his Majesty's crown has ever depended upon the breath of a subject? (REGISTER, Vol. I. p. 634.)

I certainly look to the rejoicings at the peace, as an unmanly and irrational exultation.

Are the circumstances of this peace the natural signs for rejoicing? Are they such as have been wont to justify our exultations upon former occasions? They strike me in a directly contrary point of view; and, when I am called upon to rejoice, before I put on my wedding suit, I shall first inquire, whether I am called upon to celebrate a marriage or a funeral. When I am desired to illuminate, I shall first endeavour to learn, whether it is to light me in a feast, or a sepulchre. (WINDHAM'S Speech, 29 Oct. 1801.)

Russia, if not in his power, is at least in his influence—Prussia is at his beck—Italy is his vassal—Holland is in his grasp—Spain at his nod—Turkey in his toils—Portugal at his foot.

But what may be the technical description of the treaty, is, comparatively, of little importance. It is the result that is material, and the extent of power and territory, now, by whatever means, actually remaining in the hands of France. The enumeration of this, liable indeed in part to be disputed, but upon the whole sufficiently correct, may be made as follows:—In Europe.—France possesses the whole of the Continent, with the exception of Russia and Austria. If it be said, that parts of Germany, and the Northern courts of Denmark and Sweden are not fairly described as being immediately under the controul of France; we must balance this consideration by remarking, the influence which France possesses in these governments, and the commanding position which she occupies with respect to Austria,

We ought to meet it [the hostility of France] with a conviction of the truth of this assertion, that the country which has achieved such greatness, has no retreat in littleness; that if we could be content to abandon every thing, we should find no safety in poverty, no security in abject submission.

The Bourbons were ambitious, but it was not so necessary for them to feed their subjects with the spoils and plunder of war; they had the attachment of a long established family applied to them; they had the effect and advantage of hereditary succession. But I see in the very situation and composition of the power of Buonaparté a physical necessity for him to go on in this barter with his subjects, and to promise to make them the masters of the world if they will consent to be his slaves.

Mr. Pitt the only man to save the country! No single man can save a country. If a nation depends only upon one man, it cannot, and, I will add, it does not deserve to be saved.

I mark him taking positions calculated to destroy our commerce, but I do not find him doing any thing for the mutual benefit of the trade of the two countries. I see him anxious to take possession of Louisiana, and to use the ports of St. Domingo to carry our West-India and Jamaica trade. I cannot conceive a possible case, in which such positions might be taken as to force us to surrender our commerce without a stroke. An ignorant observer may see two armies, and may say there is no war, because there is no battle; yet one of them may make such movements as to compel the other to surrender without striking a blow.

But it is unreasonable to think that the French wish to meddle with us! Why, I protest I cannot explain. If, as has been said, they have felt our arms, they who have been everywhere else successful, cannot but view the only power whose arms they have felt with feelings of warm resentment, and with sentiments of mortified pride. Look at the map of Europe and see nothing but France. It is in our power to measure her territory, to reckon her population, but it is scarcely within the grasp of any man's mind to measure the ambition of Buonaparté. Why, when all Europe bows down before him—why, when he has subdued the whole continent, he should feel such great respect for us, I am at a loss to discover. If then it be by the possession of Switzerland and Mantua, and those countries which have been considered always, and twice in the course of the present war, have proved to be the direct inlet into the heart of her dominions. (WINDHAM'S SPEECH, Register, Vol. II. 1155-6.)

Her establishments will accumulate round us, till we shall be lost and buried in them: her power will grow over us, till like the figures in some of Ovid's Metamorphoses, we shall find all our faculties of life and motion gradually failing and deserting us:

Mollia cinguntur tenui præcordia libro.

If, in this last extremity, we should make any desperate efforts and plunges, that might threaten to become troublesome, and give us a chance of extricating ourselves, she will call in the aid of her arms, and with one blow put an end at once to our sufferings and our existence. (WINDHAM'S SPEECH, Register, Vol. II. p. 1163.)

This is the idea, that from some cause or other, from some combination of passions and events,—such as no philosophy can explain, and no history probably furnish an example of,—the progress of the revolution will stop where it is: and that Buonaparté, like another Pyrrhus,—or rather like that adviser of Pyrrhus, whose advice was not taken,—instead of proceeding to the conquest of new worlds, will be willing to sit down contented in the enjoyment of those which he has already.—Sir, the great objection to this hope, to say nothing of its baseness, is its utter extravagance. On what possible ground do we believe this? Is it in the general nature of ambitrue, as I have stated, that his ambition is of that immeasurable nature, there are abundant and obvious reasons why it must be progressive.

tion? Is it in the nature of French ambition? Is it in the nature of French revolutionary ambition? (WINDHAM'S SPEECH, Register, Vol. II. p. 1164.) What reason have we to suppose, that they have renounced those designs, just when they seem to touch the moment of their highest and fullest accomplishment? When there is but one country, that remains between France and the empire of the world, then is the moment, when we choose to suppose that all opposition may be withdrawn, and that the ambition of France will stop of its own accord.—It is impossible not to see in these feeble and sickly imaginations, that fatal temper of mind, which leads men to look for help and comfort from any source rather than from their own exertions. (WINDHAM'S SPEECH, Register, Vol. II. p. 1164.)

They considered the ministers, now the drudgery of signing the peace is done, as functi officii, and as if they ought to go out; as if one was a mere goose quill, and the other a stick of sealing wax, which are done with, and ought to be thrown under the table. We know that Touchstone says, as a good ground of quarrel, "that he don't like the cut of a certain courtier's beard."

Hoc tantum possum dicere, non amo te!

The English parody may be more applicable to these gentlemen;

I do not like thee, Dr. Fell,
The reason why I cannot tell;
But this, I'm sure, I know full well,
I do not like thee, Dr. Fell.

He (Mr. Windham) seems as if he had rather have the old ghost

The President (of the United States,) Sir, is accountable to no one for the dismissal of the late minister to France, (MUNRO, who was nicknamed Doctor Munro) but, though I cannot give the gentlemen of Virginia and Pennsylvania (Messrs. Nicholas and Gallatin) reason for the measure, if rhyme will satisfy them it is very much at their service:

I do not like thee, Dr. Fell,
The reason why I need not tell;
But this, I'm sure, I know full well,

Debrett's Parli. Reports
Vol. 29. p. 321.

Well, and what of all this! As PUFF would say, "that's of no consequence—all that can be said is, that two people happened to hit upon the same thought—and that Windham, or Harper, or Burke made use of it first—that's all." In cases of this sort, it is not so much the act itself as the manner of doing it, which marks the motive and character of the party. Mr. Sheridan does not "serve your best thoughts as gypsies do stolen children, disfigure them to make them pass for their own;" he collects together the strayed thoughts of others, and, in the face of the world, takes them under his protection, without any disfiguring at all, except in cases of error or of unavoidable necessity. An instance of this sort may be perceived in the passage from Burke, where the quotation from Shakespeare, which applied with so much aptness, force, and beauty, to the blacks, whites, mulattoes, and mustees of a West-India colony, appeared to be almost, if not quite nonsense, when applied to Mr. Windham's desire to see an union of the people of England. But this must be regarded as an exception; for, generally speaking, Mr. Sheridan uses no disguise: the phrase of Indemnity Island and Security Island (played off in his speech of the 13th of May last), was delivered just as he had heard it from Mr. Fawkeners; the story from Aristophanes (in the same speech), just as he had received it from Mr. Fox; and, as to the body coachman and postillion, though we know not to whom it originally belonged, we well remember, that it was upon the pavé several days before the charitable senator took it in, which he did without making the least alteration in its dress. Thus his speeches are not, like the tragedy of Sir Fretful, a receptacle for stolen thoughts, but rather a sort of "foundling

"hospital of wit." He is not the jackdaw, vain of pilfered plumes; but rather the chimney-sweeper's good-natured ass, who, on a May morning, lends his back for the purpose of displaying the riches and finery of the parish.—To be serious, we have read, with great attention, this "masterly" speech, which, it seems, is to be puffed out into a pamphlet, and we have been able to discover in it, no one particle of information on any subject; no argument for, or against, any position. Upon the whole, it has nothing to awaken, nothing to rouse, nothing to unite, the country; and, as to the expressions of resentment against the ambition and insolence of Buonaparté, there is in them nothing new, nothing that has not been said long ago, and better said: precisely, therefore, as in the case of Rolla, the whole merit of the thing arises from the surprise at hearing such sentiments from such a man.

ON THE RETENTION OF MALTA.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—Coalitions for the patriotic purpose of dividing the loaves and fishes, are occurrences so common in the annals of party, that in times of ease and security, they would hardly provoke more serious notice than puns and sarcasms; but when heterogeneous unions are patched up for the purpose of influencing the national councils at a crisis of unexampled peril, too much pains cannot be taken to investigate the immediate causes which have given them birth. It has been the proverbial creed of more than one statesman that all patriots have their prices; and if the denomination of patriot be restricted, as I suppose it was designed, to those who assume it as the badge and watchword of faction, without doubt the older we grow the oftener we shall see the opinion verified. That the strange combination which the present session has brought to light originates on one side in a puerile reluctance to part even with the shadow of official greatness, is too plain to receive any new light from argument; to what secret motive it is imputable on the other, as no honest one can rationally be imagined, it is to be wished that those who are most profoundly versed in the mystery of whiggism would undertake to explain. A quid pro quo is an essential part of every bargain, and, without doubt, it is not by gratuitous zeal that the great champion of liberty has been prevailed on to combat amongst the ministerial mercenaries; but whether the conciliating premier has gained his new associate by the promise of a pension, a partnership in power, or, the right of dictating certain measures, time will inform us. The latter I think the most probable as well as the most mischievous condition, considering with whose approbation both parties have been recently honoured, while those statesmen whom Britain most admired when living, and, reveres in death, (are loaded with indignities); we have the strongest reason for looking with jealousy and suspicion, to the consequences of this unheard of confederacy.—In point of fact it is evident, that a man whose triumph has always been in proportion to the calamities of his country, whose nauseous panegyrick has been successively lavished on every democratic impostor, on every ambitious rebel from the “American Cincinnatus” to the “truly great Man” “the arbiter of kings” “and people,” is at last become the sheet-anchor of the present administration. The virtuous imbecility for which the world gave them credit amidst all their ignorant presumption, can no longer rescue them from that mingled contempt, and, indignation, which is the merited portion of ambition without talents. Henceforward their cause will be identified with that of the man, by whose support they are mean enough to desire a continuance in power; a man, the very nature of whose ambition prompts him to aspire to greatness on such terms as would make a real patriot deplore the necessity of existence. It is not my design with unequal powers to attempt a general review of the past or present conduct of that politicalameleon; a task which has been undertaken so ably, and successfully by yourself, and the excellent writer in the Morning Post, as bids fair to deprive him of the last fragment of that unmerited reputation which he once possessed; and, which gave him a greater command over public opinion than any demagogue besides has attained since the Cromwells, the Hampdens, and the Sidneys. My object is to awaken general attention in respect to a measure, which, from the close friendship subsisting between this person and the bonest tradesman on the other side the ditch, it is probable that he will omit no endeavours to engage the ministry to adopt, for the benevolent purpose of prolonging the blessings of a safe and honourable peace, so happily established between us and our commercial rivals. To induce a surrender of our few remaining conquests is evidently a thing which he has much at heart. He is well aware that Malta, above all things, would be a most acceptable offering on the altar of friendship; and, that to act as high priest in the sacrifice would be the surest road to the everlasting gratitude of his mighty patron.

The hope of effecting this object is, if I am not greatly deceived, by no means the weakest of those motives to which the wise men of Downing-street are indebted for the support of their new adherent. The studied declamations about national honour, which now occur as often as the abuse of the Bourbons in the hypocritical palavers of the friend of Talleyrand and O'Connor, are too visibly directed to that purpose to be possibly misapplied. Poor Old England, it seems, according to this honourable man, must sit still and be kicked at to prove her sincerity in concluding the treaty of Amiens; and, though the enemy, not content with the enormous advantage they derived from that compact, have violated it with a perfidy equalled only by their insolence, and have even rendered its most important articles incapable of execution, we are bound to fulfil our part with literal punctuality, and suffer France to enjoy all the fruits of an arbitrary and unlimited infraction! Oh Heavens! if this be honour, we are already surfeited; our conciliating ministers have secured us a monopoly of that precious commodity.—And, by whom are we urged to this knight errantry of honour!!! By a man whose whole life and, as a suitable close to such a scene, we now view him the open assaulter of the liberty of the press, and the no less open defender of the most execrable despotism that ever existed upon the earth. But allowing, what nobody disputes, that national honour and national interest, rightly understood, can never be disunited, I protest against his application of the maxim in the case before us, which is simply a question of resolution and ability; for I affirm, and will maintain against all the sophistry with which the contrary position may be defended, that a reciprocal engagement wilfully and designedly violated by either of the contracting parties, is thenceforward void of all force to bind the other. If such, then, is the relative position of France and England, and the hostile policy of the former is incontrovertibly manifest, to surrender Malta on pretence of preserving the national faith inviolate, would be but to aggravate cowardice by duplicity; and, to render an act bordering on treason or insanity doubly execrable, by disguising it under a false and flimsy pretext; such as in the opinion of every impartial man, would tend more to establish the conscious guilt of the authors than to palliate the deed: such too as would sink us still lower in the judgment of friends as well as enemies, if they saw a ministry professing the utmost deference to public opinion, so confident of the abject baseness of the people, as to dare insult them with an apology so shameless and dishonest. That an apostate from all principle, a demagogue ready to glut his appetite for power on the carrion of his country, should counsel such a measure is nothing new nor surprising; it is in fact, no more than a sequel of that conduct, and a farther disclosure of those principles which have merited the applause of the great champion of revolutions, the head of the western nation, "the man by heaven designed to set the world from slavery free." We need not to be convinced of the eagerness of this Garagantua to possess himself of Malta, the greatest and noblest trophy of all our naval achievements; and, that eagerness, whether we consider the enterprising and crafty character of the man, or his disposition towards this nation in particular, is the best possible evidence of its importance to us, and ought of itself to determine us never to be duped or bullied into a surrender of it. The confiscation of what remained of the estates of the order in Germany and Spain, the former by his direct act, the latter unquestionably by his mandate, and the concerted refusal of Russia to guarantee its future independence, equally demonstrate the ardent desire of the consul to plant again his banners on the island, and his absolute freedom from all scruples as to the means of compassing his end.

Impotent and ridiculous as were the stipulations of our ministry for the restoration of the order in the late treaty, I would not insinuate that the nation, though at an earlier period it might have insisted on a modification of those articles, would have been justified in refusing at this time to abide by them, had the enemy faithfully executed their part of that ruinous convention; and afforded no rational cause of alarm in their general system of foreign policy. But happily for us, if we can be taught by experience, and the evidence of facts, they have set appearances at defiance. Not satisfied with the slow decay to which the peace of Amiens consigned us, but judging by the tone of our negotiators of the spirit of our people, they have renounced the crafty policy which marked their earlier attempts, and have conceived, in the delirium of success, the daring hope of accomplishing by one rapid and concentrate movement their ultimate designs upon Britain; and of wiping off at a single stroke, the long score of disgraces and mortifications which their ambition has received at our hands.—To extinguish the last spark of European liberty in British blood, to reduce us to hewers of wood, and drawers of water, is the prospect which cheers that blood thirsty, ferocious race in the depths of misery, and the gripe of despotism. They hope to find here a dastard peddling tribe half animated with the spirit of the Hawkesburies and the Addingtons; no concessions, were we base enough to submit to them, would expiate the crime of daring to be free, nor divert their attention for a moment from the favourite object of their avarice, and lurking assassin-like revenge. It is clear that we have nothing to hope for, except from the good providence of God, and the valour of our people, the only legitimate sources of confidence in a crisis like the present. The surrender of Malta, therefore, as the price of a faithless cessation of arms, should the enemy go the length of threatening an immediate renewal of hostilities in case of refusal, would be tenfold more intolerable, than signing it away in Oct. 1801. After all the additional light which the last six months have thrown on the character of the nation and the consul, with whom we have to deal, it would be a species of suicide to strip off the best piece of our defensive armour, in order to allay the fury of our resentful antagonist; if any thing can retard the threatened storm, and afford us any of the benefits of real peace, it is a resolute determined countenance; armed at all points we may inspire him with terror; he is less likely to attempt to wrest the buckler from our arms, than to aim a blow at our vitals, if he can once by a fraudulent negotiation persuade us to lay it down. The more we deprive ourselves of external bulwarks and defences, the sooner will the attack be commenced against the body of our native citadel. The disposition of France is as clear as overt acts can make it. An insatiable lust of dominion, and a rancorous determination to cut off every source of prosperity and security from Britain, are the true causes of her anxiety to make us quit our hold on Malta; and to effect that purpose she will spare neither frowns nor grimaces, she will alternately threaten and cajole. At the same time it is evident, that since by influence or possession, she is mistress of every other naval station in the Mediterranean, Malta would be but a negative acquisition to France; but she measures not her conquests by the narrow maxims of a short sighted commercial policy; she covets wealth less than strength; her first consideration is always the injury accruing to her rival, the next, the advantages to be derived for farther enterprizes, and in this twofold point of view she looks on Malta with an eye of peculiar desire. She is well aware that the navigation of those seas would be for ever lost to England, if she could succeed in dispossessing us of the only harbour which might henceforth afford a station for our navy, or a refuge for our merchantmen beyond the Streights.

The Barbary powers, whose friendship whether in peace or war, is an object of no small moment to this country, especially in the present posture of Europe, would be ready to commence their depredations on our commerce, and, drag our unarmed mariners into the most dreadful of all slavery on the first signal from the Thuilleries, as soon as ever they saw us destitute of the only means of enforcing respect, or affording security and protection to such as might be disposed to be our friends. Egypt, for the deliverance of which we made such prodigious exertions, would revert to the usurpation of France without a struggle; and the inestimable lives, and millions of treasure with which that conquest was achieved, might have been spent as profitably in an expedition to the terra incognita of the southern pole. With Egypt once more in their hands, they would forthwith resume their designs on India, for the security of which we fought in Egypt, and if they could not finally eject us from that country, they would at least find means of exciting perpetual commotions, and, by keeping us engaged in contest after contest with the native powers, would render it, instead of a source of prosperity to England, an insatiable drain of her blood and treasure. If we are at this time as sensible as we seemed to be eighteen months since, of the magnitude of these evils, let it not be forgotten, that Malta is the only remedy which the fate of the times has left us; and, that its value is in a direct proportion to the importance of these consequences, which would result from its even falling into the hands of our enemies. Besides this, in the present state of the world, especially if those countries which inclose the Mediterranean sea, and which are for the most part in every thing, but in name, departments of the great Colossal Republic, the retention of the island could give no dissatisfaction to France, if she was not conscious of deep laid schemes to wound the interests of this kingdom. In her hands it would be a potent engine of destruction, in ours a mere inoffensive pledge of security. Notwithstanding the embarrassments of the country from the most unexampled series of errors on the one side, and, frauds on the other, I see no reason for despair; that infatuated credulity concerning the dispositions of France, which till lately constituted our greatest danger, has been radically cured: the nation is indignant at the insolent presumption of the ruler of that country, and, a meaner view has convinced them, that the same spirit pervades all descriptions of republican Frenchmen.—Let a clear case be made out, and, an appeal directed to the manly virtues, which I am persuaded are still the growth of the United Kingdom, as abundantly as during the seasons of our greatest prosperity, and, I doubt not, our efforts will be fully equal to the exigency of the occasion. In the mean time we have a right to insist, that neither the present ministry, nor their successors in office, will so far forget the responsibility of their situation, or the interests of their country, notwithstanding the suggestion of evil counsellors, and, the threats and artifices of their great admirer, as to give up Malta into any hands or on any conditions, while Britain has an arm to raise in vindication of her rights; the circumstances of the times are by no means unfavourable to the display of a seasonable vigour, which might in some degree atone for that apathy which till lately stigmatized their administration, and reduced the country to a state bordering on the most abject despondency.

PUBLIC PAPERS.

Substance of the Declaration made by the Sub-Delegate of Bohemia, in the 32d Sitting of the Deputation at Ratisbon, held on the 8th of Dec. 1802.

His Imperial Majesty has seen with pleasure, the laudable zeal with which the deputation has sought to provide for the support of all those who will suffer by the secularizations, and he accedes with all his heart to the arrangements made in that respect. His Imperial Majesty declares, that the Archduke Anthony renounces formally, and without reserve, all his rights respecting Cologne and Munster; he declares besides, that on the subject of the occupation of Passau, he has given assurances the most tranquillizing, and invested his ambassador at Paris, with full powers and definitive instructions, in such a manner, that, in order to terminate the business, every thing depends at present on the dispositions of the mediating powers and of the deputation. If, however, the deputation, contrary to all expectation, do not wish to wait the issue of that negotiation, it will be necessary to insert in the Recess a clause in favour of the changes which may yet take place in the actual allotment of the indemnities at the conclusion of the said negotiation, and it is only in reserving a similar clause, that the sub-delegate can accede to the Recess. His Imperial Majesty still thinks it his duty to make the proposition of conferring upon the Grand Duke of Tuscany and the grand master of the Teutonic Order, the electoral dignity, and also to propose the establishment in the college of princes, composed, according to the new arrangements, for the most part of protestant states, a certain number of new catholic votes, such a measure being necessary to preserve the equilibrium, and a just proportion between the two religions.

FOREIGN OFFICIAL PAPERS.

"Scarborough, Oct. 7.

Citizen Minister,—I arrived on the 29th ult. in the Bay of Courland, in the Island of Tobago, with a part of the troops destined to compose the garrison. They disembarked at Courland on the 2d inst. and this day they occupied the Fort King George, which had been delivered up to me by Brigadier-General Carmichael, Lieutenant Governor of the island.—I send you inclosed the act of taking possession, with the state of the houses, which were occupied by about 500 men of the English garrison, and also an inventory of the artillery and ammunition which has been delivered to me. All the intercourse which I have had with General Carmichael has been that of reciprocal satisfaction.—The planters are highly grateful for the favour they have received from the consuls, in the maintenance of their interior laws.—All that part of the island which I have traversed is cultivated with sugar canes, which I have almost every where replaced with cotton, which was formerly the principal produce of the island. The produce promises to be very abundant.—It will be necessary that the merchants of France should establish with Tobago, relations of commerce and credit, in order the more effectually to ensure the transport of the produce of the island, and to support the trade between it and the mother country.—I shall have the honour of transmitting to you more minute details the first opportunity.—I salute you with respect.

R. Lacrosse, Rear-Admiral Captain-General of Guadaloupe and its Dependencies, to Rear-Admiral Decres, Minister of the Marine and Colonies.—Grand Terre, Guadaloupe, Oct. 24, 1802.

Citizen Minister,—On the 7th inst. I announced to you, that tranquillity prevailed in the colony, and that I only knew of two assemblies in the woods. On that day, one of those assemblies deceiving those who were in pursuit of them, dared to appear in the environs of St. Arme, in Grand Terre. As soon as I was informed of this, I hastened to the place, and found that a band of Brigands, led on by two white chiefs, Barse, formerly commissary of government, and Millet de la Girardiere, formerly an officer decorated with the order of St. Louis, had attacked several habitations, and assassinated their proprietors.—The greatest exertions have been made to seize these robbers, a great number of whom have been arrested, and have met with that punishment which their crimes merited; amongst others, one of the chiefs, Millet de la Girardiere.—Grand Terre now enjoys its former tranquillity and measures have been taken to insure its continuance.—As to the brigands in the woods, they are cut off from any communication with the other parts of the island, and deprived of the means of procuring provisions and ammunition.—I have the satisfaction to announce to you, that the sickness is almost entirely at an end in this island.—The 480 men which you expedited by la Foudroyante & l'Etonnante, have arrived in the best state. This reinforcement will insure, in a great degree, the security of the colony.—According to the intelligence received from St. Thomas and St. Bartholomew, an assembly of men of colour, with the addition even of some whites, exiled from Guadaloupe, has been formed in those isles, to the number of 250 or 300. Their project is to disembark upon this island, to join the wrecks of the brigands whom we have pursued, and to bring them arms. They are said to be provided with small vessels for that purpose.—There is little probability that the governors of St. Thomas and St. Bartholomew would sanction assemblies of this nature. I have, therefore, thought it sufficient to transmit to them the details which I received upon the subject, with a request that they will arrest the chiefs and accomplices in these plots against the tranquillity of this colony.—I expect their answer by the frigate La Didon, which I have expedited with the dispatches.—The corvettes, la Foudroyante and l'Etonnante, have set sail for St. Domingo, where they transport the 7th demi-brigade.—Health and respect, LA-CROSSEZ.

FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

Milan, Nov. 21.—The Polish troops remaining in our republic will be sent to St. Domingo.

Aschaffenburg, Nov. 30.—Yesterday the bishoprics of Bamberg, Wurtzburg, and Eichstadt, were taken possession of by Bavaria, under the title of the Dutchy of Franconia. The Prince-bishops of Bamberg and Wurtzburg have resigned their government, and the minister of the Elector of Bavaria, Baron Hompesch, has received homage at Wurtzburg.

Vienna, Dec. 1—We have received intelligence from Constantinople, that the Beys in Egypt, have defeated the Turkish troops in seven actions and battles, and so diminished their numbers, that they have been obliged to apply to the English for aid and protection, to prevent their being entirely driven out of the country. These accounts from Egypt come down to the 31st of Oct. Some French officers and commissaries had also arrived in Egypt, to regulate some commercial affairs, mercantile debts, and other matters.—Prince Nicholas Esterhazy is still here.—This day Baron Armfelt had his audience of entry of His Imp. Majesty, as Envoy Extra. and Minister Plenipo. from His Swedish Majesty. Our Envoy to the court of Sweden, Count Lodron Laterano, has arrived here from his estates, and, it is said, will in the spring return to Stockholm.

Frankfort, Dec. 4.—Our city having taken possession of the catholic convents and foundations assigned it by the plan of indemnities, published on the 27th of Nov. a notification, signifying that no alteration should in consequence of this be made in the catholic worship, the regulations of the catholic schools, or the provisions made for the catholic poor.

Musburg, Dec. 5.—According to the intelligence from the Inn, Austria has neither evacuated Passau, nor taken possession of Saltzburg, and the other countries assigned to the Grand Duke of Tuscany by the plan of indemnities. It is still asserted, that the indemnities of that Prince have been definitively regulated by a convention signed at Paris between Cit. Talleyrand and Count Cobentzel.

Aix La Chapelle, Dec. 6.—There is no truth in the report of Cleves and Gueldres being about to be ceded to the Batavian Republic.

Basle, Dec. 9.—A corps of artillery from Huningen has traversed our city in its way to Zurich.—There has been a general movement amongst the Helvetic troops. The first battal. of the line is at Berné, the second on its march for Lausanne, and the battal. of light infantry at Zurich.—A battal. of light infantry is stationed in the district of Ilanz and Dissentis. Gen. Serras has caused to be arrested the chief promoters of the insurrection, which desolated the canton of Rhodia, and has imposed a sum of 48,000 livres on the communes and individuals who took part in it. Gen. Serras has set out for Lucerne, where he intends to establish his head quarters: those of the Gen. of division, Barbon, have been established at Zurich.

Hamburgh, Dec. 10.—According to private advices from Vienna, of the 1st. inst. it is certain that two Russian Coarriers have passed through that city with letters from the Emp. Alexander to the First Consul and the Brit. govt. containing the most urgent representations in favour of the King of Sardinia, and of the amelioration of his establishment.—The Duchess of Parma is to remain at Vienna until the convention between France and Spain, respecting Her Highness's future support, shall be settled. Those negotiations were begun at Barcelona, and will be terminated at Madrid.—By order of the court of Vienna, a paragraph has been inserted in the Austrian Journals, purporting, that the rumour of an alliance between the two Imperial Courts and GREAT BRITAIN is void of foundation.—The French interest seems at present to be very high at the Court of Vienna, since the arrival of two Coarriers from Paris, at the hotel of the French Ambassador, Champagny, who immediately after visited Cit. Cobentzel, with whom he had a very long conference; after which the count waited on the Emperor and the Grand Duke of Tuscany, the latter of whom those dispatches seem to concern.

Hague, Dec. 14.—Gen. Montrichard, whom the First Consul has sent hither, to take the command of the French troops in this Republic, immediately after his arrival, informed the Battavian gov. that he would fix his head-quarters in this city, into which he would introduce as a garrison, a company of carabiniers, with a few troops of infantry. This intimation excited much disagreeable surprize, as the public had conceived the period to have arrived at which the troops of France were to be withdrawn entirely out of this country.—The Batavian gov. signified to Gen. Montrichard, that it could not recognize him as commander in chief of the French forces in this republic. The gen. upon receiving this answer, in which the gov. evinced the greatest firmness and decision, dispatched one of his aides-de-camp to Paris, to report what had passed, to the First Consul. The termination of the affair is expected here with much anxious curiosity.—Dec. 17. The affair of Gen. Montrichard remains as it was. The Coarrier sent to Paris is not yet returned.

Gen. Victor, Capt.-Gen. of Louisiana, is expected to arrive tomorrow at the Hague: he will embark with his troops at Helvoetsluis in transport ships furnished by this republic. The expedition will, without touching at Dunkirk, proceed directly to the place of its ultimate destination.—The Batavian gov. has signified to that of the French repub. that it cannot continue its pay to the French troops beyond the close of the present month.—Dec. 17. Letters from Vienna, of the 6th, inform us, that the plan of an alliance between G. Britain and Austria has entirely failed. The failure of it is attributed to the Archduke Charles.

Paris, Dec. 13.—The following passage, extracted from the speech of Lord Grenville, in the British Parliament, Dec. 2d appears worthy of remark.—“I cannot help saying a few words on the conduct of ministers with respect to Switzerland. Their strange and contradictory language, their affectation of dignity, the testimony which they give of not having compromised the honour of the country, all astonish me. It is said, that a person who occupies an important post in the office of the Secretary of State, had resided a long time at Constant, before the troubles broke out in Switzerland, and that he had frequent conferences with the principal directors of the Swiss insurrection. This assertion, if true, ill accords with what the ministers have stated, who boast of not having compromised the honour of their country.”—Lord Grenville must be perfectly aware of the swarm of agents which the former ministry were in the habit of spreading over the Continent for the purpose of forming and fomenting conspiracies, who plotted the massacre of Rastadt, and caused the French ambassadors to be insulted at Vienna and at Rome. According to him, one of these agents has also plotted the insurrection in Switzerland.—For our part we have too good an opinion of the present ministry, to believe that they would continue to follow that abominable system which was pursued with so much activity by Lord Grenville and his colleagues.—(Moniteur.)

It is asserted, that the Dutchies of Parma and Plaisance are to be united to the kingdom of Etruria, if Spain will consent to cede the Floridas to France. If the latter does not take place, those Dutchies will be given to the Italian republic.

Dec. 16.—Consul Cambaceres gave on Saturday a dinner of ceremony to the Brit. Ambassador, at which were present the members of the Corps Diplomatique, and a number of general officers. Amongst the persons of distinction presented by Lord Whitworth, were Lord Cholmondeley, Conyngham, Boringdon, Coleraine, and Frederic Montague, Cols. Roche and Mathew, and several other Eng. officers of rank. Amongst the foreign ladies who attended the assembly in the evening were, the Dutchess of Dorset, the Dutchess of Gordon, Lady Georgianna Gordon, the Marquise de Gallo, the Princess Justiniani, Mad. de Boufflers, Mad. Saladine, Mrs. Hunter, and several other English ladies of the first distinction.

Dec. 18.—The government has received official intelligence, that the Pope has sent to Switzerland a Legate, furnished with full powers to conclude a Concordat between his Holiness and the Helvetic Republic.

Gibraltar, Nov. 20.—The Niger Frigate, Captain Hillyar, arrived here this morning, from Portsmouth. Brig. Gen. Oakes and his suite are on board, with 200 recruits for the different regts. at Malta, and 150 for this garrison. Gen. Oakes is going to Malta, as 2d in command under Gen. Villetes. It is now beyond all doubt that we shall retain Malta, for some time at least; as we know, for certain, that orders have been sent for evacuating Egypt, and withdrawing the troops from thence to Malta, where all that can be accommodated will remain, and the rest are to be quartered here. It is supposed that about 6000 Brit. troops will be stationed at Malta, and that either three or four regts. will come to this garrison.

Ratisbon, Nov. 29.—The recess, or general conclusion of the deputation, is published. It contains eight sheets, and may be purchased of every bookseller. It was communicated to the Imp. Plenipo. on the 25th, but the latter has not given in his declaration on the subject.—Dec. 2. The deputation is at present in vacation. The Imp. Plenipo. has communicated to the ministers of the mediatory powers, the general recess of the deputation, but he qualifies it only as a project. He declares, at the same time, in a private note, that he cannot accede to the recess.—Dec. 4. The ministers of the mediatory powers transmitted yesterday to Baron D'ALBANI another note for the deputation, announcing the receipt of the recess from the Imp. Plenipo. With respect to the want of the concurrence of the EMPEROR, they add, that they will neglect nothing to remedy this defect.—The plan of indemnities, the sanction of which is still discussed at Paris, between Austria and France, and remains to be completed at Ratisbon, has already been carried into execution, by the entry of the German States into the civil possession of the territories allotted them. There is, however, a remarkable exception in the case of the ELECTOR of BAVARIA, who still continues excluded from Passau, by the Austrian troops.—Dec. 8. The Imp. Plenipo. has addressed a new note to the deputation detailing the reasons which will not allow him to accede to the recess.

DOMESTIC.

COUNT WORONZOF, Ambassador from the Court of Russia, landed at Dover from Calais, on Monday afternoon, from the commissioners yacht, which had been dispatched to convey his Excellency to this country; the castle guns were fired, and the military were ordered out to receive him. A band of music played during the whole time of his landing and proceeding to the Ship Inn.

On Wednesday Mr. Moore, of Lord Hawkesbury's Office, arrived in town, having travelled from Switzerland direct for Holland. He sailed from Helvoetsluys, and landed at Horwich.

Prince RUSSOLI, the elected Grand Master of Malta, was the other day at Portsmouth with General Paoli.

PROCEEDINGS IN PARLIAMENT.

MONDAY, Dec. 13.—LORDS.—Counsel were further heard relative to the Bench Appeal, Kinnaird v. Mathewson.—On the first reading of the Malt Tax Bill being regularly put, Lord Spencer commenced an interesting debate on the present critical and momentous state of the country, the conduct of his Majesty's ministers, and the enormous peace establishment. On the question being put, "that the said petition does not come within the description of any petition, it was carried in the affirmative, and two other petitions, under the same circumstances, disposed of in like manner.—Capt. Markham moved, "that leave be given to bring in a bill for appointing commissioners to examine into the frauds, abuses, and irregularities, practised by persons in the several departments of the navy, and in the business of prize-agents, and to report the same, together with such observations as may occur to them, in order to prevent such frauds, abuses, and irregularities in future, for the better conducting and management of such departments of the navy, and the business of navy agents, &c."—After a short conversation between Lord Temple, Lord

Under our Foreign head (p. 846), there will be found several interesting articles, on which we have not, at present, room to remark. One or two of the topics must, however, arrest our attention.

Intelligence from the Hague of the 14th of December contains some curious particulars respecting the French army in the free and independent republic of Batavia. General Montrichard, it appears, whom the First Consul has sent into Holland to take the command of the French troops there, immediately after his arrival, informed the government of his intention to fix his headquarters at the Hague, into which he was about to march a garrison. This intimation (we are told) excited, in the Batavian government, much disagreeable surprise, as it had conceived the period to have arrived, when, according to the treaty, the troops were to be entirely withdrawn. It is further said, that the government has refused to recognize Montrichard as commander in chief of the French forces in Holland; that the general has sent off to Paris, and that the event is waited for with great anxiety. An article, apparently of a later date, says, that the Batavian government has signified to the French Republic, that it cannot continue its pay to the French troops beyond the close of the present month.—The treaty, to which the poor Batavians allude, is the treaty of peace, between France and Holland; by the 17th article of which, it is stipulated as follows: “The French Republic shall keep military possession (but with a fixed number of troops agreed upon between the two nations), during the present war only, of the places and positions, which it shall be useful for her so to keep for the defence of the country.”—If, therefore, we regard Holland as an independent country, this treaty has been grossly violated, on the part of France. Indeed, she has been in the violation of it, ever since the treaty of Amiens was signed; but, according to the doctrine, now laid down by her, and recognized, in fact, by our pusillanimous ministers, we have no right not only to interfere, but even to ask a question, upon the subject. Ceylon, which belonged (according to our own acknowledgement) to the Dutch, our ministers, those very ministers, whom Mr. Wilberforce thinks “too honest” to have any political intercourse with the powers of the continent; those too honest, those Richmond-Park ministers, by the very same act, in which they acknowledged Ceylon to be the property of the Dutch, received it from the hands of the French, as a good and valid cession. And, will these men dare to tell the Parliament and the nation, that they are going to war for the independence of Holland? Will they dare keep the Dutch colonies, or any part of them, because Holland is evidently a province of France? They some time ago blustered, and threatened to keep the Cape, Demerara, and Essequibo, (see Register, p. 701); but, it is now understood, that the Cape is gone, and our readers may be assured that the other Dutch colonies will soon follow.

Advices have been received in France (see p. 845), from Tobago and Guadaloupe. The former was surrendered to the French General Sahuguet, on the 7th of October; and thus was consummated, on the part of the Richmond-Park ministry, a most scandalous breach of faith with the people of Tobago, who had a solemn promise from the government, that they never should be again given up to the French

Relying upon this promise, they made uncommon exertions and uncommon sacrifices to assist, not only in the defence of their own island but in the reduction of the other French colonies, in return for which they have been shamefully abandoned, and, the far greater part of them, absolutely ruined. — From Guadaloupe the intelligence is of no very interesting nature. It is well, however, to pay attention to it, as very much depends upon the situation of the French West-India colonies.

By a declaration made, on the 8th instant (see p. 844) to the Deputation at Ratisbon, that a negociation is still going on between France and the Emperor relative to the indemnities for the Grand Duke of Tuscany, it appears that His Imperial Majesty, has an humble hope, that the mediators (he certainly feels that they are Dictators) will admit the Grand Duke and the Grand-Master of the Teutonic Order into the number of Electors, which, from three, would reduce the Protestant majority to one. This declaration includes also a hope, that certain Catholic voices will be admitted; but, were this granted, it would not prevent a Protestant majority in all the colleges. — In fact, the court of Vienna, though, like us, it still makes a shew of resistance, like us, is, in reality, softened, by an ignorant, a frivolous, a weak and pusillanimous, ministry, to any mould of submission. The very rumour of an alliance with us has, it seems, created a trepidation at Vienna, where, according to the Hamburg papers of the 10th instant, “a paragraph has been, by the order of the court, inserted in the Austrian journals, protesting that the rumour of an alliance between the Emperor and Great-Britain, is totally void of foundation.” — As we would say in Westminster Hall, a false, scandalous and malicious libel, conceived by certain journalists, not having the fear of God before their eyes, but being thereunto moved and instigated by the devil, in order to blast the good name of His Imperial Majesty, and to bring him into hatred and contempt. Good God! And is Great-Britain become, amongst nations, what the satyrists describes Anthony Pasquin to be amongst individuals: “a wretch whose acquaintance is infamy, and whose touch is poison”? Is it, is it possible, that our once great and glorious country can, in the short space of eighteen months, have been brought into a state to justify this description! So, however, foreigners seem to think; at least, if the Hamburg news be authentic. And, though we may wince under the lash, we have, I fear, no right to complain. Messrs. Fox and Wilberforce, the “too honest” supporters of the “too honest” Richmond-Park ministry, have, if they are not grossly misrepresented by the news-papers, openly accused the court of Vienna of breaking her engagements; and the former has even accused her of having, in the negotiations for peace, caused the expulsion of the King of Sardinia out of Italy, than which a more daring calumny never was uttered. But this is what France likes to see. To make all the nations in the world hate and despise us is a part of the means which she is employing for our final extirpation; and no man will serve her cause so effectually as he, who shall succeed in making an open breach with the court of Vienna. As to the King of Sardinia, he was, in fact, deserted by nobody so shamefully as by the “too honest” ministers. We took a spice and a sugar island, while we left him without a single mention of his name. We may, however, be obliged to do him justice at last. The foreign journals talk of an indemnity to be procured for him by Russia, France, and Great Britain; and, it needs no supernatural intelligence to foresee, that the only part which the latter will have in the arrangement will be the paying part. In truth, we believe it to be the intention of the two “mediating powers,” to compel us, as in the case of the Stadtholder, to refund, in behalf of the King of Sardinia, a portion of the worth of Ceylon and Trinidad, which, upon a recalculation appears to Buonaparté to be rather more than our share of the spoil! For our parts we always abhorred the idea of taking those islands, while the Queen of Portugal lost part of her dominions and the King of Sardinia almost the whole of his. We ought to be made to refund the worth of those islands (yea, to the uttermost farthing), and, that we shall, there is, we think, but very little doubt; nor should we be at all surprized, if, at the same time that Mr. Addington brings down a message respecting the Stadtholder, he should signify that the same generous intentions are entertained with respect to His Sardinian Majesty. — Such ministers do the Consul “best service in the end: he, like an ape, keeps them in the corner of his jaw; first mouthed, to be last swallowed: when he needs what you have gleaned, it is but squeezing you, and, sponge, you shall be dry again.” The French official paper the Moniteur, has fallen upon a new way of sending forth its anathemas against this country. It being well known to be the official journal of the French government, has brought upon that government charges a little more direct than are, at sometimes, convenient to answer. For this reason, the Moniteur has lately copied, from the Mercur de France, such articles as it is thought advisable to circulate. This is, indeed, a mere subterfuge; for the Moniteur, being official, renders official whatever it adopts, whether of information or opinion. There is a notion prevails here, that the Moniteur is an official paper in no other way than are those papers, which are called ministerial ones, in this country; but, the case is very different; for the Moniteur has long had at its head a notification, that it is the only official paper in France: so that, in fact, it answers to the London Gazette, the words of which have ever been regarded as the words of the government. Having premised thus much, we should now proceed to comment at some length upon two articles, which have very lately reached us through the French official Gazette (one of which will be found in p. 848, and the other in our next sheet); but, for want of room, these comments must in part, be postponed till another opportunity. Some few points, however, must not be delayed.—The Moniteur (see p. 848) takes occasion, from what was said, or pretended to have been said, by Lord Grenville, or Mr. Thomas Grenville, respecting the journey of Mr. Moore to the Continent, to revive that exploded falsehood, the charge against the English government of having caused the assassination of Robejot and Bonnier at Rastadt, a charge most impudently preferred by the French for the infamous purpose of disguising their own bloody-minded perfidy. Perhaps, however, it is not correct to say, that they have revived this falsehood, seeing that they have never let it sleep. There is, in one of the picture rooms at Versailles, a design of a monument intended to be erected to the memory of Robejot and Bonnier, the two French plenipotentiaries, who were assassinated in the neighbourhood of Rastadt; and, upon a pedestal represented in this picture are these words: Ils furent égorgés par des assassins soudoyés par le gouvernement Anglois. And, it is while this audacious falsehood, this infamous libel, against us, our government, and our sovereign, is, by the French government constantly kept in the eye of the world; it is at the same time, that the French official paper, styles our king the rewarder of assassins;

this is the time, that the ministers, the servants of that king, are prosecuting a writer for a jest on Buonaparté and his wife! — Mr. Addington, in reply to Dr. Laurence respecting the shame of passing over the French libels on His Majesty, is, by the news-papers, reported to have said, with his usual solemnity, that “he wished he could shew to the learned and honourable gentleman the satisfactory explanations, which had taken place on that head;” but, that gentleman must, we think, be much less learned and infinitely less honourable than the world takes him to be; if those “explanations” would be satisfactory to him. No, no; while our government is making a public matter of a jest on Buonaparté and his wife; while Mr. Peltier is, for his jokes upon those people, to be brought into the Court of King’s Bench, and to be arraigned as a criminal; while this offence (real or not) of the English press against the rulers of France, is so to expose the offender and so to occupy the attention of the world; while the party offended is, in this case, to receive such ample and open justice; in the other case, when the British nation is libelled, when her ministers are publicly, and in the official Gazette of France, styled the employers, and their royal master the rewarder, of assassins; in this case, the matter is to be settled by an “explanation,” and that explanation so secret, too, as not to admit of being communicated to the Parliament!—But, why do we waste our time in exposures of this sort? There is no such thing as exposing the conduct of such people: it is so openly, so flagrantly, so barefacedly mean and pusillanimous, they are so evidently resolved to sacrifice the honour and interest of the nation, whenever such a sacrifice appears necessary to the gratification of their own vanity and selfishness, the whole of their conduct is; in this respect, so odious in itself, that no picture, no caricature even, can come up to the original.

The other article, in the Moniteur, to which we have alluded, and which is too long for insertion in the present number, contains several things well worthy of remark; but, with one exception, we shall reserve them, till we have room to insert the whole of the article itself.—The point on which we, at present, think it necessary to say a few words; is an important one, as it relates to the description, said, by the Moniteur, to have been given of the Russians, by a statesman whose opinion must naturally be supposed to have a great and extensive influence. The Moniteur puts in to Mr. Windham's mouth, in the debate upon the address in answer to the king's speech, words which he never uttered. We shall quote the whole passage:—"It appears, that the commercial and financial system has not turned Mr. Windham's head. He could rather see his country in possession of more glory, and of fewer bank notes. With such sentiments which do so much honour to the human heart, Mr. Windham has nevertheless proved a dangerous minister to his country; because he is violent in his pursuits and not overguarded in his expressions. While drawing the picture of Europe, he has again offered insults to Russia, whom he should love; for in that empire, there are no funded debts, and great things are achieved without being instigated by a vote for public credit.—On this point he spoke as follows:—Russia in her extreme dominions bordering upon Asia, presents nothing but a mass of rude, uncivilised barbarism, unworthy to be compared with the inhabitants of the French territory—The Russians will not think themselves highly flattered by this compliment, and Mr. Windham must get into disgrace with all our philosophers who have proved, during the last century, that light broke upon us from the north."—Mr. Windham said no such thing, as will appear from the report of the Morning Post, which is universally allowed to have the best reports of any paper in London.—"With respect to the nature and situation of territory, Mr. Windham said, it might lay remote and detached, like that of Russia, which extends behind the north of Asia, and so cannot be brought into effect; and, as to population it might be timid and feeble, like the Asiatics, with whom we have been fighting; but was that the character of the people of France, or of the nations whom she had overthrown?" (Morning Post, Nov. 25.)

Is there any thing here insulting to Russia?—The object of this base misrepresentation is evident, enough. The Moniteur surely forgets, when it gave, during the honeymoon of the peace of Amiens, a speech of Buonaparté, wherein it was said, that there were but two nations in Europe, worthy of being so called, England and France, and this, too, in the presence of the Russian, amongst other ambassadors. In the main, however, we are pleased at this trick of the Moniteur. It shews, that there is one nation in Europe and one statesman in England that Buonaparté is afraid of. It is infinitely his interest to cajole the former, if he can,

and not less his interest to keep the other from the British ministry, which he thinks (and far be it from us to say that he is mistaken) he shall always be able to do, by giving this degraded nation to understand, that he does not approve of him for a minister.—It is truly curious to see with what harmony the Moniteur, the same Moniteur that calls our king a rewarder of assassins, chimes in, with respect to Mr. Windham, with the cant of the ministers and their adherents:—"With such sentiments, which do so much honour to the human heart, Mr. Windham would nevertheless be a dangerous minister, because he is violent in his pursuits and not overguarded in his expressions."—So says the Moniteur, the infamous Moniteur, who accuses our government of having paid for the assassination at Rastadt, and so says the True Briton (see Register, p. 227). "Mr. Windham is sans peur and sans reproche, but he pushes things to extremes, and is not a safe politician."—Wonderful harmony! It has only to be continued, on both sides of the water, for another year or two, and this nation will receive the chastisement which is justly due to its incorrigible cullibility.—"Unguarded in his expressions!" This is the cant, the cookoo cant, of a crowd, a mob, of miserable creatures, whose only pretension to prudence consists in their never having, in the whole course of their lives, uttered or conceived, one bold or brilliant thought.—But, as if the Moniteur had left its business unperformed, the Morning Post, in its comments on the French article, makes Mr. Windham a party with Mr. Dundas and Lord Grenville in the system of making war for Sugar Islands, while the text accuses him of making war for glory. Either text or comment must be false; but, in our opinion the text is far the most correct of the two. We do not believe that the selfish policy of making war merely for the sake of commerce was ever adopted by Lord Grenville; and, as to Mr. Windham, the whole course of his conduct proves, that he has always preferred wars of principles to wars of profit, the support of the royalists in France to the capture of islands, and that he has ever thought, as he now thinks, the glory of the country, rightly understood, not the least valuable of its possessions, an opinion which is at this moment most amply and strikingly verified.

The French papers tell us, that the Duchy of Parma and its dependencies are to be given to the King of Etruria, that is to the family of Spain, in exchange for the Floridas; and, it is said, that ministers have received certain intelligence, that Cochin has been ceded to France by the Dutch — But, we must first shew our readers what the ministers themselves say on this subject. “Our pre-eminence [in riches] we have every reason to believe, is regarded with an envious and malignant eye; and we have no doubt but that, even under the mask of peace, means may be used to sap the foundations of our commercial greatness, upon which, it has been justly observed, our political existence now essentially depends. The present has been admitted by all parties in parliament, with the solitary exception of Mr. Fox, to be a period big with danger; that it is so, no man in his senses can for a moment doubt. The address and firmness of our ministry may avert war for a while, but it is too much to say that France will, under her present government, abstain from giving frequent occasions both of jealousy and alarm. That the Chief Consul is bent upon disturbing our sovereignty in India, has been long proved from his actions, and is now pretty generally believed. His expedition to Egypt had that principally for its end; and his eye is still fixed upon it with a steady perseverance. He is attempting every thing, even now, to facilitate, at some future period, and that, perhaps, not very distant, the accomplishment of his views, and it behoves us to watch his every movement with the most scrutinizing attention. It has been stated from the Hague, that since Lord Whitworth’s arrival at Paris, the embarkation of French troops for Louisiana, which was to take place in the Dutch ports, has been countermanded. We think this extremely probable, because we can readily conceive it was a measure which our ambassador was likely to be instructed to remonstrate against and oppose, and we sincerely hope it is true; but, if the accounts received by the French papers last night be correct, the views of the consular government are not bounded by one acquisition in the same quarter. It is now said, that Spain has been required to cede the Floridas to France, on condition of which the Dutchies of Parma and Plaisance are to be united to the kingdom of Etruria, and if not, to the Italian republic. It is almost needless to observe, that if the bait offered to the court of Spain is not great enough to induce a compliance, the influence of France in that cabinet can enforce it as a demand. — It has likewise been stated, from a respectable quarter, that Cochin has been given up to France by the Dutch. It is true His Majesty’s ministers have not officially learnt this circumstance, but that does not lessen its probability. At peace with the French republic, are we thus to be doomed to witness a perpetual succession of encroachments, against which, we presume, remonstrances will on our part be made? Are we to come, period after period, to the verge of hostility, and then to be soothed with explanations, which may be no sooner made than the occasion of them may be repeated? We think too highly, both of the discernment and the spirit of our ministers, to suppose for a moment that they would thus compromise the honour of their country, by descending to such mean submission. Buonaparté may cut and carve on the continent as he pleases — there seems no power existing in Europe to prevent him from giving full scope to the dictates of his towering ambition there; but when he thinks of extending his empire on the other side of the Atlantic, or to the shores of India, he must be sensible, we should suppose, of the necessity of obtaining the concurrence and assent of the British government; and it must strike him, that these transfers of property, and bargains of exchange, are not likely to meet with our approbation, more especially as the equivalent, if such it may be called, to be given on his part, has been illegally obtained. — Amongst the subjects of discussion at Paris, of which we conceive there must be many, Malta will doubtless form a very leading and important one. We perceive with satisfaction, however, from the proceedings in the House of Commons last night, that the laws relative to its trade and its geographical situation are to be renewed, a pledge that it will not be immediately, or without due consideration, ceded. The material changes indeed that have taken place in the political situation of Europe, and that are projected and carrying into effect in other quarters of the globe, would, in our opinion, fully warrant us in permanently retaining it. The French government may say, that that would be a violation of the treaty of Amiens; but in how many instances has it been already grossly violated by France?”

We regret, that the narrowness of our limits prevents us from remarking, at any considerable length, upon this article, which appeared in the True Briton and the Sun of the 17th instant, and which our readers may be assured came from the offices in Downing Street. — What! is “our pre-eminence” [in riches] really, then, “regarded with an envious and malicious eye by the Chief Consul?”

Why, we said it would. We remarked, no longer ago than last week (p. 795), that Mr. Addington's statements, which had so charmed the patriots of 'Change Alley, would make a good deal of mauvais sang at St. Cloud.—Is the Consul, indeed, "bent upon our destruction in India"? Has he, in good sooth, "already, in many instances, violated the treaty of Amiens"? And do the ministers, do those who, the public prints inform us, are feasting off the presents received from Buonaparté, do these men acknowledge all this in their demi-official paper?—But, where is the wonder that Buonaparté should receive Cochin from the Dutch, and what right has the ministers to complain of it? Has he not as much right to obtain a Dutch colony from the Dutch themselves, as we had to obtain a Dutch colony from him? And is not his title as valid? And, as to the Floridas, were not the ministers told, over and over again, that the French would have those colonies; that those colonies must go with Louisiana? And, again we ask, upon what principle, upon what pretext, they, who made the treaty of Amiens, they who, both in their public speeches and their public acts, have recognised the doctrine of non-interference in the affairs of other nations, upon what pretext will they attempt to intermeddle in a transaction between France and Spain? "Suppose," (said Mr. Windham, in his Speech of the 4th Nov. 1801), "suppose France, by an arrangement with that independent power Spain, should obtain the cession of the Spanish Settlements in America (which would be in violation of no treaty), would you consider that as an occasion for war?"—Here is the case precisely foreseen. This question is now to be answered by the "safe" politicians, the "prudent" ministers, who, in spite of their blustering, will answer it in the negative; and, Mr. Fox, ci-devant counsellor of their sovereign, and now their counsellor and supporter, will say, that the obtaining of the Floridas is, on the part of France, only another little start in the pleasant and inoffensive "rivalité" of "commerce." Thus it is that the nation will be lulled.

But, of all astonishing things, the most astonishing is, that Lord Whitworth (while his Duchess, and her Grace the Duchess of Gordon, are, by way of parenthesis, crouching at the feet of Mistress Buonaparté), should be directed to remonstrate against, and oppose the embarkation of French troops for Louisiana! Not only did the ministers, before the conclusion of the definitive treaty, know that this colony was ceded to France by Spain; but they and their partizans, (particularly Lord Hawkesbury, the Master of the Rolls, and General Maitland,) contended, that the cession was a thing for this country to rejoice at!—As to the effect, however, of the remonstrance of Lord Whitworth, it has, it seems, been much about the same as that of the famous remonstrance in favour of Switzerland; that is, it has, if any thing, accelerated the operations which it was meant to put a stop to; for the intelligence from the Hague, of the 14th instant, informs us, that General Victor was hourly expected there, on his way to Helvoetsluys, there to embark with the troops for Louisiana, on board of Dutch transports, without touching, as was intended, at Dunkirk, or anywhere else; but to proceed directly to New Orleans.—So much for the "mix-ture of firmness and conciliation;" so much for the operation of what Lord Temple happily termed, "the most nauseous mixture that ever poor nation was drenched withal."

One word on trade and commerce.—The people in the city begin to discover, that Mr. Addington's financial and commercial statement will not bear a close examination; and, the state of the West-India colonies, as described by the West-Indians, in the late debate on the sugar duties, is that of irretrievable ruin, if something effective be not done for them. The new drawbacks, as they are called, but, properly speaking, bruties, must amount to about £150,000 or £200,000 a year, as a further payment on account of the peace; and this expense will only end with the end of our great importation of that article of produce, that is, with the loss of a very great part of our colonial trade, involving our manufactures and navigation, in their several degrees of misfortune, if not actually diminishing them on the whole balance of our trade, yet by their defalcation in that quarter, preventing their general increase. It was on the diminution of the West-India and North American trade that the opposers of the peace particularly dwelt as the first, and only immediate, injury to our commerce and navigation.

TO CORRESPONDENTS and READERS.—MR. WILBERFORCE will be so good as to wait one more week.

INVINCIBLE STANDARD.

The Narrative, which I last week published on this subject, has excited an uncommon degree of public curiosity, and, I am proud to add, of generous public feeling. About forty of the portrait of the brave Lutz have been sold; the first purchasers were Lord and Lady Folkestone, the former five prints, and the latter two.—I have received a great number of letters on the subject, from different parts of the kingdom, all expressing the utmost admiration of Lutz, and entirely approving of my humble endeavours in his behalf. Amongst these letters there is one, which, with the omission of the name of the writer, I shall take the liberty to insert here, as it appears to me to contain the general sentiments of all those who have done me the honour to write to me on this occasion; and, as it contains, moreover, a hint which I hope will be turned to account.

"SIR,—I have read with particular interest your account, in the last Register, of the gallant achievement of Antoine Lutz, in seizing the standard of the corps, termed Invincibles, in the glorious battle of the 21st March, 1801, near Aboukir in Egypt; and although your plain narrative tears the laurel from a Briton's brow, yet as Tros Tyriusve mihi nullo discrimine habetur, I rejoice that you have restored the 'hard earned honours of the well fought field' to him who so heroically won them. I have to request the favour of you to send me one of the best impressions of your gallant Protégé. At the same time I should be very unwilling that the affair should die away, without some signal mark of public acknowledgment conferred on Lutz. The City of London very properly, in their Common Hall assembled, publicly granted a pension for life to the daring seaman, who rescued, at the imminent risque of his life, the dispatches of Buonaparté from entire loss, when thrown overboard and sinking, at the instant of

"the capture of the French corvette, in the Mediterranean by our fleet, that was carrying them to France. Perhaps the recovery of these dispatches led the way, though remotely, to the capture of this very trophy of national glory, upon which we so justly pride ourselves: and while we reward the daring sailor, shall the gallant soldier not taste the bounty of an admiring public? Upon revolving these circumstances in my mind, I beg leave to submit to your consideration, whether it would not be very proper to endeavour to raise a fund, wherewith to purchase for Lutz some situation in that army, in which this brave fellow has so eminently distinguished himself; such, for instance, as a Quarter-Master's Warrant in the cavalry, or a like situation in the infantry. This would be rewarding him in a way most congenial to a soldier's feelings, and have the good effect of constantly shewing to his fellow soldiers, that true merit will ever find its reward from a British public, that a friendless foreigner in the British service, unknown but by his brave conduct and good discipline, by those and those only, found, in the fostering hand of a grateful nation, that distinction and promotion, which ever ought unerringly to accompany such valour and like successful enterprize; and that while the highest dignities await the victorious commander, the common soldier's heroism shall not be forgotten amidst the din of triumph, but his well earned fame shall find its due estimate and reward here, and go down to posterity along with that of his superior, an example of imitation to his fellow soldiers. With these sentiments thus strongly impressed on my mind, I am very anxious that a subscription should be set on foot for this purpose, and I do think among your numerous readers an adequate sum might very soon be raised. Should you incline to my opinion and one should be commenced, I beg the favour of you to put down my name for five guineas, which I will cause to be paid to you so soon as " you may apprise me of having done so.

"—I remain, Sir, your humble Servant,

Yes! the man who jumped overboard, and saved the dispatches of Buonaparté, was rewarded with a pension for life, by the City of London, in Common Hall assembled. John Saunderson, the sailor who, during the heat of the battle of Camperdown, went aloft and nailed to the mast, the flag of his admiral, which had been shot away by the enemy, received a very handsome gratuity; enough to enable him to live at his ease, and to make a comfortable provision for his aged parents. "But, the men thus 'rewarded were natives of this country!" This will be the observation of some few persons; but, as if it were decreed that nothing should be wanting in support of the claim of LUTZ; as if no proof should be wanting of the injustice of those who would withhold a reward from him, the history of the war furnishes an instance of a foreigner. I allude to Mr. Goddard, an American. He was a prisoner of war on board the French privateer the Jean Bart, which privateer was going to France from the United States, and had the French minister Fanchet's dispatches on board. The Jean Bart was, in the channel, obliged to strike to a British frigate, and, while the frigate's boat was making towards her, the French captain threw the dispatches overboard, when Goddard (whose family had been loyalists, and who had been one himself) most gallantly jumped over the side after them, and was lucky enough to keep them afloat, till he was taken up by the boat of the frigate.—Goddard (whose rank in life was that of captain of a merchantman) was offered a good situation in the West-Indies, which he refused; he was, I believe, also offered the Consulship of Rhode Island, worth about £500 a year. He wished for a situation in England; but whether he finally got one, or took a sum of money I know not, nor, indeed, is the fact at all necessary to the inference which I mean to draw from this statement, which is, that, the quality of foreigner has not, heretofore, been regarded as a bar to claims on national gratitude and national justice. And shall it be so regarded now? Shall this selfish exception be made in only one case; and that, too, in a case which calls aloud for an extraordinary exertion of liberality; in a case calculated to banish every sinister feeling from the breast?

As to the hint of my correspondent, relative to a subscription for the purpose of purchasing a commission for LUTZ, it will, I think, be right to postpone that laudable undertaking a little while, for two reasons; first, to give the public time to be fully convinced that the claim of LUTZ cannot be invalidated; and, secondly, to afford His Royal Highness the commander in chief an opportunity (now that he will know all the circumstances) of proving to the world, that deeds of glory are, in the army which has the honour to be commanded by him, sure to meet with their reward.—In the mean time, the fame of LUTZ is spreading far and wide. The Political Register will carry it to every court in Europe, without one single exception. In the United States of America it will be echoed through about three hundred different newspapers, and will be known to every man, woman, and child in the country. In the East and West Indies it will circulate sufficiently; and, in His Majesty's European dominions, it has already made no inconsiderable progress. The Register itself is read by a vast number of persons. There has been a great extra demand for the narrative, which will take altogether upwards of five thousand stamps, and will bring into the stamp office about seventy pounds duty! (Poor LUTZ might have this, one would think!) The London newspapers, too, have, from one motive or another, almost all of them, for once, at least, during their existence, contributed towards the circulation of truth. Some of them have made extracts from the narrative, others have mentioned it, and all of them have inserted a paragraph in the following words, which appears to me to have been published by the authority of some persons deeply concerned:—"We have good reason to believe, that the statement which appeared in a periodical publication of recent date, respecting the capture, in the battle of Alexandria, of what has been called the 'Invincible Standard,' 'will not escape observation from those whose business it is to notice it; and that it will be clearly and incontestably proved that the 42d regiment did take the standard from that body of men termed the Invincible Legion, whom they engaged in the commencement of the action; which standard was, in a subsequent attack by the enemy, lost by Serjeant Sinclair, who received it in charge from the officer of the 42d regiment, to whom it had been surrendered: nor will this fact be found inconsistent with the documents adduced in the publication above-mentioned, however contrary to the reasoning and insinuation of "the author."—So! "what has been called the Invincible Standard!!!" Mark the hypothetical phraseology! "What has been called?" Yes, what was so called in all the public prints, ten thousand times over; what was so called in the theatres, at Sadler's Wells, and at Astley's; what was so called in the Panorama; what was so called by the Dukes, Earls, Barons, Baronets, and Gentlemen of the Highland Society; and what was so called by His Majesty's minister, when, in parliament, he signified the pleasure of his Royal Master that it should be placed on Abercrombie's tomb.—Yes, not only what was called the Invincible Standard, but what is called the Invincible Standard, and which is not only called such, but is such, or else we have no Invincible Standard in our possession.—And, is it possible, that the nation will relinquish this honour rather than do justice to LUTZ? Will it be inveigled into this act of baseness and folly merely to gratify the spleen arising from disappointed assurance and intrigue?—My "reasoning" and my "insinuation" are before my readers: let them judge. I do not know who this paragraph comes from; but, its publication in so many papers cannot have cost less than twenty guineas, an expense to which an individual would, at least without some very powerful motive, scarcely have put himself to, on such an account. As to the case stated in this paragraph, I shall say nothing, until it shows its front in a more authentic form; but, while I sincerely desire to avoid a controversy, which, if persevered in, must finally bring shame in some portion, at least, of my fellow subjects, it will not, I trust, be expected, that the advocate of LUTZ will suffer either his hero or himself to be unjustly attacked with impunity, however numerous or powerful the assailants.—It is not my intention to trouble my readers with remarks on every unofficial misrepresentation that may appear relative to this subject: a passage, however, in the Morning Chronicle of the 27th inst. seems to demand immediate attention. After inserting the substance of my narrative, the writer concludes thus:—"The above narrative certainly will give great offence to the 42d regiment, who are represented to have been in a very shameful situation when rescued by the German regiment; and, if this account be true, were so. If it is false, the officers will no doubt vindicate the character of the regiment by a fair narrative of facts; and, if their regiment has just claims to the honour of having taken the Invincible Standard, will defend them by evidence. It certainly will afford us great pleasure to find that the merit of an exploit so highly extolled belongs to a British regiment and a British soldier, and not to a French deserter, which Antoine LUTZ was. We do not blame any man from endeavouring to vindicate the claims of a foreign deserter to a gallant action he had performed; far less do we blame any one for endeavouring to strip another of honours he has arrogated by lies and misrepresentations. If the above narrative be true, Serjeant Sinclair has been guilty of lies and misrepresentations. We think, however, what we are sure every British heart must feel, that it was possible to have vindicated the claims of this French deserter without the innumerable sneers at, and we will venture to add, misrepresentations of the conduct of the 42d regiment."—To this I must add the closing sentence of a paragraph, in the same print, of the 29th inst.—"It does not show much of the English spirit, of the want of which some people so petulantly accuse others, to insinuate that the foreign corps had a greater share in the victory of the 21st than any of our native troops."—With respect to sneers at, and misrepresentations of, the conduct of the 42d regiment, none are to be found in my narrative, which I have now re-perused with great attention, and in which I see nothing to lament but that want of ability, on my part, which I doubt not my readers will have the goodness to excuse. But, it seems, that "to insinuate, that the foreign corps had a greater share in the victory of the 21st of March, 1801, than any of our native troops, does not show much English spirit." I will not disgrace the lash by bestowing it on a sentiment so mean, so grovelling, so detestably vile and base; but I must just point out the artful attempt which is here made to drag in all the native corps to make common cause with the 42d regiment, or rather with Serjeant Sinclair. "Any of our native troops?"—Where did I say so? Where did I say or insinuate, that the "foreign corps had a greater share in the victory than any of our native troops?" I have merely stated the fact as far as related to the Highlanders and the Queen's German regiment, and even that no farther than was necessary to elucidate and establish the particular case of LUTZ. The Highlanders, while the honour of taking the standard was awarded to them, never called upon the rest of "the native troops" to share that honour with them; but, now that something a little resembling detection and disgrace appears to be approaching, they are calling in all the "native troops" to unite with them. For what? No other part of the "native troops" ever claimed the honour, and why should they share in the disgrace? Neither the 28th regiment, nor the 90th regiment, both of which corps behaved most gallantly, have ever brought forward any Serjeant Sinclair. No, no; I must not suffer the question to be thus battered out: it must be confined to the 42d regiment and to LUTZ; and there, if it pleases God to grant me life and health, it shall be confined, till there remains not a single human being in this kingdom unacquainted with the truth and the whole truth relative to the subject.—The writer in the Morning Chronicle, foreseeing that the result of every inquiry will but injure his cause, endeavours, beforehand, to prejudice the public against LUTZ, by calling him a "French deserter, a foreign deserter;" and these phrases are studiously repeated two or three times in a paragraph. LUTZ was, as I clearly and truly stated, taken in requisition by the republicans; that is to say, he was seized by his rebel fellow subjects and carried by force to their army, where he was detained by force, till he found an opportunity of escaping to the Prince of Condé's corps; so that, he deserted to the army of his lawful king, a step which the writer in the Morning Chronicle must naturally abhor.—Far, however, be it from me to complain of this malice against LUTZ, who is honestly, indeed, entitled to the slander of that pen, that infamous pen, which has eulogized O'Connor, Napper Tandy and Fox: what degree of honour the cause of the Royal Highlanders will derive from such a defender it is none of my business to enquire.

London, 29th Dec. 1802. W. CORBETT.

READING BALL ON THE PEACE.

SIR,—In my last I promised to resume my exposure of CANDIDUS' treachery, which seems to me so apparent in the whole of his first letter; as well as in some other passages of the second; wherein I have not yet touched. Indeed there is hardly a paragraph, I might say hardly a sentence, that does not contain some sly attack or other. Not only my respectable friend, but the inhabitants of Reading (as I have already shewn in one instance), young Mr. HENRY ADDINGTON, Mr. PITT and all, are included in the malice of his pretended defence.

If it had not been for the ridicule thrown on the good people of this town in a passage which I examined in my last, I might perhaps have missed that with which his second letter sets out. But, with the clue which I have furnished to this insidious writer's real designs, who can doubt the slanderous equivocation lurking in his assertion, that "a lover of truth and decorum knows nothing of the town of Reading." Can any man suppose that he did not mean to suggest too the obvious turn, that "the town of Reading knows nothing of a lover of truth and decorum?" For shame, CANDIDUS, to abuse in this manner as worthy a set of neighbours as exist! And for this purpose to pillage one of Shakespeare's most farcical jests! For is not this a plain imitation of Dr. Caius, who, on being told that the man whom he had found in his closet was an honest man, cries out, "Dere is no honest man that shall come in my closet?" Between ourselves, Sir, I have good reason to suspect that CANDIDUS is a professed mender of Shakespeare's good things, and the same person at whom a passage which you struck out of my first letter plainly enough glanced, as the known author of the original account of the ball and supper.

But the other sarcasm levelled at my fellow townsmen is less concealed. You had a little sippantly said in one of your summaries, that "the simpletons of Reading" had bestowed on the new Clerk of the "Pells the honorary title of Captain of Volunteers." It was a cursory stroke of satire, forgotten immediately perhaps by yourself, and, I am sure, by the greater part of your readers. You took it, I dare say, as you found it, in one of the newspapers; and who can expect you to investigate and ascertain every trifling domestic fact, with which you may point a sentence in passing, as if you were building the gravest argument on that foundation? A real friend of Mr. ADDINGTON and the inhabitants of Reading would have let this sleep in quiet; or, at most, have contented himself with observing, that the inhabitants of Reading had not the power of bestowing such an honorary title; and, that in fact, the young Clerk of the Pells was not yet even admitted a private in the corps, though he had been proposed as such and not as an officer at all. But what does CANDIDUS? Why, the very reverse of this, you may be certain. He leaves the appellation of simpletons to all the inhabitants of Reading, without once remarking, that even you could only apply it to the members of the corps, which includes a very small part of the inhabitants of the town; he tells us, that they did actually propose to the father to compliment his son (a young man at school, as Candidus takes care to remind us just before) with a cornetcy, which in common familiar language does "bestow the honorary title of captain," and in reality gives some portion of actual command; and to rouse our indignation at the want of all dignity in the minds of our country gentlemen, he then adds, that the corps which thus desired to be put under the authority of a school-boy, whose father had just sold all his property in that quarter, but happened to be prime minister, was a corps composed "of the most illustrious characters for property and public spirit in that neighbourhood." You, Sir, have written many desponding and many severe things on the decay of public spirit among us; but you have chiefly pointed at our love of money in preference to glory, the fault of another and very different class of men from our landed gentry and yeomanry. Of them you have never said any thing that presents half so melancholy a picture to the mind. For the sake of my country I am compelled wholly to disbelieve this account; and on behalf of the gentlemen of the neighbourhood, I challenge CANDIDUS to the proof of the fact.

Justice, however, I must say, is here done to my friend. He shines, and he could not but shine, in contrast with such "most illustrious characters." He is represented as having seen and resisted the impropriety of this application. For the enmity of this writer seems to be even less against Mr. ADDINGTON than against the landed gentry and yeomanry of this kingdom, who are our great bulwark and support. Yet he takes care to be even with my friend by joining this incredible story of the cornetcy with a most malicious defence on the subject of the Clerkship of the Pells. You had said that MASTER ADDINGTON might be seen "playing at marbles under the cloisters of "Westminster Abbey;" rather a pert way I must observe, Sir, of signifying that he has still all the levity of a boy about him.—Now what answers CANDIDUS? Why, truly, that the eldest son of Mr. Addington is not at Westminster, but at Winchester school;—admitting the full force of your expression. And as he could not but say something civil of the "young man" (for so he styles him, as you would speak of the most obscure apprentice), he refers for his character to the warden of the college, who, like the provost of Eton, better known to us in this neighbourhood, every one is aware has little or no concern in the intermediate management of the school, instead of sending us to the masters who are the best judges of the boys under them. As to the appointment itself, this false friend of our incorrupt and disinterested minister says that, if "the conferring of a vacant place of honour and emolument on his family, be a subject for censure and invective, all places in future "must be bestowed according to the "chances of the lottery-wheels." Now what is this, but to say, that if Mr. ADDINGTON continues to have the disposal of good things, we must expect a full share of them at all times to go to his own family? What an opinion might not the reader of this malignant vindication have entertained of my friend, if he had not lately shewn his integrity so clearly to the world by making an example of that poor ignorant Devonshire fellow, who foolishly attempted to bribe him with the paltry sum of 2000*l.* though some people, I know, pretended to sneer at that prosecution as a sort of theatrical trick; unworthy the dignity of a great statesman!

The true ground both of my friends withholding the cornetcy, and of his giving the Clerkship of the Pells (and I am glad to have the opportunity of stating it) is precedent. He is a politician trained to study and respect the genuine practice of our excellent constitution. By that, he therefore guided himself, on these as on all other occasions. It is true, that cornets of horse might formerly have been seen playing marbles at school. But that used only to be done for the sake of getting rank in the army, a motive which could not apply to the cornetcy of the Woodley Cavalry; and this very abuse was among the first which the Duke of York reformed when he was placed at the head of the army. All the precedents of former times have thus been reversed, and my friend acted accordingly. On the other hand, it is well known to your readers (for it was the chief defence made at the time) that there are several precedents for the appointment to the Clerkship of the Pells, and of Mr. Pitt, when he had been in the King's service about as long as my friend, choose to give the very place in question to another; if too, when after being eighteen years in that service, he had retired with large debts and little comparative emolument, no richer a man than he entered it, he still thought proper to persist in refusing the same place, when my friend so handsomely offered it to him, by what rule is it, that a fit of romantic disinterestedness in him ought to have overturned the precedent made by Sir Robert Walpole, and other precedents of the best times, favourable to young Mr. HENRY ADDINGTON! It is not in his idle whims and caprices, but in his policy and eloquence, that my friend aspires to rival his great predecessor.

It was my intention originally, Sir, to have finished the subject in this letter, and to have exposed the design of this man of mock-candour in seeking, as he does, to sow animosity between the present and the late Chancellor of the Exchequer. But in a third letter, lately inserted in the Star, he has himself pulled off the mask. He is, what I all along suspected him to be, a declared admirer of Mr. Fox. There is at once the clue of his whole conduct. I shall therefore reserve for a concluding letter the little which remains for me to remark on this writer's two former letters; that is, what relates to Mr. Pitt, with a word or two respecting yourself: and I shall endeavour to trace through all his crooked artifices, the turnings and windings of the faction to which he belongs.

I am, Sir, &c. J. Tictenser.

Extract from the Moniteur of the 14th instant, (quoted from the Mercure de France), containing Observations on the Speeches at the Opening of the present Parliament.

As the Address to the King on the opening of the session was voted without any amendment or division, and in appearances with unanimity, it might be imagined that there prevailed but one opinion in parliament. A volume might however be made up out of the contradictory speeches to which that Address has given rise. When men are collected together in order to speak, they cannot well refrain from speaking; and as very frequently they would have nothing to say, if they were not animated by the spirit of party, it may naturally be expected that a party spirit will break out wherever a number of men are assembled together to deliberate. All the speeches that have hitherto been delivered have therefore tended only to disclose the parties into which parliament is divided. These parties may be distinguished into three, the party of the present administration, Mr. Pitt's party, and the party of the old opposition, who seem disposed to support the ministers who made peace, with the view either of preventing or retarding the return of Mr. Pitt and his adherents into office, or of forcing in along with them some of the more distinguished members of the opposition. The latter view appears the more probable.—These three parties agree together on one point, but under a variety of modification, viz. that a great state cannot be indifferent to what passes in other states; that is, that England is inclined again to interfere in the affairs of the continent, although she laid it down as a principle, on concluding the peace, that all continental alliances were burthensome. When, notwithstanding the collision of sentiment which took place between the different speakers, not one of them has explained why England pretended to insulate herself from the continent on making the peace, or why she would now again endeavour to re-establish her influence on the continent; their silence upon this point we shall attempt to make up for.—During the late war the British cabinet were loud in their complaints of having been abandoned by all their allies. No complaint more groundless. It was England that sacrificed all the powers who, at her instigation, had taken up arms. Let us take Austria as an example of their conduct. When the cabinet of Vienna made peace, it was indubitably from necessity: as England had made some conquests, if she had attempted to interfere in that treaty, she must necessarily have placed some compensations in the balance, a thing which she was anxious to avoid. Austria was left to her fate, under the disadvantages of a power laid prostrate by defeats. France, however, took no undue advantage of her victories; but it is not to the British cabinet that Austria is indebted for the arrangements which promoted and directed the peace. It is therefore incontestibly proved, that Austria was abandoned by England, who declared at the time that she could no longer concern herself with the affairs of the continent. The British cabinet made afterwards a separate peace for England, with all the advantages of a power that has made conquests, and that treats for itself alone. That is, that England restored much less than she would have restored, had she treated at the same time for herself and her allies.—But now, when there are no more compensation to be made, England shifts her principle, and tells us that she can no longer remain indifferent to what passes in Europe. In order to come therefore to some explanation of this changeful policy one must be brought to believe, that the English minister, guided solely by his own interest, insulates his country in order to preserve the profits of the war, but forms alliances that he may not have to support the expenses of it. In this consists the secret of the derangement which the space of a few months has introduced in the opinions of parliament. And these, however, are the men who attempt to complain that they are left without allies! Because they give money, they imagine themselves to be absolved from every obligation. To expose to hazard their dominions in order to increase the commerce of England, opens such golden views, that the bankers of London cannot conceive how the governments of other countries can refrain from war. They have at length nursed themselves into a belief that at their leisure they may say to kings, "Fight for us; we will make peace without you, while we accuse you of not having gained victories at the stipulated price."—After having declined taking any part in the treaty of Luneville, it is somewhat whimsical that England should enter into discussion upon that treaty, in which she is not so much as named. Whether additions be made to, or retrenchments from it, what right has England to complain? Who has told her that every thing that happened since the conclusion of that treaty, was not previously agreed upon by the contracting parties? Who can assure her that many more things may not still take place with respect to which the parties interested will not trouble themselves, even in thinking what the parliament of England may say about them? If England was anxious to retain a pretext for intermeddling in the affairs of the continental powers, she should not have negotiated merely on a maritime and insular power.—England reproaches France with inordinate ambition; but the ambition of a nation is not to be judged of by her victories, because her victories prove nothing but her courage. We shall not therefore enter into an idle discussion of such an accusation, but simply appeal to the evidence of facts. At the commencement of the war, England had a great number of allies: at the conclusion of peace she had not a single one. France, on the contrary, had to stand alone against all Europe, while every peace she concluded procured her allies. May it not then be asked, of which nation the ambition is most fatal to other governments, whether that which had allies and lost them, without suspending the course of her conquests, or that who had no allies at the beginning of the war, and who, at the conclusion of the peace, had allies all over Europe?—A member of parliament asserted, that France had allies merely because she favoured their projects: it is impossible to reason more happily; for it is evident that every alliance between the greater states rests upon the reciprocal advantages which they can guarantee to each other: but it were vain to enquire what advantages could be procured and guaranteed to other nations by a people who avow that they fight only to promote their commerce. England stands out of the continent.—There let her remain.—Such is at present, and long will continue to be, the first principle of European policy.—We have proved that the English court alliances only for the purposes of enabling them to wage war, and that they insulate themselves with the view of making peace, while France supports war by her own strength, and seeks allies only to consolidate peace.—This difference of conduct, so honourable to the French nation, ought to regulate the policy of all the cabinets of Europe. We ought not, therefore, to be astonished at hearing England complain of not being able to find allies; it is the contrary which ought to excite our astonishment. At this moment it is important to examine what circumstances give rise to the agitation which distinguishes the English government, contrasted with that steadiness and security which marks the conduct of the government of France.—On this point we cannot do better than quote a passage from “Letters on England,” a work written within the last six months. “To describe in a word the actual situation of the French and English, I would say, that abroad, as well as at home, France finds her level, while this level is sought for by England.” This phrase contains the explanation of all the debates which have taken place in parliament. There is not an Englishman who does not feel that England has lost that ascendancy in Europe which she had acquired before the revolution; and, through the fault of France, this ascendancy was an usurpation. The English, however, enjoyed and exercised it with haughtiness. Even now they cannot make up their minds to give it up, while they admit they are not in a situation to recover it.—Hence all the contradictions observable in the speeches of their orators. One cries out, “We are on the brink of destruction;” another affirms, that “Never did there exist greater security.” The one deplors the ruin of the commerce of his country, while the other draws the most flattering picture of national prosperity. All bold sentiments, contrary to each other, and still all are in the right. The only subject of discussion is, to ascertain from what point they set, and whether they wish to advance. Those orators who regard England only as a commercial power, (if these two words can with propriety be united) are in the right when they describe it as in a state of prosperity, and that it has gained more than it has lost this war. Those speakers who dream that England had united glory and commerce together, reflect that a nation cannot without injury be robbed of its glory, and that it would have been better never to have adopted too lofty pretensions than to be obliged to relinquish them. Speakers holding this opinion see nothing in the future but disaster, and they may have reason for their opinion. Other speakers (for in England there are different descriptions), admitting that England has seen her consideration in Europe diminished, contend that this consideration is not absolutely necessary to the prosperity of a commercial (marchands) people, and that with a good grace they shall determine to yield to circumstances, they will find themselves freed from a very burdensome illusion. These also are in the right. But allowing all these different reasonings to be right, opinions are constantly floating, and the feelings of men are agitated; and if the English were weak enough to suffer themselves to be guided by those who now predict the ruin of their country, it would incontestibly be so in a very short time—for nothing is more fatal to a nation than high pretensions or haughtiness of spirit united to positive weakness. If to this agitation which prevails in England we compare the calm which reigns in France, how very striking is the contrast! Negotiations are continued and treaties executed. No dispute is carried on about our means, for they are ample. No one accuses those who made the peace, for all enjoy its blessings. No one provokes war, by accusations against England, because if it should become indispensable there would be no necessity to make allies to carry it on. No pains are taken before-hand to make it agreeable to the national feelings, because in France all wars are naturally national. In a word, there is no necessity for speeches to prepare them for the execution of the terms of the treaty, because France was so powerful as not to be under the smallest inducement to sign any treaties which she would not wish to execute, and because she had done, during war, all that England wished to have effected.—From all the speeches which have followed that of the king, the only positive inference which can be drawn is, that the English know not what it is to be contented with their situation, their commerce, or their government. Before meddling with the state of France, their orators ought therefore to come to something like an agreement about their own situation; for how can they hope that Europe can derive any instruction from their speculations on the future plan of the French government, if they have not been able to form a decided opinion respecting the past conduct of their own ministers?—Never did any minister, more than Mr. Pitt, employ young men, and men of no family consideration; never did any minister render the spirit of commerce and stock-jobbing more predominant in a nation, possessing institutions opposite to democracy; and if he had governed the country for fifty years, never should we have any sentiments from him similar to those contained in the following extract from a speech of Mr. Fox.—“It is supposed that a numerous description of persons are very ardent in their wishes for the re-commencement of hostilities; that this wish animates the principal commercial men in all the principal trading towns, but more particularly those of the capital. I deny it.—The hearts of English merchants glow with too much generosity, too much patriotism, to permit them to sacrifice the happiness of their country to miserable speculations of sordid interest, founded upon government contracts, or any other means of enriching themselves by the opportunities of a war. But, if this my opinion of them were unfounded, I should feel disposed to wish for the return of those heroic follies which distinguished the heroes of ancient times. If we are doomed to perish in order to gratify the passions of the human heart, I would rather their blood should flow to satiate the romantic ambition of an Alexander, than to swell the coffers of merchants, and of cold, unfeeling calculators.”—Nothing is more unfounded than the supposition that Mr. Fox is desirous to return into office. The above sentiments fully prove the contrary. They will be looked upon as blasphemous in a country which Mr. Pitt has bowed down under a spirit of commerce. The preference which Mr. Fox gives to the follies of an Alexander may be justified by the following observation of Mr. Bolland, viz.—“Every nation begins and revives under the tent; even those who close their existence in the anti-chamber and at the toilette. The same cannot safely be said of those who end in attending the comptroller for history does not record one that has arisen anew from such pursuits. It is nevertheless under the controul of a commercial spirit that economists would reduce the powers of Europe.”—We have observed that Mr. Pitt did not possess an exclusive interest over the administration which bore his name. In order to understand the cause of the disagreements between him and Mr. Windham, it must be recollected that Mr. Windham is as extravagant in his ideas of glory, as Mr. Pitt is in his ideas of commerce; every thing that is stamped with a romantic character delights the former and disgusts the latter; one is seduced by the splendor of projects, the other by the speciousness of calculations. From the following passage in Mr. Windham's speech, may be collected his opinion of Mr. Pitt's financial system.—“Commerce and capital; these are the magic words which enchant and re-assure our ministers and the greater part of the nation; but France mean time prosecutes her views without looking at any thing that merely resembles commerce, credit, &c. &c., and since the conclusion of the preliminaries, she has fitted out 18 ships of the line;” [Mr. Windham said 13 ships of war, 6 of the line, and 7 frigates.] “more than 10,000 tons of hemp have been imported from the Baltic into her ports by English vessels. Never, perhaps, was so great an expedition as that to St. Domingo, fitted out in so short a space of time; and, if public rumours may be credited, a new expedition is preparing in the ports of Holland, and all this is carried on with exhausted means; and what is more deplorable, it is British capital that supports all these expenses. It is supposed that France is willing to permit us to run our commercial career, but

“may not this grand edifice of public prosperity be overturned by a breath of wind.”—It appears, that the commercial and financial system has not turned Mr. Windham's head. He could rather see his country in possession of more glory, and of fewer bank notes. With such sentiments which do so much honour to the human heart, Mr. Windham has nevertheless proved a dangerous minister to his country; because he is violent in his pursuits, and not overguarded in his expressions. While drawing the picture of Europe, he has again offered insults to Russia, whom he should love; for in that empire there are no funded debts, and great things are achieved without being instigated by a vote for public credit.—On this point he spoke as follows:—“Russia in her extreme dominions bordering upon Asia, presents nothing but a mass of rude, uncivilised barbarism, unworthy to be compared with the inhabitants of the French territory.”—The Russians will not think themselves highly flattered by this compliment, and Mr. Windham must get into disgrace with all our philosophers who have proved, during the last century, that light broke in upon us from the north.—

When Sir F. Burdett called upon the House of Commons to explain what a Jacobin was, a member might have got up and answered, that a Jacobin was a hot-headed politician, who from the tribune insults these nations who will not submit to a foreign influence. Mr. Windham has moreover confessed, that the most enlightened men who have lately visited France, agree in saying, that not a thought is there now bestowed upon the Rights of Man. These speeches have further added, that the destruction of England, and the means of succeeding in that design, are now the only object of every thought. So far they have deceived Mr. Windham; and this is incontrovertibly proved by the conduct of the French government, who since the conclusion of peace have not uttered a single word hostile to that union which ought to prevail between the two nations. The same most assuredly cannot be said of England.

FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

Alexandria, Oct. 18.—On the 16th, the Cornelle, a French ship of 44 guns, and a brig, arrived in the harbour of Alexandria. M. Sebastiani, a French envoy, is come in the ship. His arrival here has given rise to various conjectures. The common opinion is, that he has come for the purpose of establishing a consul here; but I should rather suspect that the French govt. wants to know what we are doing in this country, and what are our views in stopping it so long.

Hague, Dec. 21.—The French Ambassador received, by two successive couriers last night, dispatches communicating the intentions of the French gov. in regard to Gen. Montrieux, lately appointed to the command of the French troops in this Republic. The purport of those dispatches bears, that Gen. Montrieux shall not place any garrison, nor take his head-quarters in the Hague; but shall fix his head-quarters at Breda only.—Cit. Victor, Capt.-Gen. of Louisiana, arrived here yesterday, with several officers who are there to serve under him. Cit. Semonville has been in conference with him for three hours together. Within about six weeks the Capt.-Gen. will proceed on his voyage with two demi-brigades of the French troops in the pay of this Republic. He is to sail with these forces from Helvoetsluis.

on board the two frigates La Furieuse and La Libre, with a corvette, and about ten transport ships. The Batavian gov. to which is confided the care of equipping these ships, and supplying them with the necessary stores, shews not great alacrity in the service. It will, however, be obliged to redouble its diligence: since the commander of the expedition has brought strict orders to this effect; and Cit. Victor is not a man to be trifled with in a matter of this sort. The Batavian gov. is now, in fact, more dependant than ever; and all its endeavours to procure the departure of the French troops, in the course of the current month, have proved ineffectual.

Vienna, Dec. 8.—The birth of the infant Archduke has been notified to the First Consul: the letter transmitted to him on this occasion, has the following address: "Pæclarissimo ac strenuissimo viro Napoleoni Bonaparte, supremo Reipublicæ Gallorum Consuli; amico nostro honoratissimo."—Dec. 20.—The last news received at Paris from Vienna expressly contradict the report that the supplementary indemnities to the Grand Duke of Tuscany had been finally agreed upon. The court of Vienna has not adopted the plan of the mediating powers. It has, on the contrary, proposed a different plan, which is now the subject of discussion, and will probably be, to a certain length, adopted. It appears certain, that Austria connects the negotiations upon this head with those for her claims on the Duchy of Parma.

Stuttgart, Dec. 12.—The celebrated Mr. Moore presented himself at the court of the Duke of Wurtemberg, who received him very ill, and caused him to be informed, that he (the Duke) was disposed to unite himself with France to maintain the peace of the continent, and to support the operations of the Diet at Ratisbon.—Mr. Moore, therefore, has not been more successful here than he was at Vienna, where the court would not receive him. It is not probable that he will obtain more credit at Munich, at Carlsruhe or with the Elector of Hesse: The particular protection afforded at London, to a number of pamphlets which are published there against the King of Prussia, makes it probable that Mr. Moore would not meet with a very favourable reception at Berlin. It is even doubtful, whether he would be received at Hanover. He is thus reduced to drink Constance wine, which is certainly not so good as that of the Cape, until a new cargo of allies comes from the Indies, which will afford the means of making a small coalition.

Constance, Dec. 15.—Mr. Moore is here, and has frequent conferences with Gen. Bachmann. Some troops have been enrolled, which have been put on half-pay. Mr. Moore has sent a man of the name of Rochat to London. The Landvogt Wagner is at Constance, and has frequent conferences with Mr. Moore. The latter lives very retired. Capt. Verdmeiller is enlisting men for England. Some difficulties have arisen between him and those who recruit for Austria. Mr. Moore is president of the committee at Constance; it is composed of Gen. Bachmann, Capt. Wagner, of Beine, Capt. Verdmeiller, of Zurich, Licut. Bravor, Gen. Rauresan, and two Englishmen, besides some Emigrants of the army of Condé, who reside near Constance. Madame Diesbach, the wife of Diesbach who was sent away from Paris, also belongs to the committee. It meets at Mr. Fingelin's. Mr. Moore, wishing to repair to Vienna with a special commission from the Govt. that court signified to him, that it did not intend to re-engage in a contest which would embroil the whole world, and would be attended with the most momentous consequences; and that it was therefore useless in Mr. Moore to wish to repair thither. He is in consequence gone to Constance, where he awaits fresh orders from his Government.

Paris, Dec. 23.—Two English travellers lately presented themselves before the Mayor of Orleans. One of them was in liquor, and conducted himself in a most indecent manner, and was guilty of such excesses, that the Licut. of the Gendarmerie was under the necessity of arresting him. The person arrested immediately complained to Lord Whitworth, who, concerned at the misconduct of the Englishman, and struck with the moderate proceedings of the prefect, wrote to that magistrate a most polite letter, in which he requests him (notwithstanding the dissatisfaction he might feel upon this occasion) to continue to treat his countrymen with that politeness which is peculiar to him. The conduct of the ambassador is certainly very different from that of the member of parliament who wished to have the prefect of the police at Paris brought to the bar of the House of Commons, because he arrested Capt. D'Auvergne. The inquiry which it was proposed to make upon this subject, is only worthy of the little theatres on the Boulevards.

SUMMARY OF POLITICS.

The moment the disgraceful terms of the Preliminaries of Peace were known, and the more disgraceful principle which yielded to those terms was considered, that very moment, or, to speak with a literal adherence to the fact, in thirteen days afterwards, we asserted, that, "in future, Europe would become to this country as much a terra incognita as the ideal continent in the South Seas." When we wrote this, it was impossible for us to foresee, it was, indeed, impossible for us to imagine, that the ministers, the very same ministers who then made a merit of abandoning the Continent, and whose pharisaical mob-courting partizans represented them as "too honest" to have any connections therewith, we could not conceive it possible that these ministers, contradictory as their measures had been, would, in less than twelve months from that time, send a sort of itinerant envoy to solicit connexions with the courts of the Continent, with the people of that terra incognita. Mr. Moore, whose happy return to England we announced in our last (p. 849) has, it seems, been on a voyage of discovery, and has been treated with much about the same hospitality that Captain Cook met with, at last, in the Friendly Islands.

The Moniteur, who is extremely jocular upon this subject, seems to have dogged poor Mr. Moore from place to place, till it saw him fairly off the Continent. If we are to believe the Moniteur (and, in this instance, we are afraid its statements are but too correct) the courts of Vienna, Stuttgart, Munich, Carlsruhe, and Cassel, all turned with contempt from the English envoy; and, indeed, had that envoy been the representative of the Hawkesburies and Addingtons only, we should say that those courts did well; but we cannot but lament, that our sovereign and our country should be thus exposed to insult and reproach; that England, whose friendship has heretofore been courted, whose name was wont to inspire such confidence, should now be so loathed and despised.—The account which the Moniteur gives of the peregrination of Mr. Moore may be false; but, until the object of his mission be known, until some sort of explanation be given by our ministers, who can contradict the Moniteur? The French government knows well that they dare not give that explanation; and, in the mean time, it is turning their silence to excellent profit. In fact, this mission of Mr. Moore seems to be the finishing stroke to their character: it has discovered to the world, that they retain a desire, after having abandoned the right, to interfere in the affairs of the Continent; that they wish to effect, by intrigue, designs which they have not the firmness to attempt openly, nor even to avow. Intrigue, indeed! They are finely calculated for circumventing Buonaparté! We have no very great opinion of their courage, but infinitely less of their diplomatic address, which, we dare say, is very far surpassed by that of the door-keepers of Talleyrand's office.*

Agreeably to our promise, we insert p. 875, the Article from the Moniteur, on which we bestowed some comments in our last Summary (p. 859.) The description of parties, with which this article begins, is almost entirely false; and, we are sorry we cannot say as much with respect to some other passages, levelled against the conduct of this country. The king's speech certainly hints, that England ought to have continental connexions, and upon this the Moniteur very justly points out the inconsistency of such a notion on the part of those who, "in concluding the peace, laid it down as a principle that all continental connexions were burthensome." It next observes, that "none of the English orators have explained, why England pretended to insulate herself from the Continent, in making peace, and why she now wishes to re-establish her influence there;" this, therefore, the Moniteur kindly undertakes to do for the convenience and use of the powers of Europe. "England," it says, "inveigles other powers to join her in war; she makes conquests during that war; she refuses to treat with her allies; but, at last, makes a separate peace, with all the advantages of a power that has made conquests, while she sacrifices the powers, who, at her instigation, had taken up arms." Such is the substance of the charge against this country; and, though it is in part unfounded, we are afraid, that, when the nations of Europe look at the situation of the Stadtholder, of the King of Sardinia, and of Portugal, reflecting, at the same time, that our "too honest" ministers boast of having acquired by the war Ceylon and Trinidad, the verdict, the universal verdict, will be against us.—"England," says our master, "is out of the Continent:—there let her remain:—Such is at present, and will continue to be, the first principle of European policy." This is truth. We may talk about looking at the Continent, keeping our eye upon the Continent: we may look till our eyes ache; set a foot on it, or enjoy any influence in its cabinets, we fear we never shall again, till after some dreadful shock has renovated the vigour of this nation. The gross misrepresentation which this article of the Moniteur contains, respecting some part of a speech of Mr. Windham, was noticed in our last (p. 860). It further observes, that Mr. Windham is greatly deceived in believing, that the destruction of England is the object of France; in proof of which it states, that "the French government has not uttered a word of hostility against England since the peace!!" But, perhaps, it does not conceive, that calling our king a rewarder of assassins ought to be regarded as hostile to England? Indeed, if the conduct and language of our ministers are the criterion of our feelings, nothing short of absolute blows can be looked upon as hostile. Returning to Mr. Windham:—it is curious enough to hear the Moniteur, that is to say, Buonaparté and his associates, it is curious to hear them expressing their fears that Mr. Windham should come into power, lest it should prove injurious to England. How good they are! How kindly anxious for our welfare! As the wolves said to the sheep: "Send away that suspicious growling dog that we may live together in harmony and love;" a proposition which seems, indeed, to have been heartily approved of by that sheep-like senator, whom the public papers represent as having said, "that he wished to see no change of ministry; because, as the present ministers were known to be of a peaceful disposition, if they were changed, such change might furnish a neighbouring power with a pretext for going to war with us." And thus the nation moutonière are to be led to the slaughter; nor have we any scruple to assert, that a people, amongst whom a sentiment so base as this can prevail, is formed to bend, and bend it must, beneath a foreign yoke. In speaking of the project of Mr. Fox (p. 344) for forcing himself into the ministry, we said: "only let the people (in their present degraded temper) be thoroughly convinced, that your exaltation is absolutely necessary to the preservation of peace, and the Hawkesburies will be summoned to surrender their places, upon precisely the same principle as that on which they surrendered Malta and the Cape." Speaking, on another occasion, of the commendations which Buonaparté had bestowed on "the present Ar- dent ministers," and on the change of tone which those commendations produced, we observed (p. 573) "This is now the altered tone of the prudent ministers; the safe politicians; the men with an hereditary disposition to office. They have long been aware of a design to supplant them; they know, that there is another set of statesmen working day and night to prevail on Mr. Pitt to cut off the thread of their existence; but, with Buonaparté at their back, they might bid defiance to the fatal sisters themselves." This opinion is now fully verified: Buonaparté has, in several articles of the Moniteur, taken care to give us to understand, that he approves of our present Ministers, and disapproves of those who may be looked upon as likely, in case of change, to succeed them: "We have too good an opinion of the present ministry, to believe that they would continue to follow that abominable system which was pursued with so much activity by Lord Grenville and his colleagues." Why not Mr. Pitt and his colleagues? It is remarkable, that Messrs Pitt and Dundas are not loaded with the hatred of Buonaparté, the whole honour of which is bestowed in Lord Grenville and Mr. Windham, who may well say to him, in the language of St. Bruno to the fiend, "thy curses are a blessing." The ministers, indeed, do not think them so: they like, and they seek, his applause: they feel the effect of his "good opinion:" they know that it would, even in spite of Mr. Pitt, keep them in their places: they think with us, that they have no dangerous rival but Mr. Fox; and, we desire our readers to observe, with what eagerness and anxiety they are endeavouring to show, that Mr. Fox has no feeling with respect to Buonaparté in which they do not amply participate. In short, we may yet affect to call ourselves independent, we may yet affect to triumph in a comparison between our situation and that of Holland and Spain; but, he who looks well into that situation, will find no cause for triumph. We some time ago cautioned our countrymen not to laugh at the poor Swiss being ordered to repair to Paris, in order to know the pleasure of Buonaparté with respect to their constitution: "Mock them not," (said we, p. 729) "mock them not, nor their Consulta; for, be you well assured, that, unless a great and speedy change takes place in the policy and conduct of this government, there will be a British Consulta at Paris before this day two years." Little did we then imagine, that the Citizen General Ney was, at that moment, saying nearly the same thing in Switzerland. "Il y a," said he to the Swiss, at Berne, "des gens parmi vous, qui veulent établir l'ancien régime; cela ne convient pas au Premier Consul. Des puissances étrangères s'y mêlent; mais cela lui est indifférent; ses grandes victoires le mettent au dessus d'elles; et s'il le trouve à propos, elles viendront à Paris recevoir ses ordres!" * England alone had attempted to interfere; and, therefore, to England alone this insolent intimation applies. Such is the answer to the ministerial remonstrance "in behalf of the injured Swiss:" such is the reply to the ministerial declaration, that they "would not suffer Buonaparté to destroy the independence of Switzerland!"

We have heard, that the ministers are about to give up Malta; and the pretext is, we are told, that Russia has, at last, accepted of the guarantee, which word, in the general change that has been made in the political dictionary, signifies no more than a mere recognition or acknowledgment. There are, however, it seems, two or three exceptions made by Russia, in the present instance. Amongst these, perhaps, is the quality of paramount sovereignty, which has, for ages, belonged to Naples. Then, it is said, that the garrison is to consist of Neapolitan troops, but that these troops are to be paid by France and Britain; that is to say, of course, Britain alone is to pay a garrison which will, in fact, be under the command of France!—Oh, the "prudent ministers!" Oh, the "safe politicians!"

Since the notice, which was given by Dr. LAURENCE, of a motion to be made, after the recess, relative to the ill-treatment of Capt. D'Anvergne, the ministers have caused the following paragraphs to be inserted in their demi-official paper, the True Briton: "We have been delicate about stating any thing respecting the affair of Capt. D'Anvergne, Duke of Bouillon; as a notice has been given respecting it in the House of Commons. Thus much, however, we believe we may say, that a proper representation has been made to the French government respecting it, and we have no doubt but that every reasonable satisfaction will be obtained." (True Briton, 18 Decr

* "There are some among you who wish to establish the ancient government. This does not suit the First Consul. Foreign powers interfere in your concerns; this is indifferently to his. His great victories have made him their superior; and it hereafter suits his convenience, they will repair to Paris to receive his orders."

"As this subject" [that of the treatment of Capt. D'Auvergne] "is now before the government, we abstain from making any further remarks upon it at present."—To say nothing of the insult to Capt. D'Auvergne and to the House of Commons, what a shameful attempt is here made to impose upon the public. A "proper representation" has now been made:—the subject "is now in the hands of government!" Why now? Why now! It was in the hands of government long before Dr. Lawrence gave his notice. Mr. Merry dispatched an express to London to inform the ministers of it. They were, more than two months ago put in possession of the subject in the most regular and authentic way; and, now, behold, when they are called upon by a member of Parliament to account for the neglect of their duty, for the scandalous prostration of the honour of the country, the moment they are put upon that responsibility, which belongs to their situation, which attaches to all their words and actions, they begin to anticipate, through the means of their hireling news papers, that discussion, which they well know they are not able fairly to meet.

The close of the parliamentary proceedings, previous to the adjournment, which has now taken place, have sufficiently demonstrated, the wavering councils, the opposite factions, the imbecility and want of union, which form the leading features of the present "prudent and safe administration." Two bills have been brought forward by the ministers themselves, which have both been defeated by their own awkward intrigues and inconsistency. To make this clear, we will endeavour just to shew the object of these two bills, and the fatal consequences, which are likely to arise to the nation at large from such drivelling folly.—The first, in its outward appearance, bore every mark of a wise and laudable measure: it proposed to rectify all the abuses in the Naval Department, and to place the future distribution of prizes on a better footing: it came into the world with honesty written on its front, and, therefore, notwithstanding its proguitor, every honest man was its friend. We ourselves were amongst its advocates, and we expressed our wish, that the same sort of vigilance might be extended to the General Post-Office. But, when we came to examine the measure more closely, and to make those enquiries, which, on such a subject, it was our duty to make, we found but too much reason to fear, that what we had mistaken for almost an excess of disinterestedness and patriotism, was, in reality, the last effort of vexation, arising from disappointed endeavours to remove a most deserving officer from the head of the navy board, in order to put one of the first lord's own creatures in his stead. This bill, however, was framed with so little knowledge of the fundamental laws of the country, and with so little communication with the law-officers of the crown; it was so secretly formed, and so studiously kept from the knowledge of the other members of the cabinet, that, when it made its appearance in Parliament, not only every lawyer in the lower House gave his opinion against it, but even the Attorney and Solicitor-General differed most widely in their construction of its clauses; and the most eminent professional men, friends to the minister, and pensioned by the crown, withdrew their support, upon the ground of the measure being too strong. Under these discordant opinions the bill was pired down; the most exceptionable clauses were struck out, and various amendments were made. It passed the Commons, and was sent up to the Lords. Here a most curious scene took place. Two of the Cabinet ministers, one of which was the Chancellor himself, declared it (and with great truth) to be the most arbitrary and unconstitutional attempt, that ever had been made. They struck out several parts, including even some of the amendments made by the Commons, erased the whole of the compulsory clause, substituted in its stead another, which reduced the bill to a nullity, and, in this shape, they sent it back to the lower House.—That the bill, in its present state, cannot answer the intention, or, at least, the professed intention, of the first Lord of the Admiralty, is pretty clear, because the commissioners possess no power to extort confession from supposed delinquents; and, therefore, as to any purpose of public utility, it might as well never have passed. But, it answers another sort of purpose full as well as it could possibly have done, had it never passed through the hands of the Chancellor, and had been adopted, in all its parts:—it provides for five friends of the immaculate Chancellor of the Exchequer, which five friends will, in all human probability, receive a handsome remuneration for travelling to the different ports, for holding committees, and for doing, in those committees, nothing at all. Nor is this the only evil that the public will feel on this account: clerks, stationary, lodgings, messengers, and the whole endless train of concomitant expenses, are to be defrayed, and the nation will thus have to pay about £12,000, or, perhaps, £14,000 a year for feasting Mr. Addington's friends, without even the possibility of reaping a single six-pence worth of benefit from their exertions. To suspect Mr. Addington of a job after his public prosecution of the foolish tinman of Plymouth for offering him a bribe, would be too presumptuous: after such a striking proof, not only of his purity, but also of his magnanimity, no one could suspect it. If it is not a job, however, it is so much like a job, that an uninformed person might possibly take it for one, and the very selection of the commissioners might, probably, be assigned as a reason for this mistake. In the first place, it is no very great compliment to the naval service to skip over seventy senior admirals to come at SIR C. POLE (who is to be chairman of this commission), eight of which admirals are members of parliament, and each individual of them is, in every particular, full as well qualified for the post as Admiral Pole. But, SIR C. POLE is the intimate friend of the Richmond Park Minister.—The second is a Welsh judge and a barrister of considerable practice. It cannot, therefore, be supposed, that he can so far neglect his own avocations and emoluments in Westminster Hall (to say nothing of the time spent in his judicial circuit), as to attend this board continually, as its legal mentor:—but he is “a friend of THE Family.” The third, MR. LAW, is a brother-in-law of one of the Lords of the Admiralty (while another of those Lords is a brother-in-law of Mr. Addington), whose feelings must be hurt, if his relation should be examined before this tribunal, and, therefore, he is very improperly placed there. If, however, no such feelings exist, the word job does not seem very inapplicable to the appointment. The fourth is a MR. FORD; and here we should have been totally at a loss to know what to say, had we not, after many baffled inquiries, at last, fortunately succeeded in discovering, that this gentleman has the all-compensating recommendation of being “a friend of THE Family,” and, lest that general term should not be understood by those of our readers who live at a distance from the town of Reading, in the county of Berks, be it known, that “THE Family” means the illustrious family of the Addingtons, and that this Mr. Ford is the younger son of Mr. Ford, the celebrated Accoucheur! If this does not savour of a job, at least it smells very strongly of the shop.—The fifth is CAPTAIN NICHOLLS, a most worthy officer, whose name appears to have been inserted through mere shame, and fear of reproach; for, as the bill originally stood, only one sea-officer was nominated, a circumstance, which was noticed by Lord Temple, and, therefore, amended by the insertion of Captain Nicholls's name.—So much for that purity and economy, that desire to correct and reform, which have been held forth as the qualities and motives of the measure in question.—It has been said (and with no small degree of confidence) that this can be no job, because no fixed salary is attached to the commission: as if the commissioners would be more independent and upright, because they are to depend for a remuneration upon the breath of those, who have appointed them, and who may, without any great violence to the laws of probability, be supposed very likely to proportion the reward to the degree of submission which the commissioners may show to their will.*—Before we quit this subject we must just notice two facts, which have come to our knowledge, and which will enable our readers to form some judgment of the much-boasted public spirit and economy of the First Lord of the Admiralty. The Builder of Plymouth might be guilty of crimes: the necessity for dismissing him might be evident enough; but the necessity of replacing him (contrary to all the long-established rules of the dock-yards) by a man who had never been in the King's service, does not appear quite so evident, until we find his successor to be Mr. Tucker, brother to Lord St. Vincent's late confidential secretary, who is now a Commissioner of the Navy.—So much for public spirit!—This Mr. Tucker, the new Builder, was attending the Lords of the Admiralty in their late examination at Plymouth, when Lord St. Vincent desired him, with a view to save expense, to send out the ship Mars without repairing her. Mr. Tucker readily complied, though against the advice and remonstrances of all the persons of experience in the yard. The ship was forced out, and her back broken; to repair which will cost not less than four thousand pounds:—So much for economy!

The second bill, which has again discovered the rent in that wretched piece of patch-work, the present “prudent ministry,” is of

far greater magnitude, as the blunders, delays, and want of concert, which have occurred in its progress, will not only be attended with a most heavy and unnecessary expence to a considerable portion of the manufacturers of the kingdom; but, may, eventually, contribute towards putting a stop to our greatest article of trade, and transfer that trade, in part, at least, to the hands of the French republic. Indeed, so flagrant has been the mismanagement in this instance, that persons unware of the incapacity of the ministers even in the most ordinary concerns, would really believe, that the sacrifice of our woollen trade was to be one of the many humiliating concessions, which are yet to be made to the First Consul, in order to insure to us the blessings of that peace, which, "under Divine Providence," Mr. Addington was (as he told the jigging misses and negus-swigging fidlers of Reading) "the humble instrument of obtaining for his country."—But to the point:—The object of the bill, of which we are now speaking, was, to suspend the operation of certain obsolete, or, at least, ancient, acts of parliament, passed in the infancy of our clothing trade, when the manufacture itself, as well as the commerce in it, were totally different from those of the present day; and, therefore, those acts are not only inapplicable, at present, but they actually subject the manufacturer to the forfeiture of many of the sorts of cloths now made, if he attempt (as he daily does) to export them. There are several other regulations, in these old acts, relative to apprentices, &c. which it is impossible to enforce, without utter ruin to the cloth manufactory. Yet, these laws, as in the case of the non-residence of the clergy, have furnished a handle for informers to an amazing extent. The consequence of this is not only a stagnation of work, but an absolute suspense of a considerable portion of the export of our great staple manufacture. The weavers, who are subject to penalties and harassing prosecutions in this country, must and will seek for employment elsewhere; and, though the evil may not become extensive in a short space of time, there is no doubt but Louviers, Abeville, and all the First Consul's clothing towns, will be ready to receive them with open arms *. To prevent this, the treasury themselves brought in a temporary bill of suspension, which was passed, without a single objection through the House of Commons. But, as if it were doomed, that no one act of this miserable ministry should pass without a blunder; as if Providence, in order to punish them for their vanity and presumption, had resolved to make themselves alone the instruments of their downfall, no consultation, no intercourse, no communication upon the subject had taken place amongst them; and when this necessary, this important, this urgent bill, was carried to the Lord's by the secretary of the Treasury, the Chancellor and one of the Secretaries of State appeared its ostensible and determined opponents! We are far from imputing any blame to these two most honourable men, whom we have always lamented to see in such company. A bill suspending ten or a dozen laws was not to pass a Chancellor before he had had time to consider of its provisions.—Another instance of this sort was observable in the answer which Lord Pelham gave, relative to Capt. D'Auvergne, as noticed in p. 797. It was evident to every one, that his lordship had never been made acquainted with the real state of that case.—Such, then, are some amongst the more recent proofs of the weakness and incapacity of the Richmond-Park ministry. "A house divided against itself cannot stand;" and that this sort of one may not, must, we think, be the sincere prayer of every man in the world, except Buonaparté and the "friends of THE family."

Mr. J. H. Addington has accepted of the Chiltern Hundreds, and we most sincerely wish that hundreds may be all he has in view. We sometime ago jokingly proposed, that Mr. Hely should be put to school, to prepare him for the Bishoprick of Durham, which is universally allowed to be the best thing in England; and we are really half afraid, that "the family" has taken the hint.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MR. COBBETT'S long-promised letter to MR. WILBERFORCE was ready for insertion, but was obliged once more to give way to the Invincible Standard.—Several Correspondents shall be attended to in our next.—This Number closes the SECOND VOLUME, the Supplement and Index to which will be published on the 15th of January.

N. VANSITTART.

Whitehall, Treasury Chamber, 14th May 1802.

Report of the Commissioners appointed for the Sale of the Land-tax.

To the Hon. the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, in Parliament assembled.—“The Lords Commissioners for regulating, directing, approving, and confirming all sales, and contracts for sale, made by bodies politic or corporate, or companies, for the purpose of redeeming their land-tax,” have received his Majesty’s directions to lay before the House of Commons a statement of their proceedings, distinguishing the number and value of the sales, and contracts for sale, approved by the said Commissioners; the amount of land-tax redeemed, or to be redeemed, by virtue of such sales, and contracts for sale; the quantity of stock purchased by the produce of such sales; the gain to the public resulting from the proceedings under the said commission; the expense incurred, and the estimated value of the entire property of which the tenure has been, or will be changed, by the effect of such sales, or contracts for sale;

And the said Commissioners report accordingly:—I. By an act passed the 21st March 1799, “to amend and render more effectual the preceding acts for the redemption and purchase of the land-tax,” it was made lawful for his Majesty to appoint seven persons of his Majesty’s Most Hon. Privy Council, to be Commissioners for regulating, directing, approving, and confirming all sales, and contracts for sale, made by bodies politic or corporate, or companies, for the purposes of redeeming any land-tax charged on any of the manors, messuages, lands, tenements, or hereditaments, belonging to such bodies politic or corporate, or companies.—And his Majesty, by letters patent under the great seal of Great Britain, bearing date the March 1799, nominated and appointed the Right Hon. William Lord Auckland, the Right Hon. Henry Addington (then Speaker of the House of Commons), the Right Hon. William Pitt, the Right Hon. the Master of the Rolls (now Lord Alvanley), the Right Hon. Sir William Wynne, Knight, the Right Hon. the Lord Chief Baron, and the Right. Hon. Sylvester Douglas (now Lord Glenbervie), for the purposes of the said recited act, and with authority to any two or more of the said Commissioners to do any act, matter, or thing, which by the said commission the said Commissioners are authorized to do: and various legislative provisions have since been made, to facilitate and extend the operation and effect of the said commission.—

II. The Lords Commissioners, on the 29th March 1799, severally took the oath prescribed by the act of Parliament, and afterwards entered upon the execution of their office. Their meetings have been continued from time to time by adjournments of more or less frequency, according to the nature and importance of the business to be transacted; and the Commissioners have acted with the advice of counsel, in such cases as have been thought to require professional assistance.—In adjusting and approving the terms and conditions of sale, it has been anxiously and invariably the objects of the Lords Commissioners to establish and maintain certain uniform principles calculated to prevent any improvident sales, and beneficial as well as safe to the property of the church, and of other corporate bodies, as far as might be compatible with the nature of the property to be disposed of, and with the different tenures to which that property might be subject.—Pursuing these principles, the Board have found it necessary to discuss many questions of intricacy and detail, with respect both to legal constructions and to modes of valuation.—Their minutes and decisions have been consequently very voluminous, and have been accurately and carefully entered and preserved.—The Lords Commissioners take this occasion to acknowledge the ready and efficient assistance and attention which they have experienced from time to time, from his Majesty’s law officers, from the Directors of the Bank, the Commissioners for the reduction of the national debt, and from the officers of the Bank of England.—The current business of the commission, as will appear in the two following sections of this Report, is gradually diminishing; still, however, it is considerable and important.—III. The number of sales, and contracts for sale, approved by the Commissioners, has been,

From the 29th March 1799 to 28th
March 1800	- - - 895 sales.
From the 29th March 1800 to 28th
March 1801	- - - 433 sales.
From the 29th March 1801 to 9th
June 1802	- - - 277 sales.
Total	- 1,605

IV. The value of the sales, and contracts for sale, was,

In the first of the above periods	£. 364,678
In the second	- - - 227,420
In the third	- - - 161,736
	£. 753,834

And the said sum of 753,834*l.* was obtained in the following proportions, from sales made by the different descriptions of ecclesiastical and other corporate bodies:

Archbishop of Canterbury and sixteen of the bishops	189,493	16	3
Deans and chapters	- 286,982	12	4
Rectors and vicars	- 100,187	3	10
Colleges and prebends	- 85,228	11	3
Lay corporations	- 91,942	11	1
	£. 753,834	14	9

V. The amount of land-tax redeemed, or to be redeemed, by virtue of such sales, and contracts for sale, cannot yet be stated with precision; as, in several instances, the money arising from sales approved and confirmed by the Lords Commissioners, has not yet been paid into the Bank.—Besides which, the property sold by the corporate bodies, being required by law to be sold free and discharged from land-tax, the land-tax has, in very many cases, by agreement between the parties, been freed by the lessee or purchaser at his expense.—It is therefore difficult to ascertain what amount of land-tax may have been redeemed by this part of the operation.—On the whole, however, the amount of land-tax redeemed by virtue of the aforesaid sales, and contracts for sale, may be estimated at 35,000*l.* per annum.—VI. The quantity of stock purchased by the Bank from the produce of such sales, is 1,013,000*l.*; exclusive of the sums not paid into the Bank, and also of sums not yet brought to account, amounting together by estimate to 200,000*l.* stock.—VII. The gain resulting to the public from the proceedings under the commission, consists most immediately in the one eleventh required by the acts to be paid to the public, beyond the value of the land-tax redeemed, and such gain cannot be stated at less than 110,000*l.* stock; and this is exclusive of the land-tax redeemed by the lessees and purchasers of many considerable parcels of the property sold to them. A further gain resulting to the public from the proceedings under the commission, is to be found in the general operation of the redemption of the land-tax, particularly by creating a daily demand of a certain proportion of stock, which can never be brought back into the market.—The effect of that circumstance is evidently beneficial, and public credit has been materially assisted, by thus withdrawing from the market nearly twenty millions of stock, in little more than three years, for the redemption of land-tax.—VIII. There are also other descriptions of gain to the public, which are not inconsiderable, when collectively taken, by the accumulation of the one eleventh beyond the amount of the land-tax sold; by the saving of the allowances to the receivers general; by the stamps on renewal of leases, and on conveyances of settled leasehold estates.—And in a more indirect point of view, the sales made by the proceedings under the commission may be considered as beneficial to the public, by giving local accommodation to the purchasers, by multiplying the means of improvement, and by increasing the revenues of the corporate bodies, in some instances very considerably.—IX. The expense incurred has been restricted within the narrowest limits, to the salaries of a chief secretary, assistant, and clerks; the fees of counsel, the rent of the office, and certain small incidents; the whole amounting, on the average of three years, to about 1,550*l.* per annum.—X. The value of the entire property, of which the tenure has been changed by the effect of the sales, and contracts for sale, has been computed to be not less than three times the amount of the whole sum received. Assuming this computation to be well founded, the amount sold or contracted for being 753,834*l.* the value in fee of the whole property transferred from corporate bodies will be 2,261,502*l.*—The prices approved in sales, and contracts for sale, have varied from six to nine years purchase, for the reversion in fee of lands and tithes under leases for three lives; from eight to fourteen years purchase for the reversion in fee of leases for twenty-one years; five years purchase has been taken for houses let for thirty years, and three years for the reversion in fee of leases for forty years; reserved rents, and property not let on beneficial leases, have been sold from twenty-five to thirty years purchase.—XI. There cannot be a doubt that these sales are convenient to purchasers, advantageous to the sellers and their successors, and highly beneficial to the public in general; and therefore the Lords Commissioners would gladly have added to this Report, some estimate of the proportion of land-tax payable, and not yet redeemed by the bodies corporate.—It is, however, difficult to arrive at any certainty in this part of the inquiry. It is probable that the proportion of land-tax redeemed by the corporate bodies and their lessees, may exceed the proportion as yet redeemed by other descriptions of property chargeable with land-tax; still, however, it may be estimated that more than two thirds remain unredeemed.—XII. The general results may be stated to be: that the number of sales approved is 1,605; that the amount in money of such sales so approved, is 753,834*l.* sterling; that the value in fee simple of the property sold, is about 2,000,000*l.* sterling; that the stock purchased for the redemption of land-tax, under the proceedings of the Commissioners, is about 1,200,000*l.*; that the whole expense to the public has been 5,400*l.*; that the gain to the public, by the operation, has not been less than 110,000*l.* stock; exclusive of the other benefits explained and detailed in this Report.

By order of the Lords Commissioners,
10th June 1862. W. YOUNG, Secretary.

Inspector General's Office of Imports and Exports, Dublin, February 28th, 1802.

ROBERT MARSHALL,

Inspector General of Imports and Exports of Ireland.

There is no declared value for Ireland; as the merchants exporters here are not obliged to declare the real value, as has been the practice in England, in consequence of the convoy act. The Inspector General has, however, made an account of the real value, by computing the quantity of each article exported, according to the price current in Ireland, on which rates the value of Irish produce and manufactures exported from Ireland to all parts, amounted in the year 1800, to 5,654,365*l.* 10*s.* 6*d.* and in the year 1801, 5,001,370*l.* 15*s.* 4*d.*

The account of the value up to 5th January last, is preparing with as much dispatch as the nature of the statement will admit of.

The returns from many of the ports in the plantations being unreceived, and others which are received standing in need of correction, that part of this Account which relates to the year 1801, is from that cause unavoidably defective ; but I conceive that the defect is not equal to the amount of shipping belonging to those ports, because it always happens, that when the returns from all the ports in the British empire are collected together and checked by each other, some alterations become necessary in most of them, owing to the circumstance of vessels being registered de novo at ports to which they did not formerly belong, without the knowledge of the officers at such former ports ; I therefore do not presume to lay this Account before the House, as correct with respect to that year.

The accounts of ships employed in the foreign trade, being prepared from general returns, transmitted from the out-ports for each separate year ending the 5th January, the Register General could not make up this Account in the terms of the order, viz. to the 5th July in each year, without incurring a considerable delay, which the obtaining of fresh returns from the out-ports of England and Scotland would unavoidably occasion.

ODE for the new Year, 1802. By HENRY JAMES PYE, Esq. Poet Laureat.

Lo, from Bellona's crimson car
At length the panting steeds unbound;
At length the thunder of the war
In festive shouts of peace is drown'd:
Yet as around her Monarch's brow
Britannia twines the olive bough,
Bold as her eagle-eye is cast
On hours of recent tempest past;
Through the rude wave and adverse gale,
When free she spread her daring sail,
Immortal Glory's radiant form
Her guiding load-star through the storm;
Directed by whose golden ray,
Through rocks and shoals she kept her steady way;
"My sons," she cries, "can Honour's guerdon claim,
"Unsoil'd my parent worth, unstain'd their Sovereign's fame?"

Albion! though oft by dread alarms
Thy native valour has been tried,
Ne'er did the lustre of thy arms
Shine forth with more refulgent pride
Than when, while Europe's sons, dismay'd, Shrunk recant from thy mighty aid;
VOL. II.

Alone, unfriended, firm you stood,
A barrier 'gainst the foaming flood.
When mild and soft the silken breeze
Blows gently o'er the rippling seas,
The pinnace then may lightly sweep
With painted oar the halcyon deep:
But when the howling whirlwinds rise,
When mountain billows threat the skies;
With ribs of oak the bark must brave
The inroad of the furious wave;
The hardy crew must to the raging wind
Oppose the sinewy arm, th' unconquerable mind.

In every clime where ocean roars,
High though thy naval banners flew;
From where by Hyperborean shores
The frozen gale ungenial blew,
To sultry lands that Indian surges lave,
Atlantic isles and fam'd Canopus' wave;
Though from insulted Egypt's coast
Thy armies swept the victor host,
From veteran bands where British valour won
The lofty walls of Ammon's godlike son:
Useless the danger and the toil
To free each self-devoted soil.
Auxiliar legions from thy side
Recede, to swell the Gallic conqueror's pride:
N n

While on Marengo's fatal plain,
Faithful to honour's tie, brave Austria bleeds in vain.
Not fir'd by fierce Ambition's flame,
Did Albion's monarch urge his car
Impetuous through the bleeding ranks of war,
To succour and protect his nobler aim,
His guardian arm, while each Hesperian vale,
While Lusitania's vine-clad mountains hail
Their ancient rights and laws restor'd,
The royal Patriot sheaths th' avenging sword;
By heaven-born Concord led, while Plenty smiles,
And sheds her bounties wide to bless the sister isles.

JAMES PYE, Esq. Poet Laureate.*

No more the thunders of the plain,
The fiery battle's iron show'r,
Terrific, drown the dateous strain
That greets our Monarch's natal hour;
Peace, soaring high on seraph wings,
Now strikes her viol's golden strings;
Responsive to the thrilling note,
Symphonious strains of rapture float.
While grateful myriads in the Pan join,
And hail her angel voice, and bless her form divine.

Through many a whirlwind's blast severe,
The rage of elemental war,
Stern heralds of the opening year,
Sol urges on his burning car;
'Though dark the wintry tempest hours,
Though keen are April's icy show'rs,
Still, still his flaming coursers rise,
Till high in June's refulgent skies
'Mid the blue arch of heav'n he victor rides,
And spreads of light and heat the unextinguish'd tides.

Glory's true sons, that hardy race,
Who bravely o'er the briny flood,
Smiling serene in danger's face,
Uncheck'd by tempest, fire, and blood,
Britain's triumphant flag unfurl'd,
The terror of the wat'ry world,
Now freely to the fav'ring gale
Of commerce spread the peaceful sail,
And friendly wait from ev'ry shore,
Where Ocean's subject billows roar,
The gifts of Nature, and the works of toil,
Produce of ev'ry clime and ev'ry soil.
The Genius of the sister isles
On the rich heap exulting smiles,
"Mine the prime stores of earth's remotest zone,
"Her choicest fruits and flow'rs, her treasures all my own."

Nor second you 'mid glory's radiant train,
Who o'er the tented field your ensigns spread:
Whether on Lincelles' trophied plain
Before your ranks superior numbers fled;
Or on Ierne's kindred coast
Ye crush'd invasion's threat'ning host;
Or on fam'd Egypt's sultry sands
The banner tore from Gallia's vet'ran bands;
Your sinewy limbs with happier toil
Now till your country's fertile soil,
Now with keen scythe the fragrant vale,
Or whirl aloft the sounding flail,
Or bow with many a sturdy stroke,
King of our groves, the giant oak;

Or now the blazing hearth beside,
With all a soldier's honest pride,
To hoary sires and blooming maidens tell Of gallant chiefs who fought, who conquer'd, or who fell.

Yet, in the arms of Peace reel'd,
Still flames the free, the ardent mind;
And should again Seditious' roar
Or hostile inroad threat our shore,
From Labour's field, from Commerce' way,
Eager would rush the strong, the brave,
To form an adamantine zone Around their patriot Monarch's throne.
But long with Plenty in her train
May Concord spread her hallowed reign,
And join with festive voice the lay sincere Which sings th' auspicious morn to Britain ever dear.

MR. PITT'S STATUE.

UNDER this head we have collected together the various articles which appeared in the different public prints upon the subject of the statue proposed to be erected in honour of Mr. Pitt. This statue is in itself a thing of no earthly importance; but when considered as an instrument of party, it becomes worthy of notice; and will, doubtless, form an object of attention with the biographer and the historian. To the articles respecting the statue, we think it right to add those relative to the first public celebration of Mr. Pitt's birthday; and, while we are about it, we shall give a place to the articles respecting Mr. Addington's birthday, and a statue which, it would seem, the people of Edinburgh (resolved not to be outdone by those of London) are about to erect in honour of Mr. Dundas.

Lloyd's Coffee-house, May 8, 1802.—A subscription is opened for erecting a statue of the Rt. Hon. Wm. Pitt, late First Lord of the Treasury, and Chancellor of the Exchequer, for his distinguished and valuable services, which he has rendered to his country during the course of his able and upright administration.

Lloyd's Coffee-house, May 18, 1802.—At a general meeting of the subscribers for the erection of a statue of the Rt. Hon. Wm. Pitt, for the distinguished services which he has rendered to his country during the course of his able and upright administration; J. J. Angerstein, Esq. in the chair; Resolved, that the money subscribed and to be subscribed for the above purpose, shall be vested in trustees, to be hereafter appointed, to be applied by them in such manner as they shall think expedient in the erection of a statue or monument to the memory of the Rt. Hon. Wm. Pitt, after his demise; and in the mean time to accumulate. The chairman having reported, that the money already received has been laid out in the 3 per cents, Res. that the said money, together with future subscriptions, shall for the present be vested in the funds, in the names of Earl Spencer, J. J. Angerstein, T. Bonar, Esqrs. Lord Belgrave, and S. Thornton, Esq. M. P. Res. that the subscription shall continue open only for a limited time, to be hereafter specified. Res. that a gen. meeting of the subscribers shall be held on Thursday, the 3d of June, at the London Tavern, at 12 o'clock precisely, to confirm or alter the above resolutions. Res. that the thanks of the meeting be given to the chairman.

Statue of Mr. Pitt.—London Tavern, June 3.
—At a gen. meeting of the subscribers for erecting a statue of the Rt. Hon. Wm. Pitt, convened for the purpose of confirming or altering the resolutions passed at a gen. meeting held at Lloyd's Coffee-house on the 18th of May last; J. J. Angerstein, Esq. in the chair; Resolved, that the first resolution of the last meeting, postponing the erecting of a statue till Mr. Pitt's demise be rescinded. Res. that the money subscribed, and to be subscribed, be applied, when the subscription shall be closed, to the erection of a statue of the Rt. Hon. Wm. Pitt, in testimony of public gratitude for the eminent services rendered by him to his sovereign and his country, during the course of his most able, upright, and arduous administration. Res. that the subscription be kept open long enough to afford every individual in the Brit. empire an opportunity of subscribing. Res. that on the last Thursday in May 1803, a gen. meeting shall be called for the purpose of nominating a committee to carry the above resolutions into effect. Res. that the second resolution of the last gen. meeting, purporting that the subscriptions be vested in the funds, in the names of Earl Spencer, J. J. Angerstein, T. Bonar, Esqrs. Lord Belgrave, and S. Thornton, Esq. M. P. be confirmed. Res. that the thanks of this meeting be given to the chairman.

J. J. ANGERSTEIN, Chairman.

To the Editor of the True Briton.—SIR, I address you as the public orator. With considerable indignation I read in your paper, that at a meeting held the 18th inst. at Lloyd's coffee-house, it was "Resolved, that the money subscribed for a statue of the Rt. Hon. Wm. Pitt shall be applied in the erection of a statue or monument to his memory, after his demise." So imprudent, so improper a proposal, could not be made by a friend to Mr. Pitt: some Fox must have got among the lambs to do away the public zeal by so ill-timed an attempt, for only an attempt can I suppose it to be. Is there a subscriber but expected that his money would be immediately applied to the declared purpose? If that be so, how can any majority, assembled at any time or place, change the original intention, without returning, invidiously, to the disappointed their subscriptions, who undoubtedly hoped to see the monument of their gratitude? I have no doubt but that Mr. Pitt will, during his life, persevere in that honourable, that glorious line of conduct he has hitherto pursued: then let us leave it to our descendants to give another proof of their affection for, and gratitude to him. Mr. Pitt is a young man (a fault objected to him some years ago by the man I could almost suspect has thrown this apple amongst us). How very few of us have a chance, none a hope, to see the monument now proposed to be hereafter erected at their cost? Such an incitement is not necessary to keep Mr. Pitt steady in the path he has pursued; but surely it is good policy to stimulate others by his bright example, by the hopes of a similar honour; and the sooner that incitement is held out the better. I will trouble you no further than to enter my protest against this new and extremely unfortunate proposal, being one of your constant readers, and to an immediate statue

To the Editor of the True Briton.—SIR, I address you not "as the public orator," in the language of your correspondent, "A Ready Subscriber," but as the reputable conductor of a public paper. "With considerable indignation" I read the letter of a Ready Subscriber on Friday last; as a more wanton attack was never made, than that which it attempts against the resolution of a most respectable meeting of gentlemen at Lloyd's coffee-house. Neither the style nor the ideas of your correspondent are calculated to impress the public mind with a belief that he is a very sincere friend of Mr. Pitt; but rather, to use his own phraseology, "a Fox got among the lambs," who, with the profession of great zeal, discovers some disingenuous motives lurking at the bottom. This "ready gentleman" insists, that if the money subscribed be not immediately applied to the erection of a statue to Mr. Pitt, it ought to be returned to the subscribers. This is not altogether so clear as the writer imagines it to be: waving this, however, as it seemed expedient (for many reasons not necessary to be specified here) to the general meeting of the 18th, to fix upon the demise of Mr. Pitt as the proper period for erecting the statue or monument in question, it is not probable that any person, except perhaps a "Ready Subscriber," will wish on that account to return his subscription into his pocket. He "hoped," however, "to see the monument," and therefore subscribed. But he has, and I trust will long have, the pleasure of seeing the original; and surely the original is better than the copy, as long as it remains in a state of preservation. Statues are commonly erected in honourable memory of great men, as a record of their eminent services, and an incitement to others to emulate such illustrious examples: but monuments of this nature could not, with much propriety, be erected to the memory of a living character. Scarcely an instance occurs in modern times, of statues erected during the life of the individuals: in ancient times, indeed, they are sufficiently frequent; but the fate of those monuments shews that they usually originated in slattery or fear; since, on the demise of the monarch or minister to whom they were erected, they were usually thrown down, defaced, and flung with scorn into the Tiber. With life, flattery and fear expire; and nobler and juster motives of action prevail in their turn. Enough of this: but I would ask this gent. if he can suppose, for a moment, that a statue now erected to Mr. Pitt would wholly escape a midnight mutilation from some of those enemies who have been created by those very splendid and meritorious services for which the statue is proposed? Buonaparté's guard of honour would be insufficient to secure it from the secret and reiterated attacks of the disappointed, the malicious, and the revengeful. Besides, what real friend of Mr. Pitt can imagine that it would be grateful to his feelings, to that genuine modesty which always accompanies true merit, and which increases in proportion to that merit, to become the spectator of his own statue, either in its state of elevation or depression? In truth, Sir, there is such an air of ridicule attached to the proposition for "an immediate statue," that I trust your correspondent, anxious for it as he appears to be, will submit, with the rest of the subscribers, to the restraint of not beholding the copy while the original is before his sight, and lives in the eyes and hearts of his grateful countrymen.—I am, Sir, An Enemy to an immediate Statue, and a Friend to the Resolution of the Meeting at Lloyd's. May 23, 1802.

Mr. Pitt. (True Briton, June 21, 1802).—We never thought our countrymen deficient either in justice or gratitude, but we should have doubted the correctness of our judgment on these points, if the people could have suffered Mr. Pitt to retire, after his long and arduous services, without testifying those public marks of approbation, which do no less honour to those who confer, than to him who is the object of them. The moment which has been chosen for evincing this feeling is as fit as the thing itself is just and becoming. To have expressed thanks to Mr. Pitt at the moment of his resignation might have savoured too much of party spirit, might have looked even like an opposition to the exercise of the undoubted prerogative of the King in the choice of his ministers: but to have waited till all such feelings must have subsided—to have seen the effects which his measures have produced in the attainment of peace, to have witnessed his great and disinterested conduct on that question itself, is to have sought the period when every praise which can be bestowed, when every testimony of applause which can be given, is offered with additional weight and recommendation. With a great majority of our countrymen, we believe, that it is to this identical Wm. Pitt that we owe at this moment the existence of our constitution. We believe that it is to the energy of his mind that we are indebted for having been able to struggle with the complicated difficulties which the French revolution presented to us. Is it then because he was thwarted in a measure, upon the adoption of which the ablest and best intentioned men may conscientiously differ in opinion—a measure approved by some of the greatest men of both parties—a measure which he thought essential to the safety of the empire—and which, if the war had continued, some people think we might have found to have involved in its consequences a question of no less importance than whether Ireland should have been preserved or lost to us—is it, we ask, because at a moment when he thought this measure so important, and was prevented from carrying it, he thought fit to retire, that we are therefore to forget all the services he had rendered his country for 17 years before? Is there a man who doubts, that if he had employed that period in the avocations of that profession in which he first set out, his great and transcendent abilities would have led to the highest honours and emoluments? And will the people of this country suffer such a man, the man who has saved us, to retire unnoticed, because in saving us he has adopted measures which some persons do not approve, but which they do not approve only because they choose to consider them abstractedly, and independent of the necessity in which they originated? The measures which have drawn down upon Mr. Pitt the severest animadversion of his enemies, are those which have been adopted for the preservation of our independence and the protection of our constitution.—The great difference, however, upon these points is not so much as to the propriety of the measures themselves, as to the existence of the necessity from whence they arose. Those who think that the meetings of Chalk Farm, of St. George's Fields, and of Copenhagen House, were harmless assemblies, will not think that we required Acts of Parliament to prevent such meetings; and those who think that Mr. Jackson, Mr. O'Connor, Mr. O'Coigley, Mr. Tone, Ld. Ed. Fitzgerald, &c. &c. were good and loyal subjects, will not think that any bill against traitors could be framed with any other view than for the purpose of wantonly infringing the constitution. But the sober part of the community may perhaps feel that it was not a culpable act in Mr. Pitt's administration to guard against such men; and that after the Opposition had been in a body to Maidstone, on a certain memorable trial, they would have wiped away some suspicious stains, and would have raised their own characters, if, on their return, they had renounced their opinions, and had acknowledged the necessity of such measures. The income-tax, however, is said to have been a most odious measure—but if it had not been imposed, could we have carried on the war? And would not the terms which the enemy would have imposed upon us, have been ten thousand times more odious? But this is a way in which those who condemn it never choose to consider the subject—they tell us it was ill-collected, evaded, unequal, and oppressive; but they never tell us that any other tax to the same amount would have possessed less of these objections; nor do they venture to assert, that at the time it was imposed we could have made peace without throwing ourselves on the mercy of our enemies. Most artful attempts have been made to induce Mr. Addington to think that every compliment which is paid to Mr. Pitt is a censure upon himself. Those men know little of Mr. Addington who suppose, that they can thus work upon his passions, and set them at variance with his reason and his judgment. This attempt did not succeed in the House of Commons, nor will it succeed elsewhere; Mr. Addington knows well that there is no inconsistency in a person approving of every act of Mr. Pitt's administration, in thinking that his measures have actually saved the country, and, at the same time, not attaching so much importance to the giving or refusing the remaining privileges to the Catholics, even during a war with France, as Mr. Pitt does. Mr. Addington is not more united with Mr. Pitt by the ties of personal friendship than he is by similarity of sentiment upon all the great political questions which have been produced by the extraordinary events of the last ten years. But it was not enough for the enemies of Mr. Pitt to endeavour to excite Mr. Addington's opposition to any mark of approbation of his conduct; it was more than insinuated, that such approbation was not agreeable in a quarter where it is the grossest calumny to suppose that Mr. Pitt's services are either forgotten or undervalued. We have reason to know, that there is no man who appreciates more correctly, or values more highly, the services of which we have spoken, than the illustrious Personage to whom we allude. He will not readily forget what passed on Mr. Fox's India Bill, or what was done on the question of the Regency; but above all, he will never forget the efforts of the man who has guarded him and the nation from the dangers of the French revolution; and who, in so doing, has performed greater services than any other man had ever before an opportunity of rendering to his sovereign.

The Statue. (Morn. Chron. May 22, 1802.)—The erection of this monument of national gratitude is postponed for the present. Mr. Pitt has found out what it appears the subscribers could not find out—that there is some small impropriety in erecting a statue to a living character. This discovery was made by Lord Belgrave, on Tuesday, at a meeting of the subscribers. He had been instructed by Mr. Pitt to communicate his thanks, &c. and his wish that they would drop the design for the present. The company assented; but resolved that the statue should be erected at a future period when it should please Heaven to remove its born minister to those happy realms where services are rewarded by perpe- tuity of place, and resignations are unknown. It was farther resolved, that the money collected, which exceeds 3000 guineas, should be vested in the hands of trustees for the above purpose. This way of postponing gratitude, of deferring a passion time die, is a new one in the history of our feelings, and we suspect, in the case of a man who follows to precarious a trade as that of popularity may be somewhat dangerous. The die is cast, however, and Mr. Pitt is bound over to his good behaviour for life, under a penalty of 3000 guineas! In the mean time, that the subscribers' gratitude might not evaporate, or be lost in the multiplicity of changes and chances of this mortal life, each determined for himself to refresh the memory of Mr. Pitt's eminent services, by an occasional contemplation of the national debt, the taxes, and other little traits of his glorious administration, till the period arrive when they shall be more durably recorded by the chisel.

Mr. Pitt's Statue. (Morn. Chron. May 22, 1802.)—We hasten to inform our readers that the plan of subscription for Mr. Pitt's statue is wholly changed.—Instead of a money subscription, it is to be conducted by a picnic; that is to say, the various subscribers are, according to their zeal and ability, to contribute the several parts of the work. We are happy to hear that Mr. Dundas is to take the lead. Having, with his usual caution in changes of administration, carefully weighed the probabilities in favour of each party, he finds Mr. Pitt the favourite, and, consequently, he resumes his place with all speed. His contribution to the statue is a forehead of brass. Difficulties having arisen about constructing a proper nose, three worthy Aldermen, Curtis, Anderson, and Sir Watkin, are uniting their skill to fabricate one, with due attention to the tubercles. The eyes by the Bishop of Lincoln. They look different ways, as a statesman ought to do; one earnestly surveys the palace and the church, whilst the other is equally intent on the mob. He seems hesitating which to prefer. A strange story having been propagated, that the statue was to have a tongue, all the romance-writers were striving for priority. The thought was new, and at first pleased the conductors; but it was considered, that the tongue of the original was apt to change its shape, and therefore it was quite as well to conceal it in the statue. Mr. J. H. Browne, Sir R. Peel, and a number of country gentlemen, were for setting on his shoulders a great globe, representing the world; but the shoulders were too narrow and feeble. Besides, the only globe that could be found was marked with the word "Marengo," which would not have been pleasing to a British spectator. But the greatest contribution of all is of hands and arms. At least a thousand have been offered, in all different shapes and forms. It is remarkable, however, that most of them are for the left side. There are a few good pairs, indeed, with hooked fingers, fit for turning a pocket inside out, to denote Mr. Pitt's great skill in finance.—Mr. S. Thornton would have had a little Bank of England hard by, for the convenience of representing the admirable dexterity of the great statesman in converting her gold into rags. But the Bank has been too much exposed of late for so delicate a constitution; and therefore what relates to her will be better communicated on paper.—It is astonishing that nobody has yet come forward to supply the trunk of the body. Ld. Grenville's vigour, it seems, will not answer, and Ld. Hawkesbury's or Mr. Addington's vicarious form has not sufficient strength. Fortunately, Mr. Wilberforce has presented a cloak. Ld. Belgrave likewise offered one; but Mr. Wilberforce's is thicker.—The City wished to put a drawn sword in his hand; but the Bishop of Rochester thinks a whip will be more characteristic.—From the difficulty of imitating the legs, it is proposed to place him on his knees, "but not asking pardon of God or man."—The place is not yet fixed. Some would put him in one of the regal niches within the Royal Exchange; others in the front of the New Prison in Cold Bath Fields. But it is believed he will at last be brought to the Old Bailey.—It is much to be desired that the exhibition may be early, of which there are great hopes, the sheriffs having already provided the scaffolding and ropes.

The Statue.—(Morning Chron. May 24, 1802.)—We are happy to find that the few particulars in our paper of Thursday respecting Mr. Pitt's statue are in general correct. Every information on a subject of so much importance will no doubt be highly prized.—Many contradictory reports, however, may be expected. The subscribers hold frequent meetings, but, overpowered by the grandeur and dignity of the subject, they as frequently part without coming to any decisive resolutions.—The contributions mentioned in our paper of Thursday are pretty correct. It remains to be added, that the assessment on the noses of Aldermen Curtis, Anderson, and Lewes, is $2\frac{1}{2}$ pr. cent. Sir Watkin at first objected to this as unequal, for that his brother Anderson, with a freehold nose of six inches, would contribute no more than himself with three inches, renewable every hogshhead. This was over-ruled, however, by Ald. Curtis, who thought that it might tend to revive the memory of the Income-tax; although he was willing to allow that Sir John could at present spare a greater proportion, as there would be no further occasion to smell plots, which had been the bounden duty of every magistrate for some years.—Before the subscriptions came in so fast as at present, it was proposed that the statue should be made without arms, and with hands only appearing, which would be a great saving to the country. But this was opposed, as destroying the consistency of the figure; and it was urged, that although his hands were conspicuous enough, as most men knew by experience, yet they would have been nothing without his arms. The extreme length of the fingers was unanimously agreed on; but the committee came to no determination as to what he should be holding in them.—On the subject of posture there were long and ingenious debates. Sitting and standing were respectively canvassed. A good many were for lying; and an ingenious gentleman, whose name we could not learn, thought that if the figure could be made to move by a pivot from side to side, without any visible cause, it would be very characteristic, and more like the life.—It being generally agreed that the Colossal form is preferable, Mr. Kemble is to sit for the flesh, of which, from much experience in the best cattle, he is thought a very able judge.—The materials are to be contributed in the manner mentioned in our last, with the addition of some part in plaster of Paris, as the French gov. are expected to subscribe very largely to their best benefactor.—This statue being designed, not so much out of respect, for that is too cold a sentiment, but for the purposes of adoration, it has been proposed to instruct the city members to move for a repeal of that part of the second commandment which prohibits the "making of graven images," for a limited time, to be specified in the act. This will wisely obviate the objections of those who may have some scruples as to the worship of stocks and stones, and have hitherto been disposed to pay their addresses to a Minister incarnate.—All that can be gathered of ancient statuary has been consulted, and the Aldermen who are on the Nose Committee are to examine and report on the merit of the ancients, from Phidias to the unknown artist who made Nebuchadnezzar's celebrated image.—The pedestal is to have groups of little figures on each side, pointing to the principal figure, and holding out their hands. Most of these will be portraits; but of the disposition of them, no report can be made in the present stage of the business.

The Statue, an Epigram.—(Morning Chronicle.)

Shall then a statue rise to Pitt,
Who sunk us in despair?
Long since, ere on that rock we split,
Our course was smooth and fair;
Yet might we grant thy statue, Pitt,
Could we our grief forego;
Couldst thou at last, with all thy wit,
Place us in STATE-quo!

STERNHOLD AND HOPKINS.

To the Editor of the Morning Chronicle.—Sir, As you have admitted the poetry of my brothers Sternhold and Hopkins, I trust you will not refuse the following tribute to the virtues of our late heaven-born minister, though offered by a poor parish-clerk. I am, Sir, yours.

"Good Lord, how happy should I be,"

Cries John, "could I this statue see

"Erected to our Billy?"

"Bother!" says Pat; "why, neighbour John,

"Be all your sense and manners gone,

"You spake so wondrous silly?"

"The devil should pick me limb from limb

"Before I'd wish it rais'd to him

"Who caus'd our shame and sorrow."

"Patience, dear brother," John replies;

"I will not be rais'd before he dies:—

"I wish 't were done to-morrow."

AMEN!

To the Editor of the True Briton.—Sir, I think there is much weight in the arguments in a letter on Mr. Pitt's statue, by "A Friend to the Resolutions at Lloyd's;" but I must beg to make one remark, that a part of the objection against an immediate statue might be removed, if the figure were to be made of bronze instead of stone, which was probably intended, as the "midnight mutilation" would, in that case, be at least a much more difficult work, although disfiguration might still ensue; however, Sir, on the whole, I cannot but agree that it would be a much more decent, and full as honourable a testimonial of respect for the virtues of Mr. Pitt, and a more dignified monument to his fame, as well as more grateful, I should think, to his feelings, to erect the statue after his death than during his lifetime.

A SUBSCRIBER.

The Statue.—(Morning Chronicle, June 21.)

—It is not our fault that the public must have "more last words" on this subject. The friends of the scheme have changed their minds—the statue is to be erected, without waiting for any thing so uncertain as Mr. Pitt's demise, and which, if it were not uncertain, might, when it came, overwhelm his friends with such a weight of sorrow, that, instead of erecting statues, they would be for following him to the land of Forgetfulness.—At a late meeting, it was solemnly debated, and agreed nem. con. that the present was not to be sacrificed to the future, that we did not know enough of posterity to trust them with this great work, and that the impulses of gratitude were not things to be vested in the hands of trustees. The debates, or rather conversation, were long and serious; for, as a member observed, it was no less than a question of life and death.—A Committee of Precedents had been appointed to search for statues to living characters, and enough were produced to justify the practice; and it was likewise ingeniously discovered that a picture is but a statue on canvass, and that between an engraving and a bronze, the only difference was weight of metal.—Possibilities were taken into account, and it was observed that if Mr. Pitt should change his opinions, it was no more than he had done before, when the only consequence was, that his friends changed with him. As to his becoming worse, none of the subscribers would allow that to be in the smallest degree probable, or possible. Some thought there was a physical, and others a natural impossibility—but all concurred in the sempiternity of merit they were determined to discover in him in all time forthcoming.—The statue therefore is to be put in hand, but whose hand or whose head will be equal to the undertaking, it was thought presumptuous even to guess at. It seemed too vast for the common powers of human genius.—One member observed, that as the word statue had been bandied about too much, it should be called a monument; but this was over-ruled by a facetious Alderman present, who remarked that this would create great confusion to Mr. Pitt's admirers from the country, who, when they inquired for THE MONUMENT, would infallibly be shewn the way to Fish-street Hill.—The clamour and malignity of faction were properly noticed, and the danger of erecting the statue in any public place was weighed with great accuracy and eloquence by several speakers. To obviate this, it was proposed, that the statue should be erected in some very secure place, and no admission to see it granted, but to those who were well affected to Mr. Pitt's person and government. It was also proposed, that the place of erection should be concealed as much as possible, which the Alderman above mentioned said might be easily done, as they did not at present know it themselves.—The meeting dispersed after coming to the principal resolution, that the statue should be immediately erected, and that in the mean time subscriptions should be taken in as usual.

To the Rt. Hon. William Pitt, on the proposed Statue.

(True Briton, May 20, 1802.)—The Anniversary of the birthday of the Rt. Hon. William Pitt will be commemorated on Friday, the 28th of May, at the London Tavern.—Earl Spencer in the Chair.—Stewards, Marq. of Worcester, Earl of Euston, Earl Temple, Visc. Morpeth, Ld. G. L. Gower, Ld. Louvaine, Sir J. Wrottesley, Sir W. Lowther, Sir H. Mildmay, Sir R. Vaughan, Sir J. W. Stuart, Sir R. Peele, E. W. Bootle, Esq. W. R. Cartwright, Esq. W. Dickenson, Esq. J. Down, Esq. W. Egerton, Esq. Lt. Gen. Egerton, C. R. Ellis, Esq. R. Ellison, J. Fane, Esq. N. B. French, Esq. Francis Gregor, Esq. R. Milligan, Esq. W. Manning, Esq. T. Raikes, Esq. Hans Sloane, Esq. G. H. Sumner, Esq. S. Thornton, Esq. J. Tunno, Esq.—Tickets, one guinea each, to be had of Mr. Hatchard, No. 190, Piccadilly; and at the Bar of the London Tavern.

Mr. Pitt's Birthday.—(True Briton, May 29, 1802.)—Yesterday the anniversary of the birth of Mr. Pitt was for the first time publicly celebrated. It is here unnecessary for us to trace the causes that led to this event. They sprung apparently from a weak and wicked attempt to calumniate him when his talents have been so conspicuously displayed; but the sentiment of respect for his virtues, and gratitude for his public services, was so generally felt, and so deeply rooted in the hearts of all good men, that there wanted but the slightest occasion to call it forth into action. The attempt to sully his high and dignified fame was more than sufficient to awaken it, and it has accordingly displayed itself in every way that can be adopted consistently with the character of Mr. Pitt.—The demand for tickets for the celebration of his birthday anniversary was so great, that it was found the London Tavern would be inadequate to the accommodation of the company, and Merchant Taylors' Hall was procured for the occasion.—At 4 o'clock the company began to assemble, and in half an hour the whole body of the Hall was filled, a space which contained at least 500 persons. If we add to this number the comp. at the head table, and those who were in the galleries, not not less than 650 persons dined in the Hall. There were tables besides in two adjoining rooms for 200; so that the whole comp. consisted of 850 persons of the first respectability in the kingdom, for rank, character, and opulence.—A little after 6 dinner was served, and it was excellent in its kind. Turtle was in great abundance, and every delicacy which so large a company could expect. Earl Spencer was in the chair. Upon the cloth being removed, Non nobis was sung with their usual excellence by the Knyvetts, Gore, Nield, Sale, &c. Then followed the health of—"The King, with three times three," which was drank with the loudest acclamations of joy.—"The Queen, with three times three."

"The Prince and Princess of Wales, ditto."
 "The Duke of York, and the rest of the Royal Family, ditto."—"Mr. Pitt."—Earl Spencer prefaced Mr. Pitt's health by observing that that gent. had been invited by the committee and stewards to be present at the meeting on that day, but he had received a letter from him, which he would take the liberty of reading to the company; and the substance of which was, that he felt most deeply the honour which was done him; but as from the nature of the meeting, and the partiality of his friends, for which he was impressed with the most lively gratitude, he could not reconcile it to his feelings to be present; he entreated his Ldp. to offer his excuses to the comp. The letter was received with the loudest applause; and Mr. Pitt's health was drank with an enthusiasm which no language can adequately describe. It was the union of every grand, every grateful, every affectionate sentiment that can be felt and concentrated in the human mind, bursting consentaneously from 850 persons into action. The scene for a very long period was truly sublime. We will venture to assert, it never was presented in the same manner and degree before. The company was not satisfied with the common expressions of huzzaing and clapping of hands, but hundreds of handkerchiefs waved in the air, and produced an undescribable effect.—
 After the tumult of applause had subsided, the following song, written for the occasion (by G. H. Rose, Esq.), was sung by Mr. Dignum:

SONG.—To the tune of the Anacreontic.

To the statesman, whose genius and judgment
 matur'd,
 From Gallic ambition, 'midst Anarchy's cry,
 To his country her laws and her commerce secur'd,
 Can Britons the grateful memorial deny?
 No! just to his claim
 Of a patriot's name,
 They trust not his merit to posthumous fame;
 Remember with pride what by Chatham was done,
 And hallow the day that gave birth to his son.
 Rome's senate decreed to her worthiest citizens,
 With civic rewards she encircled their brows;
 To a true British worthy we pour out libations,
 While our senate her order of merit bestows:
 Amidst Europe's alarms,
 With persuasion's blest charms,
 Britain's councils he led, rous'd her heroes to arms;
 In the dread wreck of nations her empire maintain'd,
 Her spirit unconquer'd, her credit unstain'd.
 No Jacobin rites in our fête shall prevail.
 Ours the true feast of reason—the soul's social flow;
 Here we cherish the friend, and his virtues we hail,
 But the Gallic fraternal embrace disavow;
 Impress'd with his worth,
 We indulge in our mirth,
 And bright shines the planet that rul'd at his birth;
 Round the orbit of Britain, O! long may it move
 Like attendant satellites circling their Jove.
 Vol. II.

To the counsels of Pitt*, in an era that's past,
 Her high rank 'midst the nations this city may trace;
 Though his statue may moulder, his memory will last;
 "The great and the good live again in their race."
 Ere to time's distant day
 Our marble convey
 The fame that now blooms, and will know no decay,
 Our fathers' example our breasts shall inspire,
 And we'll honour the Son, as they honour'd the Sire.

The next toasts were,—“The wooden walls of Old England.”—“The army, militia, yeomanry, and volunteers of the United Kingdom.”—“The Lord Mayor, and prosperity to the city of London.”—The toast that succeeded was applicable to the occasion
 —“The pilot that weathered the storm.”—
 This was received by the company, if possible, with a warmer fervour of enthusiasm than marked the health of the individual alluded to, when it was drank by name. After this toast, Mr. Dignum sung the following song, composed for the occasion by the Right Hon.
 G. Canning:

If hush'd the loud whirlwind that ruffled the deep,
 The sky if no longer dark tempests deform;
 When our perils are past, shall our gratitude sleep?
 No—Here's to the pilot that weather'd the storm!
 At the footstool of Power let Flattery fawn;
 Let Faction her idols extol to the skies;
 To Virtue, in humble retirement withdrawn,
 Unbiam'd may the accents of Gratitude rise!
 And shall not his mem'ry to Britain be dear,
 Whose example with envy all nations behold;
 A statesman, unbiass'd by interest or fear,
 By pow'r uncorrupted, untainted by gold?
 Who, when Terror and Doubt through the universe
 reign'd, While Rapine and Treason their standards un-turld,
 The heart and the hopes of his country maintain'd,
 And one kingdom preserv'd 'midst the wreck of the world.
 Unheeding, unthankful, we bask in the blaze,
 While the beams of the sun in full majesty shine;
 When he sinks into twilight with fondness we gaze,
 And mark the mild lustre that gilds his decline.
 So, Pitt, when the course of thy greatness is o'er,
 Thy talents, thy virtues, we fondly recall;
 Now justly we prize thee, when lost we deplore;
 Admir'd in thy zenith, but lov'd in thy fall!
 O! take, then—for dangers by wisdom repell'd,
 For evils, by courage and constancy brav'd—
 O! take, for a throne by thy counsels upheld,
 The thanks of a people thy goodness has sav'd!
 And, O! if again the rude whirlwind should rise,
 The dawning of peace should fresh darkness deform;
 The regrets of the good, and the fears of the wise,
 Shall turn to the pilot that weather'd the storm!

To attempt to describe all the testimonies of the zealous attachment of the company to the illustrious cause of the meeting, would be to exhaust language, without conveying an idea of their effects. The loudest acclamations accompanied every allusion to Mr. Pitt, and so highly delighted were the hearers with the above song, that it was in the course of the evening repeated, as well as the toasts which preceded it.—Sir R. Peel rose, and proposed the health of the Noble Chairman, which was drank with great applause, and his Lordship, in very handsome terms, returned his acknowledgments.—The following toasts succeeded:—"The memory of Earl Howe, and the heroes of the 1st of June 1794."—"Earl St. Vincent, and the heroes of February 12, 1797."—"Viscount Duncan, and the heroes of Camperdown."—"Viscount Nelson, and the heroes of the Nile and Copenhagen."—"The memory of Sir R. Abercromby; and Lord Hutchinson, and the army of Egypt."—"The Throne, the virtue that fills it, and the councils that saved it."—This toast was received with particular marks of approbation and applause.—"The landed interest of the United Kingdom."—"The Master, Wardens, and Court of Assistants of Merchant Taylors' Company, and thanks to them for the use of their hall."—A little after ten o'clock the Noble Chairman left the chair, amidst the thanks and plaudits of the company, for the very able and satisfactory manner in which he had filled it. A large proportion of the company went away at the same time. The Marquis of Worcester took the chair after Lord Spencer had quitted it, and supported the spirit of the company that remained for a considerable time after, with good effect.—Never did we see so numerous a company so well arranged; never in any body of men, of whatever denomination, did we see such unanimity of sentiment; it was the genuine tribute, we may truly say, of honest feeling to transcendent talents and virtue.

True Briton, Jan. 3.—We have received several applications from correspondents to give to the public a correct list of the company that dined at Merchant Taylors' Hall, last Friday, in celebration of Mr. Pitt's birthday. The following is a pretty correct list of those who procured their tickets at Hatchard's, all of whom, we believe, were present at the dinner. To Earl Spencer. Chairman of the Meeting for the Celebration of Mr. Pitt's Birthday. (Morning Chronicle, May 28.)—My Lord, Observing your Lordship's name in an advertisement for the chair of an intended meeting for the celebration of Mr. Pitt's birthday, and also that it stands among the first of the subscribers to erecting a statue to him for his "able and upright administration," I feel myself irresistibly impelled to address a few observations to your Lordship, suggested to me by an occupation into which I naturally enough fell upon a perusal of the notifications of your two Committees. Retracing, in somewhat of the spirit of a philosopher, the transactions of these last eight years (a period, at the commencement of which, your connexion with Mr. Pitt and the Buckingham faction was first formed), the course of my reflections carried me backwards to old times, to a day fatally memorable to all true Whigs, a day that may be called in reality the political birthday of Mr. Pitt—I mean that of the death of the Marquis of Rockingham. After pursuing for a while the train of thought, and of comparisons of all kinds, arising out of the events now before us, I could not help indulging a sentiment of curiosity, in the involuntary yielding to which I asked myself (I believe with a smile), what would be the probable period of Mr. Pitt's life to which you would look for matter to animate your bumpers, or to inscribe, in the sober moment that must follow them, upon the too durable monument of your folly? My curiosity in regard to the first of these points was easily dismissed to the chance of the hour; but I must confess that it dwells with some uneasiness upon the second, as there are parts of your Lordship's character which have hitherto made me feel an interest in your fame.—Let us discuss a little, therefore, this subject of the statue. You are a scholar, my Lord, and a man of taste, and consequently must be sensible of the importance of a proper inscription for it. For if you have no inscription, it will look as if you and the other subscribers were ashamed of the statue; and if you have not a proper one, the statue may one day make you ashamed of yourselves. Now, my Lord, I am sure it is needless to tell you what ought to be the style and character of an inscription. It may be full and varied, or it may be short and simple. It may either contain a splendid recital of illustrious actions, or exhibit in a few sentences, sometimes even in a single one, a summary of the moral qualities and conduct, or the employment of the mind and faculties, of the person whose memory it is to immortalize. Either of these styles may be in perfect good taste. Not to go out of our own island for examples, I will only direct your attention to three, which may be regarded as models in this species of composition. There is the inscription on the pillar at Blenheim to the Duke of Marlborough, enumerating his splendid successes in war, his able negotiations, and that conduct by which he became the scourge and terror of France, and the preserver and deliverer of Europe. There is that sublime sentence engraven upon the monument of Sir C. Wren, in St. Paul's, itself the monument of his labours. There is, besides these, that pathetic apostrophe to the wit, humour, and learning of Ben Jonson, inscribed on his tombstone in Westminster Abbey. I much question, however, whether an inscription, drawn up according to either of the first of these forms, would exactly suit Mr. Pitt. If he has delivered Europe, he certainly took a method to deliver it very different from that which presented itself to the humble genius of the Duke of Marlborough. On the other hand, if you should exhibit your statue rising out of a heap of crowns, mitres, and banners, and write circumspice underneath, posterity might doubt whether you meant satire or panegyric by it, and possibly call your whole proceedings a piece of mauvaise plaisanterie. It seems, therefore, more safe upon the whole to conform to existing circumstances; and in this case you may follow literally the third formula I have pointed out, and inscribe upon his pedestal, "O RARE WILLIAM PITT!!"—I recommend this to you, my Lord, as a method that will relieve you from many difficulties into which I should be sorry a man of your gravity should fall. First of all, the taste of it is that of the very chastest simplicity. There is nothing of a compound or mixed quality in it. All is pure negation. It is, in plain English, to acknowledge that the less you say about your hero the better. Now, if you remember any of the precepts of your youth, my Lord, I am sure that you will agree in this sentiment as applied to the political life of Mr. Pitt. Of the "able and upright administration" you are about to glorify, I believe that, as far as Mr. Pitt is personally concerned, you must entirely leave out the beginning and the end; and your Lordship, I am sure, is too good a moral classic not to acknowledge the importance of these two periods in the history of a public man. Your Lordship cannot forget that Mr. Pitt founded his administration on a breach of the constitution, and that he has closed it (as far, I say, as he himself is concerned) by the sacrifice of the national safety. So your Lordship must confess, if you were in earnest when you stood up in the year 1784 for the rights of the House of Commons; or if you are in earnest now, in your opposition to the peace. For as to the paltry subterfuge, that this peace is Mr. Addington's and not Mr. Pitt's, I will not suspect your Lordship of being yet humbled to the adoption of it.—I think that I might safely challenge your Lordship to try with me upon these principles the public character of this, the new object of your idolatry. For the capricious preferences of ambition, where ambition is personal, there is no rule. Mr. Pitt suits you better than Mr. Fox; therefore you are in the right to prefer him. These are matters of accident; sometimes they are matters of taste; and by the same rule (not the less sure from being of difficult explanation) that we often see burning youth attach itself to loathsomeness and age in woman, your Lordship may be justified in throwing open your arms to the painted rottenness, and patched-up and varnished decrepitude of this new mistress of your mind. I know it, my Lord; this is in nature, as are many strange things not dreamt of in our philosophy. There is a voluptuousness in these attachments of which facility is the grand secret; and it is just as natural for you, in the disease and languor of your virtues, to tie yourself to that object which gives you enjoyment by the shortest process, as it is for the vigour of youthful honour, fresh from the hands of nature, to seek pleasure in difficulty, in struggles for the sake of glory, and in a conquest over resisting vices. Mr. Pitt may give you the Admiralty again: your portion with Mr. Fox would have been barren honour.—I can easily account, therefore, for your personal preference of the one to the other of these statesmen; but this is not just now to the purpose. What I mean is, to recommend the last of my three inscriptions to you, upon the ground of its suiting better with your own declared and solemnly recorded opinions of the man and of his measures. For, according to those opinions, your statue, to be truly emblematical of Mr. Pitt's administration, ought neither to have feet nor head. The wise and upright government it is to typify must appear absolute deformity to your eyes, except in its middle parts. It has a false base, and a monstrous termination. I have an expedient, however, to help you even here. To meet all occasions, all modes and possibilities of being, past, present, or to come, what think you, my Lord, of taking for the head of your statue the double one of old Janus, the great divinity of "existing circumstances?" What could so well suit the character of the great Bifrons of modern days? I need not remind you of the many points of resemblance between the two; such as that Janus was the God of Peace and War; that his temple stood on the Roman Stock Exchange; that he had two, sometimes four faces; that he held in one hand a sceptre, and in the other the key of the Treasury of Heaven; that he was, above all, a great encourager of the plant on whose juice your Lordship must depend to carry you through the melancholy festivity of this day. The hint, I trust, will not be lost upon your Lordship, on whose grateful acknowledgments I depend for having done my best to relieve you from two serious difficulties in the accomplishment of your very ingenious undertaking.—I am far, however, from being too proud of my contrivances; for, to own the truth, my Lord, all men are bunglers in the art of contriving in comparison with the facetious Gent. who proposed the resolution which your Committee has since adopted, namely, that of buying 3 per cents with the money subscribed, and leaving it to accumulate until Mr. Pitt's demise. The thought was most happy; and proves how admirably well the ideas of money-jobbing may be associated with those of fame and honour in our philosophating age! There is something so comically sublime in the idea of putting out glory to compound interest, that I trust your Lordship and the rest of the "trustees" will not suffer the authors of it to languish any longer in obscurity. It is beyond Lord Belgrave. It is worthy of Mr. Wallace himself! I have heard wonders of the financial effects of a penny, if one had been vested upon such terms at the birth of our Saviour. Mr. Morgan will tell your Lordship, to the fraction of a denarius, what will be the produce of your subscription at the period when we shall have to deplore the loss of Mr. Pitt. Now, if your Lordship and the Committee would but adopt the simple expedient of insuring his life, in addition to your present plan, there is no saying to what extent you might not carry his fame; and again I claim your thanks for putting you upon this speculation, by which, if properly managed, a pennyworth of merit in the present age may be made to exceed all bounds of calculation in the next!—With this I take my leave of your Lordship, in an humour not quite so serious as I began my letter in; for after all the different feelings which your conduct excites in me have had their turn, that of ridicule, I confess, predominates. That you have done more than perhaps any man living in this country, to destroy the belief of the existence of public principle in statesmen, is a grave charge, and much too grave a one to be mixed in this silly business. Instead of reprobating your versatility, therefore, I only smile at your embarrassment, and have the honour to be, my Lord, your Lordship's humble servant,

A WHIG OF THE OLD SCHOOL.

To the Editor of the Morning Post.—Sir, Having it strongly in my recollection, that on an important conversation in a great assembly, about paying a discharged pilot with thanks, a comparison was made betwixt two great men, and it was emphatically said that one pilot had by his prudence "weathered the storm," but that the other had "taken to his boat in the hour of danger;" it was therefore with the utmost astonishment, that at a great dinner given last Friday, I heard a song, said too to have been written by no less a personage than

Mr. Canning, the fidus Achates of the late state pilot, which song, instead of saying a word of "the pilot who took to his boat in the "storm," turned entirely to the praise of "the "pilot who weathered the storm." Now, Sir, I am exclusively attached to the one "who "took to his boat," both by the ties of gratitude, as "a creature the work of his hands," and by the still stronger ties of congeniality of sentiment and opinion, and by a due sense of my interest and my prospects; for, Sir, although the story may appear somewhat ludicrous, yet, in my opinion, that traveller was no stranger to the profoundest maxims of state policy, nor unacquainted with the vicissitudes of human life, and "the various turns of fate "below," who, when visiting the Pantheon at Rome, paid humble obeisance to the statue of Jupiter; and being reminded by the priests that Jupiter was no saint, but a mere wicked heathen deity, replied, "I know that very "well; but, if ever he comes into power again, "he will remember the man who compliment- "ed him when he was in disgrace."

Verses on a Great Man in Distress.

"Britannia's pilot, who weather'd the storm,"
Has been crown'd by George Canning with wonderful glory;

A more arduous task I have now to perform,
And of runaway pilots to tell the sad story.

Though loud roar'd the thunder, and high the winds blew,

When black lowering clouds the horizon deform;
I join not the pilot who saves the ship's crew,

"But the pilot who takes to his boat in the storm."

To him my attachments exclusive belong,

For he was the sun that gave life to our faction;
He's the god of my worship, the theme of my song,
O! soon may such pilots be call'd into action!

'Tis then we shall triumph o'er Jacobin rage,
'Tis then new "state trials" shall deluge the land;

For 'tis his to subdue this proud, rearing age,
By the maxim of statesmen, "divide and command."

Then again shall the hero of Gallia's proud bands

Be gall'd by the pow'r of his splendid creation;
While in figures and tropes he sublimely expands
On his Corsican birth and his foul usurpation.

Again shall Bellona rekindle the strife,
And war, want, and famine, again press the nation;

"Perish commerce, and credit, and honour, and life;"—

"Give us places, and titles, and endless taxation"

To such pilots as him let all honours be paid
By those who have shar'd both his rise and his fall;

Let him not be forgot, when retir'd in the shade,
For the fruits of his planting were tasted by all.

When the statue shall rise to eternise his fame,
And Sculpture bid Marble express his cold form;
Our children shall cry, as they mention his name,

"That's the pilot who took to his boat in the storm."

MR. ADDINGTON'S BIRTHDAY!!!

The Anniversary of the Birthday of the Right Hon. Henry Addington will be commemorated on Michaelmas Day, the 29th of September, at Apothecaries Hall.— Tickets one Guinea each, to be had at the Hall.

*To the Editor of the Morning Post.—(The following Note was received on Tuesday, and we cannot better attain its object than by inserting it.)—*Sir, I am directed by the Master and Wardens of the Society of Apothecaries, to desire you would contradict, in your paper of to-morrow, a paragraph inserted therein yesterday, relative to the celebration of Mr. Addington's birthday, at the Hall; the whole being an imposition on the public.

FRED. KANMACHER, Beadle.

Apothecaries' Hall, Sept. 28.

*Mr. Addington.—(Morning Post, Sept. 30.)—*Yesterday being the 29th of Sept. the celebration of Mr. Addington's birth and services took place, according to advertisement, at Apothecaries' Hall. The attendance was more numerous and respectable than ever was known on a similar occasion.—Among the company we discerned many of the first characters, not of this country only, but of pacified Europe, particularly the Swiss and Piedmontese envoys, the ambassadors from the King of Etruria and the Italian Republic, the Hildesheim minister, and the ministers from the several secularized princes of Germany, together with many principal ship-owners, and gentlemen of the Stock Exchange, and most of the persons interested in Tobago, and the other ceded colonies.—The evening was passed with the utmost conviviality. The allusions to the double festival of the day (being Michaelmas Day) were in every body's mouth, and contributed to the general good humour. The following song, composed for the occasion, was received with a tumult of applause:

At the feast of St. Michael, when harvest they house,

And, rich in the blessings of plenty, carouse;
When tenants their rents are assembled to pay,
How cheerful a festival—Michaelmas Day!

But we for the harvest by Addington sown,
For the blessings of peace to maturity grown,
The rent of our thanks to our Addington pay,
And this festival mark, as his Michaelmas Day.

'Tis through Addington's peace that fair plenty is ours;
Peace brighten'd the sunshine, peace soften'd the
show'rs;

What yellow'd the corn-fields?—what ripen'd the hay?

But the peace that was settled * last Michaelmas
Day?

The saviours of states were rewarded of old,
With statues † of silver in porches of gold;

* Not actually signed till the 1st of October, but understood to have been finally settled at the cabinet dinner two days before.

† ——"Auratis volitans argenteus Anser

VIRG. ÆN. lib. 8.

"Twas thus did old Rome her acknowledgments pay,
For her capital sav'd by the bird of to-day.

And shall not such statues to Addington rise,
For service more timely, for warning more wise?
For the treaty which chas'd all our dangers away,
When sign'd with a quill from the bird of to-day!

Long may Peace, with her Addington, reign through our borders!

May each house still be true to its forms and its orders!

So shall Britain—though destin'd by Gauls for their prey,—

Be sav'd, as old Rome, by the bird of to-day.

To the Editor of the Morning Post.—Sir, We, the undersigned, stewards of Mr. Addington's celebration of Michaelmas Day, seeing a note in your paper of Friday, signed by the beadle of the Apothecaries Company, the purport of which is to throw a ridicule on the whole of that solemnity, by calling the veracity of your account in question, think ourselves bound to allow you to state to the public, that you had our authority for that account, and you are at liberty to support this statement by the publication of our names.—Earl of Wiggborough; Viscount Dulman; Lord Shaheroon; Sir Andrew Blockwood; Sir P. Thicknesse Head; Sir Tristram Candour; Sir Theophilus Cant; Solomon Smile, Esq.; Arthur Leatherhead, Esq.; Peter Form, Esq.; Hum. Drum, Esq.; Stephen Order Order, Esq.; Simon Mace, Esq.; Thomas Peruke, Esq.; Mr. Fuller Botham; Citizen Vou Noodle, and Citizen Vander Goes, Batavian commercial commissioners; Mr. James Gander; Mr. Onesiphorus Dolt.

P. S. It is hardly necessary to observe to you, that the name signed to the supposed beadle's protest has every appearance of being a signed or fictitious name; and this circumstance, when coupled with the date of the apothecaries letter, by which a contradiction is given on the 28th to a fact not stated to have taken place till the 29th, affords sufficient ground for receiving such testimony with caution.

READING BALL, IN HONOUR OF MR. ADDINGTON AND THE PEACE.—(From the True Briton, Oct. 2, 1802.)—Yesterday evening a splendid ball was given at Reading, by the Crown Country Club. The style of this perhaps exceeds every other entertainment that has been held in our town hall. Upon entering the room the eyes of the company were highly gratified with the brilliant allegory that decorated the hall; and whilst the eye was employed in examining the splendour of the illumination, it conveyed to the heart the highest sensation of gratitude by the contemplation of Addington and Peace, delineated in coloured lamps of the most lively hue, the light of which seemed to be still more augmented by the variegated festoons that hung in elegant simplicity on the opposite side. At the head of the room was a star of the most brilliant colours, with the letters G. and R. on either side. At the bottom was seen a beautiful transparency, over which glittered the word Peace, gracefully ornamented with its respective emblems. The olive-branch indeed was intermixed through the different parts of the room with great taste. Magnificent as this preparation must appear, it however received fresh lustre from the numerous assembly of the most elegant personages. We cannot adequately describe the gratification that shone on the countenance of every one, on witnessing the attendance of Mr. Addington.—At one the company retired to supper, when two rooms were prepared with the utmost taste and elegance, for the reception of the guests. Mr. Dundas proposed the toast of his Majesty, which was drank with all that expression of loyal affection which characterizes the British nation. The Queen and Royal Family were toasted with equal ardour. The health of Mr. Addington being drank with that enthusiasm of respect and affection, which his public and private virtues have produced, he rose, and assured the company that the blessings of peace, which, in the hands of Divine Providence, he had been a happy instrument in procuring to his country, were the effect of the vigour and wisdom of his Majesty's councils, the firmness and intrepidity of the Parliament, and the steady loyalty of the people of England. Addressing himself more particularly to the meeting, he said that the only circumstance which he had to regret in consequence of his present important office, was the necessity that separated him and his family from a country and neighbourhood, for which he should never cease to feel the warmest attachment and the firmest regard. He embraced with pleasure every opportunity of continuing his connexion with them, and felt a more than common satisfaction in meeting them on the present occasion.—Mr. Nevil was then called upon for a song, whose alacrity in obliging, as well as superiority in performing, plainly proved that his heart was interested in the subject of his muse, which was well adapted to the present occasion. He then favoured the company with God save the King, in full chorus; and by the particular entreaty of Mr. Addington sang another song, to the no small satisfaction of his auditors. Many other public toasts received due honour, and morning dawned upon the festive band before they separated.

A country paper mentions Mr. Addington being present at a splendid ball given by a club at Reading, and "that among other toasts, the 'health of the Premier being drank, he rose, and in a dignified manner addressed the 'company.' There is certainly some novelty in giving toasts at a ball; and though it has not been usual for our Premiers to address themselves to young women, we are nevertheless convinced that Mr. Addington felt himself extremely happy, surrounded by the jolly girls of Reading. (True Briton.)

[For further particulars relative to the READING BALL we refer our readers to "A Lover of Truth and Decorum," p. 521; and also to the letters of our valuable correspondent, J. Tietenser, see pp. 545, 769, and 871. A short note on the same subject will likewise be found in p. 653, from a gentleman who signs himself N. V. and dates from Whitehall.]

A Simile, addressed to the Peace-maker.

Ye bards, attune your hazyon lays,
To Addington address your praise;
Who bade War's horrors cease;
Without the aid of wit or parts,
And not a grain of statesman's arts,
This Premier gave us peace.
So have I seen a chimney blaze,
And dart around terrific rays;
But soon the sparks expire,
If 'midst the flames the bird of Kings *,
A goose, is dropp'd;—with frighted wings
She flaps down smoke and fire †.

THAT MOORED US IN PEACE.—A new Song.
—(True Briton, June 10.)

If we honour the pilot that weather'd the storm,
And ne'er can our justice and gratitude cease,
Shall the sight of the harbour our hearts fail to warm?
No—Here's to the pilot that moor'd us in peace!

*For the chance of new warfare Ambition may sigh;
And party hostilities strive to renew;
To Wisdom, that nation to nation could tie,
The blessings of Europe are honestly due.*

And shall not his merits then Britons revere,
Who went to the helm, at his Sovereign's command—

A pilot who prov'd he could steadily steer,
And the vessel secure from the storm and the strand?

Who, when gloom and dejection hung over the state,
As the orb that preserv'd us its radiance withdrew,
Brought the ship into port, through the perils of fate,
Unsuspected her flag, and in safety her crew.

Exulting, impetuous, on glory we gaze,
And, caught by war's triumphs, scarce think of its woes;

But the pause of reflection its horrors displays,
And the heart of humanity pants for repose.

So, Addington, proudly as Britons we burn,
On viewing the laurels by conquest assign'd,
But with nobler delight to thy clime we turn,
As the symbol of happiness shar'd by mankind.

O! take, then—for honour with spirit maintain'd,
For counsels, by judgment and prudence matur'd—
O! take, for the peace which thy wisdom has gain'd,
The thanks of an empire whose rights are secur'd!

* Pindar calls the eagle the bird of Jove. Why should not his terrestrial deities have likewise their emblematic bird?

† A common custom in Ireland. This was mentioned by the late Lord Clare, at a cabinet council; and obviated all objections to Mr. Addington's appointment.

And O! if the value of concord we prize,

And wish that the blessings of life may increase;
The respect of the good, and the praise of the wise,
Will point to the pilot that moor'd us in peace!

MORE STATUES!!—MR. DUNDAS'S STATUE.
—(From the Morning Chronicle, July 11.)

FROM the following article it appears that Mr. Pitt is not to monopolize the honour of having statues erected to him for his meritorious services. If such signal honours are to be bestowed on the head of the late Administration, we confess that Mr. Dundas is a man who has no inconsiderable claims to a similar distinction. If he did not take the lead, he had at least the merit of being an indefatigable labourer in the same great work which has secured to his patron so many proofs of admiration:—"At a meeting of the Lord Provost, magistrates, and council of Edinburgh, on Monday last, it was unanimously resolved to erect a statue of the Rt. Hon. Henry Dundas, "in an appropriate place within that city. A "subscription was immediately opened, which "was rapidly filling."—The statue will in all probability be ordered to be cast in brass.

ON THE AMBITION OF FRANCE, AND THE IMBECILITY OF THE BRITISH MINISTRY.
—(From the Morning Chronicle.)

SIR, If it were possible that the people of England could estimate the abilities of the King's Ministers at a lower rate than they have continually done since their elevation, certainly the conduct which those Ministers now pursue would induce them to do so. In these times, which may be said most emphatically to be those that "try men's souls," their supineness and inactivity, and the total indifference which to all appearance they manifest to the encroachments of France, and the debasement of our allies, must be attributed to their weakness and want of judgment. The rivalry of the two nations, which, though many persons have considered as ideal, and arising only from a defective view of their respective interests, is yet so inveterate, and in many respects their pursuits so materially clash, that, without the utmost nicety of observation, it is almost impossible to preserve the relations of peace and amity between them. England and France have for a long period of time aspired to govern, or in some measure to lead the rest of Europe. The former, from her commercial preponderance, the strength of her navy, her riches, and the assistance which by these means she was enabled to command, long held this proud prerogative, and has often been able to defeat the schemes of aggrandizement which France has endeavoured to carry into effect, and in which nothing else than that opposition could have prevented her succeeding. The states of Europe were arranged, and such a degree of power given to each as was most likely to maintain an equal balance, and to prevent any one state from subjugating the others. Europe was, indeed, as one great family, among whose members an estate is divided so as to give an unlimited or improper power to none, but to strengthen the interests of all: if any one state were oppressed by another, the former had only to apply to a third, and the dispute was either amicably settled, or the injured party was aided and assisted by the whole confederacy. Such, at least, were the principles upon which the federal union of those nations was founded; and if, in some instances, they were evaded, yet in general they were adhered to. France, a country possessing in itself vast resources, an immense and warlike population, great facilities for commercial speculation, and above all, a national spirit, and a gov. which thought no sacrifices too great so as they purchased extended power and dominion, always saw this preponderancy with envy, and omitted no efforts to attain it herself. Millions of money have been expended, and thousands of men have been slain, in the contest for this superiority; and though France has generally gained some small extension of territory, yet she never, under her old gov. was able to banish the Eng. from the continent, or to gain any adequate indemnity for her own expenses. But the Fr. rev. which has changed so many things, is here also plainly visible. Without troubling your readers with minute circumstances, which are well known, it is sufficient to state that the republic of France has done that in the space of ten years which the monarchy failed to do in a century. The dominions of France now nearly constitute the half of Europe; from the north to the south, in one continued line, the people either immediately obey her decrees, or implicitly receive them through those who are nominally their governors. Her influence, too, extends to the most remote parts, and she concentrates, as it is called, and divides the territories of rival states, as if she were constituted surveyor general of Europe. Every day produces some new act, by which she extends her power, and there seems to be no end to her ambitious plans. At one time we see her parcelling out the Empire of Germany, and, as a reward for the services received from her allies during the late war, she very generously allots to them whatever they desire. Another time (always holding in mind the maxim divide et impera) we see her dividing poor and ill-treated Switzerland into two republics, thus taking away the little strength she possessed in her former state, and of course rendering the task of subjugation the more easy whenever it may be deemed advisable. Again, the fertile plains of Piedmont are annexed to her already overstrained dominions, because, forsooth, in the opinion of these modern Gauls, they appear to be the natural boundaries of France; thus obtaining, in a time of profound peace, without any opposition or expense, an extension of territory which long years of war failed to obtain under former governments.—It is not, however, alone in these public acts (which it is painful to contemplate) that the inadequacy of our Ministers, and the contemptuous light in which they are viewed on the continent, appear; but in the means which are taken to facilitate the commercial intercourse of the two nations, or I may rather say in the endeavours which are made to exclude this country entirely from the continent, they are also clearly shewn. It was thought that, immediately after the definitive treaty was signed, this important object would have undergone the consideration of the two governments, and some precise regulations would have been mutually agreed upon. Instead of that, however, six months have elapsed, and the same prohibitions which were issued on the part of France during the war, still remain in full force, and our merchants are prevented from sending their goods to that market by the fear of confiscation and other inconveniences. Many ships which had sailed under the idea of a free intercourse, have been obliged to return with their cargoes, thereby incurring a prodigious expense to no purpose, and some which had attempted to land them have been absolutely seized and condemned, as having endeavoured to introduce into the country contraband merchandise. Surely, Sir, these matters call for instant redress; and though our Ministers may continue quietly to see our natural allies robbed of their territories, and their legitimate power unjustly abridged, yet when the very vital interests of the state they profess to govern are concerned, it is not too much to expect they will shake off the torpidity which has so long oppressed them, and exert a little of the spirit for which their countrymen are generally renowned, and which some of their predecessors in office have not been afraid to use. Perhaps they are waiting until the mind of the Chief Consul shall be relieved from the cares which the many great affairs he is now executing must naturally load it with, and then they may expect that their representations will have greater weight; but they know little of Buonaparté who think that his ambition will ever be satiated, and that, as long as his power lasts, he will not fail to make the utmost use of it. If the Alps were at one time conceived to be the natural boundaries of the republic, now that that idea is exploded, and Piedmont is become a fixed appendage, it would be foolish to think that, ere long, it will not be conceived necessary to make other additions either for safety or glory. Indeed I believe, that, whilst Buonaparté exists, he will never cease his endeavours to add territory to territory, until, if it be possible, all Europe owns his sway.—Of all the evils which can befall a nation in times of difficulty and danger, certainly an inefficient executive government is the worst. I believe that all history shews the downfall of the great empires of the world to have been more owing to the imbecility of their rulers than to any other causes. That the proudest and the best days of England have passed away, I am unwilling to credit; but, notwithstanding I hesitate to say, with the new Opposition, that, in signing the late treaty of peace, "the sun of England's glory set for ever," yet I think that he is indeed "shorn of his beams," and that nothing but a combination of the greatest talents, with the utmost degree of vigilance and judgment, can restore his pristine lustre. With respect to the present Ministers there can be but one opinion, viz. that they unite the greatest desire to preserve their high situations, with the completest incapacity to fulfil their duties.—I am sorry to perceive in many cotemporary prints a disposition to disbelieve the degraded situation of the country, and that they seem warmly to deprecate any representation of its true state being made public. Every thing which may shew to the First Consul that there are people who can penetrate his designs seems to give them uneasiness, and they literally appear to be afraid that a doubtful paragraph or a probable reflection should again kindle the flames of war between the two countries. Whether the means these moderate persons recommend are the best chosen to preserve a good understanding between nations, I shall not pretend to discuss; but this I know, that if peace is to be preserved on no other terms than a wilful blindness and feigned ignorance of the ambitious plans of our neighbour, and a silence by which we aid him in their completion, I, for one, have no hesitation in expressing a preference for war. If we must fall, let us at least fall with arms in our hands, and not hold up to posterity the example of a great nation ruined by complaisance, and deprived of its independence from the fear of exposing its grievances. Really, Sir, if I were rashly inclined to harbour harsh ideas, I should believe that the endeavours of the First Consul, which were alluded to in your paper some little time ago, had been more successful than you then apprehended; but I have a better opinion of my countrymen than seriously to suppose they could be induced to take a bribe for such a purpose, and conclude that the sentiments they express are the true dictates of their minds, and therefore that they are justified in uttering them.—Wishing that the opinion I now entertain of the situation of my country may turn out to be unfounded, and that she may continue until the end of time increasing in prosperity and riches, I beg leave to subscribe myself,

Ever yours,

PUBLIUS.

LIST OF PATENTS ENROLLED IN 1802.

1. Abstract of the Specification of a Patent to Mr. W. Chapman, of Newcastle upon Tyne, for the "Application of certain Substances, either separately or combined, as a Preservation for"
VOL. II.

"Cordage; which Substances being insoluble in Water, or very imperfectly soluble, will, when used in the Manufacture of Cordage, be the Means of making it more durable than it has hitherto been."—It is well known that cordage, exposed to great heat, frequently becomes useless in two or three years, and sometimes less, from a species of destruction called by seamen the dry rot, because the rope, looking well to the eye, and no way injured by moisture, is found to have its yarns quite rotten. It is also known, that ropes exposed to water soon lose the tar with which they are covered; which circumstance quickly takes place in warm climates, and shallow water; under which predicament that element becomes considerably more heated than it is in the ocean in the same latitude, and its effect is quickly shewn upon a new cable, as the part lying under water is soon covered with a slime arising from the solution of the tar. The first of those disorders (the dry rot) Mr. C. attributes to a superabundant acid, which is disengaged from the tar when exposed to the heat.—The other deficiency in ropes prepared with common tar, clearly arises from that substance containing a mucilage or gum, along with its resinous matter, which latter is insoluble in water. The remedy the patentee proposes for both these evils, is very simple, and is effected during the necessary inspissation of tar to that state in which it is used in the manufacture of ropes. The common process is by boiling the tar, until it has thrown off so much of its essential oil as to come to the state in which it is wanted. Instead of which, Mr. Chapman proposes to boil the tar in water, two or three times, until it nearly attains the necessary degree of inspissation. In the first boiling, the same as in distillation, it throws off with the steam its superabundant acid, and parts with much of its mucilage to the water; and by a second process it is rendered fit for use. Seamen, accustomed to hot climates, experience that tarred ropes, although sufficiently pliable whilst there, become rigid on their return to cold countries; which sometimes occasions the loss of sails by the breaking of the ropes which form their borders. These ropes, which are called bolt-ropes, the patentee proposes to prepare with inspissated gross oils, mixed, if requisite, with a small quantity of resin. He also prepares crane-ropes in the same manner, so as to prevent their receiving injury from the weather, and yet keep them always pliable.—The cause of the rigidity of tarred ropes, after exposure to heat, is the dissipation of the essential oil of the tar. To prevent this inconvenience, Mr. C. proposes that his purified tar should be more inspissated than if used by itself, and that a due proportion of tallow, suet, whale-oil, rape-oil, or other fixed oil, be mixed with the tar, and that the oils should previously be deprived of their mucilage after the same process as the tar.

2. Miss Young's Patent for an Apparatus for teaching the Principles of Music in Children's Games.—Miss A. Young, of St. James's Square, Edinburgh, has lately obtained a patent for an apparatus by which children, even so early as eight years of age, may be instructed in the way of an amusing game, in the fundamental principles of music. This apparatus consists of an oblong square box, which, when opened, presents two faces or tables, and of various dice, pins, counters, &c. contained within that box. By the means of this box, with its dice, counters, and pins, six different games of amusement may be played. These games are contrived to familiarize to the young mind all the musical keys or modulations of the signatures, common and uncommon, the chords and dischords, with their revolutions, and the most useful rules of thorough bass. The box resembles in its form the size and figure of a backgammon-table. When opened, it presents on the face of one of its halves, at each end, two musical staves or systems of five lines each. These staves have holes to receive pins of turned ivory and wood, representing the sharps and flats which belong to the different keys. Under the stave are two drawers: one of which contains dice, pins, &c. to be used in playing with sharps; the other, the dice, pins, &c. which are to be used in playing with flats. Between the drawers, and under the same side of the opened box, are lodged two dice-boxes to be used in the game. The other face of the table is of one piece. It has at each end a delineation of the clavier or finger-touches of a piano-forte; and in every one of these a small hole. Over these are two musical staves, on which all the notes of the natural scale are written in crotchets. Each crotchet has in its head a hole to receive a pin: and immediately below each is another hole to receive a pin with the mark on its head of a sharp, flat, or natural. A drawer below contains the apparatus appropriated to this table, consisting of dice, counters, &c. particularly marked for the intended game. With this apparatus and these tables, a series of games are played, the chances of which conduct the players through so many improving exercises in the knowledge of the fundamental principles of musical composition.

3. Mr. J. B. Denize's Patent for a particular Cement.—On the 16th of July last, Mr. D. enrolled, in the proper office of a record, a specification of an invention of a particular cement, for the exclusive use of which, during a wonted time, he has obtained the protection of letters patent from his Majesty. The principle on which the grand peculiarity of his invention is founded is simply this, that a greater quantity of viscid matter than is commonly employed, ought to enter into the composition of cement, to render it sufficiently adhesive.—Mr. D. uses in the preparation of his cement two different kinds of matters; fixed substances, and viscid matters capable of liquefaction. The fixed matters are, 1. Metallic, and particularly ferruginous scoriæ, scums, drosses, file-dust, and other remains, such as may be procured from forges. 2. Metallic calces or oxyds of all sorts; any of the native oxyds of iron; volcanic ashes, lava, pozzolana, or pumice-stone; ashes of all sorts which can be procured by the incineration of pit-coal, charcoal, or any vegetable body; any of the simple earths, as silex, alumine, lime, magnesia, barytes, &c. 3. Pit-coal as nearly as possible of the character of that which is known in England by the name of Cannel-coal. 4. A proportion of glass or flint-stone. Charcoal and soot, glass-flint in any form, petter's earth, brick, tile, slate, clay, marble, gravel, sandstone, lime, plaster, sand, shells of all sorts, Mr. D. has also tried, as fixed matters, in the composition of his cement. But he has found, that if they be used either exclusively, or in too great a proportion, the cement cannot be made with them. The viscid matters, capable of liquefaction, which he employs, are these: Sulphur (not precisely of this character) in flour; bitumen extracted from pit-coal, or petrol, mineral pitch, naphtha, or asphaltos; tallow-pitch, white-rosin, pitch, tar, or any similar resinous extract from vegetables; the mucilage procured by the decoction of linseed, to the consistency of about twice the thickness of the white of an egg; or, instead of this last matter, any similar oily and mucilaginous substance, prepared from matters animal or vegetal le. He prepares the fixed matters for mixture in his cement, by cleaning the volcanic substances or others analogous to them from all extraneous mixture, reducing them to a powder, of the fineness of the finest white ashes, calcining them in a furnace, if they be not already in a state of sufficient calcination, washing them in an alkaline lye, then thoroughly drying, and, lastly, sifting them. The pit-coal, glass, and flint-stone, are to be reduced to the same fine pulverization as the other matters, and to be sifted. The viscid matters are next to be separately prepared. In this manipulation he takes flour of sulphur, in the proportion of one eighth of the whole bulk of cement intended to be made. With this he mixes bitumen from pit-coal, to the amount of about one third of the quantity of the sulphur. The mixture is then exposed to the heat of a very moderate fire, till bubbles begin to rise on its surface; and it appears to be completely dissolved. While on the fire, it is constantly stirred; continue the stirring for some time after you remove it from the fire; and during this agitation, add to the liquid mixture one third of black pitch. Put it again on the fire, and let it remain till it shall again rise in bubbles at the surface. Remove it from the fire; and add of tallow, and either rosin or wax, in equal proportions, a quantity equal to one twentieth of the whole bulk of matters which you use in the composition of the cement. These proportions may be varied. After this last addition is sufficiently mixed with the other viscid matters, this part of the preparation is now fit to be mingled with the fixed parts. You next proceed to the immediate composition of the cement. Holding the viscid matter in liquefaction, add to it three fourths in volume of the ferruginous preparation specified above—one eighth of pozzolana, or what you use as a substitute for it; one eighth of pumice-stone or its substitute; one eighth of pit-coal; and one eighth of glass or flint-stone, all duly prepared in the manner above described. Expose this mixture of viscid and fixed matters to the heat of a fire sufficient to hold them in solution, without evaporating the volatile parts. Stir the mixture on the fire, to hinder the fixed parts from settling at the bottom. From time to time, while you stir, make trial, with the trowel and with your hand, whether any portion hardens as it cools, and when warm does not stick to the finger. When the mixture has acquired these qualities, your cement is made; and you may remove it from the fire. It would be advantageous to have this last boiling performed by heat conducted to your boiler through the medium of steam. The cement thus made is removed from the fire, left to cool, and then put aside for future use. In using it, you break it in small pieces; expose it with one fortieth of either tallow, or any bituminous substance, or vegetable oil, to melt for a quarter of an hour in an earthen vessel, or one of cast iron, over a slow fire; and then, without delay, apply it to your intended purpose of cementing.

4. Mr. Wilkinson's Patent for his Method of making leaden Pipes.—Mr. W.'s invention for making leaden pipes will, within no long time, become free to the common use of the public. It is extremely simple; and therefore so much the more valuable. He casts the lead in lengths upon a rod or maundrel of iron. The rod or maundrel may vary in length or thickness, according to the differences desired in the length or width of the leaden pipes. The leaden pipe upon the maundrel is then extended to the exact length and thickness wanted in the pipes, by drawing the maundrel, with the pipe upon it, through or between rollers with grooves of different sizes. Or the maundrel bearing the pipe, may be drawn through metal gauges or collars, each successive collar being smaller than that used immediately before it. These operations are easily done under the action of a common water-wheel.

5. Patent of Mess. Kendrew and Parthouze, for a Machine for spinning Yarn from Hemp, Tow, Flax, or Wool.—This invention has, within these few months, become free to the common use of the public. In the machine, wheel-work moved by water, a horse, or any other means of giving the requisite impulse, communicates motion to the exterior of two wheels belonging peculiarly to this invention. That by means of a nut on its axis, gives motion to an interior wheel. This interior wheel impels the revolutions of a cylinder, by which the whole process of the spinning is chiefly performed. This cylinder is three feet in diameter, and in breadth 10 inches. It is made of dry wood or metal: and is covered on its circumference with smooth leather. On this leather are a certain number of rollers, covered also with leather, and turning an axis of iron. They are of different weights. The roller which is the highest on the cylinder, is of two stone weight; the others decrease to the lowest, which weighs only two pounds. A cloth revolves upon two rollers; and by its side is placed a table precisely of the same length and breadth. To this table belong two other similar cloths. The workman puts on this table a quantity of the material to be spun, more or less, as a finer or a coarser thread is wanted.—He spreads it equally on the smooth cloths—From these he puts it upon the revolving cloth.—Motion is then communicated from the wheel-work to the rollers and the cylinder. The flax, tow, hemp, or wool is drawn forward. It is extended in passing into a thread or sliver. From under the action of the rollers, it falls into a canister suspended to receive it. The first sliver may be afterwards reduced on another similar machine, with only some necessary variations, into a thread for cloth of any ordinary fineness.

6. Captain Bolton's Patent for an improved Rudder, and the Means of preserving the Rudder.—Capt. B.'s invention of an "improved rudder" is described, in the specification, as a rudder prepared with means for enlarging its breadth, whenever this shall be necessary. It is made in two parts; or, with a slit of sufficient width, passing, at the exterior edge, down the middle of its thickness. In this aperture is inserted a triangular piece of wood, or plate of metal, which hangs on a centre pin passing through its head, and through the whole thickness of the rudder; has the head, for convenience in turning, semicircular, and furnished with teeth to sustain it at any particular degree of extension; and, when not actually employed to enlarge the breadth of the rudder, fills the slit which was made to contain it. A bolt, passing through the head of the rudder, or at its back; is made to throw out or draw back the moveable piece of wood, or plate of metal, whenever it is moved to right or left. The piece of wood, or plate of metal, when thrown forward by the bolt, gives a considerable extension of the rudder's breadth at its lower extremity. That part of the invention which respects the "Preservation of the Rudder," accomplishes this end by so hanging it on the stern-post, that it may be lifted at pleasure with a screw, or any other of the mechanical powers. In the draught accompanying the specification, that mode is exhibited in which the invention has been tried in actual use. A slide or bolt fixed by strong braces to the stern-post, is, by pintles and goosings, connected with the rudder. A screw bolt passes through the head of the slide; and, when turned by a lever at its top, above the deck, serves to elevate that slide. The rudder being hung upon the slide, and firmly attached to it, is at the same time raised. These inventions are obviously adapted to prove essentially useful to the seaman. There are many occasions on which an extraordinary power of rudder is wanted, and on all such Mr. B.'s contrivance for enlarging the breadth of the rudder will undoubtedly be of service. The loss of the rudder by its touching on a rock, is in very many instances the cause of the loss of the vessel to which it belongs. This will be almost always effectually prevented, if rudders be hung in such a manner that they may be screwed up or otherwise elevated at pleasure.

7. Mr. Tidmarsh's Patent for a Substitute for Paint.—The invention for which this patent was obtained, consists in pulverizing and mixing quantities which the specification does not particularly state, of glass of any sort, burned or baked clay, such as that which is in earthen or stone ware; flag from glass manufactures; metals, such as copper, brass, or iron; marble; calcareous and siliceous earths, simple or in artificial compositions. The pulverized mixture thus obtained, is then to be diluted with the usual desiccative oils, &c. and thus to be used as paint. Having carefully inspected the specification of this patent, we are induced to observe, that it certainly does not describe the peculiarity of the invention, with a definiteness and precision sufficient in law to secure the right of its property to the inventor. Nine tenths of the patents on record are in the same predicament.

8. Mr. Longmore's Patent for a Patten or Clog in the Locks of Guns.—By the invention recorded in the specification of this patent, an elastic tong or spring of iron or other metal, is provided, to pass through a hole perforated in the middle of the block of the patten, and then by pressure to keep the sole of the foot tight against ties. The foot or block is made of iron, wood, cork, or any other suitable substance.

9. Mr. Becker's Patent for Improvements in musical Instruments.—The grand peculiarity in this invention consists in its producing in the harp sharps, flats, quarter-notes, &c. by a new motion of the wrest-pins with which the strings are extended and turned. This motion is given to the wrest-pins by the following contrivance:—The wrest-pins have levers attached to them, respectively. On the lever slides a quadrant. Links are fixed on the quadrant, and are kept stationary by a regulating screw. A crank connects the several quadrants with the pedals of the harp. On the crank is another regulating screw, to adjust the whole to the motion of the pedals. When any of the pedals are pressed down, the quadrants and wrest-pins connected with it, follow its movements. When the pressure on the pedal ceases, the strings instantly return to their former state of tension. A sort of rack is applied to stop the pedals at four different stations, answering to the natural note, to one-quarter, to one-half, and to three-quarter notes. A spring is applied to each pedal, to counteract the tension of the strings. In piano-fortes, and other stringed instruments which are played with keys, wheels are by this invention placed under or over the strings, to make them vibrate. The strings are, by the touch of the keys, inclined to the wheels; and a pedal, or any other mechanical power, is applied to put the wheels in motion. The strings, that they may be susceptible of vibration from the wheels, must be extended on any thing moveable having its prop or fulcrum any where within the extent of the string, or its two ends higher or lower, for the purpose of moving or inclining the string to the wheels, or altering the tension of the strings to raise or lower the tone thereof.

10. Bosquet's Measure (Method) for the better Preservation of his Majesty's Ships and all trading Vessels from rapid Decay, and for effectually avoiding the Nuisance and destructive Effects of Rats on board Ships, and also for the Prevention of Leakage, &c.—The method proposed by the patentee for the attainment of all the important objects above specified, is by filling up the void spaces between the planks, lining, and timbers of the vessel with hot or melted pitch, tempered with a small proportion of tar to render the pitch less brittle and more tenacious: and mixed with cork-shavings, charcoal-dust, ox-hair, &c. rendering the composition firm, adhesive, and almost everlasting. In those parts where the timbers are remote, pieces of cork-wood or slips of deal may be introduced, by which a less quantity of pitch will be necessary, and the specific gravity diminished. Obs. The duration of ships of war is computed, on an average, at 12 or 13 years. Mr. B. imagines, that if his method were adopted, a ship would be much better at the end of 20 years than by the common construction it is after 12 years service. At present great pains are taken to preserve the exterior of vessels, which at all times is easily repaired, while the interior is neglected. By the patent method, the inner parts of the ship would be the most durable; and if a plank should start the water could not find its way into the ship; the pumps would become in a manner useless; the aversion that rats have to the composition, would secure the vessel from the destructive effects of those animals, and from the fetid smell occasioned by their living, dying, and rotting between the timbers. The patent composition will have the same effect as so much ballast, in the best position in which ballast could be placed, as it will occupy the centre of motion; and being specifically lighter than water, it will tend to preserve the ship in case of danger from a heavy sea. Such are the principal advantages which the patentee anticipates as the result of his invention.—He observes, that ships already built may be fortified by his patent method, at an expense not exceeding 4 or 500*l.* for a first-rate Indianman.

11. Mr. Walker's, for making and manufacturing Caps and Hats, and rendering them perfectly Water-proof; as also all Kinds of Leather, Silks, Linens, Stuffs, Pasteboard, &c. for the Purpose of being worked into Boots, Shoes, Hats, Bonnets, and other Wearing Apparel, in which a Power of repelling Moisture is required.—The principal object of the patentee is the manufacturing of military caps; for which purpose he makes use of pasteboard, to which is cemented, with glue or paste, linen cloth, or any other woven substance. The cap is then cut to the proper shape, and all the seams or joinings are united by narrow slips of linen, &c. and then cemented with glue. It is then to be painted inside and out, with any kind of oil paint, though a mixture of oil and lamp-black is to be preferred, and, when dry, the cap is to be varnished or japanned. The same process is to be applied to leather, silk, cotton, &c. before they are made into boots, caps, and bonnets.—Obs. The objection against water-proof articles of dress is, that, after a very few times wear, those parts which are creased by means of the motions of the joints, readily admit the rain, and thereby subject the wearer to the inconvenience of a partial chill, which may be equally or more dangerous to health than if the moisture were more generally applied. This we admit is not applicable to the military caps. But how far boots, shoes, gaiters, &c. would be comfortable to the wearer after having received two or three coats of paint, and as many of japan, experience will best determine.

12. Mr. Jackson's, for a Drill, to be fixed to a Plough-beam for sowing Turnips.—This drill may be made to sow turnips, rape, or other small round seeds, at any given different distances from each other, according to the pleasure of the purchaser: it may be adapted to the width of any furrow intended to be ploughed; and, by a neat contrivance, the seed may be dropped either under the furrow or upon the surface of the ground.

13. Mr. Brown's, for a Method of making or preparing Extract of Zinc.—This invention consists in saturating the vegetable or animal acid with the oxyd of zinc, found in any state, or obtained by any process. The acid necessary for this operation may be made by acetous fermentation, as common vinegar, or any acid produced from any vegetable, or any vegetable or animal oil; all or any of which being saturated with the oxyd of zinc, produce extract of zinc.

14. Mr. Boaz's Telegraph, or new and improved Method of communicating Thoughts, Information, and Intelligence, by means of Signs, Lights, &c.—Mr. B. describes his invention to consist in representing at pleasure, by means of lights or luminous bodies, and also by means of opaque bodies, any letter of the alphabet, or any numerical figure, or any appearance as a sign or signal, such as plain geometrical figures of all kinds. The following he mentions as one of the simplest methods of effecting his purposes:—take 25 lamps, disposed on a board or frame in the form of a square, at equal distances from each other. To each lamp belongs an opaque cover or blind, with proper apparatus, to move backwards and forwards, so as to exclude the light, and only so many of the lamps be left visible, as are necessary to represent the letter of the alphabet, or other sign intended to be exhibited. Mr. Boaz is very particular in his specification, to describe a vast variety of mechanical methods by which the effect of his contrivance may be produced. Although he has pitched upon 25 lamps, as answering to the number of letters in the alphabet, yet he observes that nine lamps, properly fitted up with blinds, sliders, pulleys, incliners, &c. would produce nearly the same effect; and a similar effect might be obtained by a greater or smaller number of lamps than 25; so that he wishes it to be distinctly understood, that it is not in the number of lamps made use of, nor in the particular configuration or construction of the machine, that the invention consists, but in being able to represent, by means of lamps or luminous bodies, as candles or phosphorus, or by means of opaque substances, the signals desired.

15. Mr. Pott's Patent for an artificial Leg.—A patent has been granted to Mr. P. of Belford, Northumberland, for an artificial leg, which is made of light materials, and has great resemblance to the bony and fleshy parts of the natural leg. By this the wearer is enabled to avoid those semicircular motions which most artificial legs require: all its motions are perfectly at his command; he has the power of turning the foot inward and outward, and can imitate almost every motion than can be performed by the natural leg. The wearer of Mr. Pott's artificial leg can, with the utmost ease, sit, kneel, rise, pull on and off a boot, and even walk several miles without incurring great fatigue.—This ingenious invention was the offspring of necessity; the patentee, having unfortunately suffered amputation above the knee, was led to contrive the best possible method of supplying the deficiency. Although we presume not to anticipate the merits of future inventions, yet we shall be fully justified in giving a decided preference to Mr. Pott's invention, compared with all former ones of the same kind. In giving this as our opinion, we have only followed the decided testimonies given by almost all the principal surgeons in London and Edinburgh.—The above patent is now the property of Mr. W. Sheldrake, No. 483, in the Strand, near Charing Cross, who takes great pleasure in exhibiting to the curious and men of science the principle of the invention.

16. Mr. Dickenson's (Long Acre) Patent for certain Improvements in the Construction of, and Additions to, Saddles, Harness, &c.—

Mr. D. assumes that the principal defect in the common construction of saddles, &c. arises from the want of elasticity of the materials of which they are composed. This induces the necessity of girthing the animal too tight, which impedes the respiration, as well as endangers the girths. With respect to the crupper, he conceives it almost impossible, with the common construction of saddles and harness, to observe that just medium which shall preserve the saddle in its proper place, and yet not incommode the animal. His own improvements consist in the addition of certain elastic springs, interposed between the parts of these articles of horse furniture. He lodges one or more spiral springs, similar to those made use of in spring steelyards, in certain cavities, to which a piece of catgut or wire is fastened, or made to bear against one end of it; this, when drawn or acted upon, causes the parts of the spring to approach more nearly together. To the end of the catgut are fixed straps, or other fastenings, for the ready fixing of the girth, crupper, &c. in the usual manner.—The spiral springs are enclosed in proper receptacles, which form a separate piece capable of being applied or attached between the saddle and the extremity of the girth, crupper, &c. so as to communicate to the said appendages the effect of its own elasticity in the longitudinal direction.—Mr. D. includes all materials, forms, and shapes in his patent; steel however he thinks the best substance, and the spiral the most commodious form. In some cases he makes use of caoutchouc, or common Indian rubber.

17. Mr. Francis Brewin's (Bermondsey) Patent for an improved Method of Tanning.—This improved process of tanning consists in consolidating floaters and taps, that is, by drawing the oozes for the vats, and handlers from the floaters, and working the oozes through the floaters, in every respect, as though they were a set of taps, and using them at the same time in the nature of floaters, by handling the greenest spucks in them. These vats Mr. B. calls floating taps. Twenty or twenty-five vats of nearly the same size, in the form of a square or parallelogram, constitute one complete tan-yard: of these, two or three of the centre vats are used as spenders, four or six immediately next are floating taps, each containing an eye and a false bottom. The rest are vats and handlers in which the fresh bark is used. One floating tap is kept empty, to contain the whole of the ooze and bark in a vat or handler, into which floating vat the ooze and bark are drawn from the vat or handler. A pump is used to draw off the ooze.—By disposing the spenders, taps, vats, &c. in the manner described, barrows or long shoots will seldom, if ever, be required. And the material advantages derived from this process are, the leather is made of a superior quality, being more solid and weighty than other leather, and is manufactured in less time. The leather, when curried, will be much more water-proof than common leather, as it will take in more oil in the process of currying; the leather will be much tougher than other leather. The labour, as well as the quantity of bark, required in the process, is less in this than in the common method of tanning.

18. Mr. Matthew Murray's (Leeds) Patent for a Method of constructing the Air-pump, and sundry other Parts belonging to a Steam-engine, by which there will be a Saving of Fuel, and an increased Power obtained.—Mr. M.'s invention embraces six principal objects: 1. By the new air-pump, the air is discharged without its having to make any effort in opening of valves, or pressing through a body of water, and in causing the water and air to be discharged separately, and different ways. It is effected by taking out the air alone by one bucket, and the water alone by another, or by an eduction pipe 28 feet long. 2. The second principle is an improved method of packing the cylinder lid, stuffing boxes, &c. by bringing the removable parts of each to come in immediate contact with one another. 3. and 4. The two next improvements relate to the construction and circular motion of the valves, the two uppermost being inverted, and the valve-rods are made to pass through reservoirs of oil, or other liquid matter, which effectually prevents the air from insinuating itself into the engine. 5. The next principle is a new method of connecting the piston-rod to the parallel motion. 6. And the last relates to the construction of fire-places, by which the smoke arising from the fire is consumed, and made part of the fuel.

19. Mr. G. Bodley's (Exeter) Patent for a portable Stove or Kitchen for the Purpose of dressing Victuals.—The object of this patent is, to save as much as possible the expense of fuel. The whole stove consists of three principal parts, an oven, a fire-place, and appurtenances; and a fountain or warm closet is made of cast or wrought iron plates, properly fastened together with screws or rivets, except the sides and bottom of the fire-place and ash-hole, which are composed of bricks set in mortar, loam, &c. The fire-place is in the middle, between the oven and warm closet. While the stove is in use, the fire is enclosed by an iron door, so that the smoke and heat must necessarily pass through a funnel, which, ascending close to one side of the oven, is carried round the other three sides, under the ash-hole and hot closet, and then ascends again by the outer side of the closet into a chimney, which conveys it into the open air.—The top of the apparatus, which Mr. Bodley calls the mantle, is a flat iron plate, and, from its constant heat, when the stove is at work, is capable of broiling, boiling, stewing, &c.

20. Mr. J. Lewis's (Old Street, Middlesex), for a Method of preventing Accidents by a Horse or Horses drawing a Carriage or Carriages.—By means of rings fitted to the harness, and bolts adapted to them, the horse or horses are fastened with a chain to the carriage; from the part of the carriage to which the chain is fixed, proceeds a handle to the place most convenient to be laid hold of by the driver, who can instantly disengage the horse from the chaise. The same pressure which sets the horse at liberty, in case of a two-wheel carriage, throws out two legs, one before and another behind, so that the chaise still keeps its level. And that the rider may be in no danger of falling forward by the sudden stopping of the carriage, each of the legs has a wheel; thus the motion will be gradually retarded. Mr. L.'s invention is applicable to curricles and other carriages, the principle of which is explained in the patent, with a number of drawings.

21. M. Paul de Philipsthal's Patent (of the Lyceum, Strand) for the Invention of representing in a dark Scene human Figures, in various Characters, Sizes, &c.—The patentee professes to have discovered, by indefatigable research and numerous optical experiments, a new method of producing representations of apparitions and spectres. The apparatus consists principally of two concave glasses or metal reflectors, secured in a dark closet, before which an artificial light, proportionable to their foci, is applied, and directed upon a picture representing the apparition. Lenses are made use of, to throw the image of the picture on a transparent screen, which is hung between the darkened closet, or lantern, and the spectator. When the mirrors are brought nearer the screen, the object is diminished in size, and appears, according to the laws of perspective, to retire, and, when taken farther off, the size of the object is enlarged, while it appears to approach the spectator. M. P. has, in his specification, given particular instructions for producing the various optical deceptions, which he has, for some time past, successfully exhibited at the Lyceum to crowded audiences, and at the same time claiming, in high terms, the "protection of his Britannic Majesty to his meritorious discoveries."

22. Mr. Donaldson's Patent (Bristol) for a Method of making all Kinds of Glass in a more expeditious Manner than hitherto attempted.—Mr. D. proposes no alteration in the materials for making glass, nor in the proportions usually adopted. The principle of his invention consists in the application of a stronger heat, at a much less expense than the common operations of glass-making will admit of. And although he describes the shape which he conceives the best adapted for the furnaces used in this manufacture, yet he expects no exclusive privilege on that account. What he lays claim to as an inventor is, the construction of a building in which the furnace is, except the chimney, completely included, so that the whole heat from the fire must be employed in the operation. The grate of the furnace is so constructed, that all the air consumed must pass through the lower part of it; by which means it is said that there is a saving of at least one third part of the coals; and the glass, by keeping a regular, as well as a strong heat, is found to be of a superior quality to that made in the common way. As the heat of the room which includes the furnace is, during the operation, insufferably great, iron or other doors are made for the convenience of persons going in and out to overlook and attend to the process.—Obs. The idea of preventing the access of the external air to any part of the fire, except at the bottom of the grating, is not new; it has, for several years past, been adopted by Lord Stanhope in burning lime, with which he makes a mortar, not inferior perhaps to that of the ancients so much celebrated.

23. Mr. Winter's Patent (Shackleton) for a certain Manufacture for covering the Floors of Rooms, and also for covering and packing Goods, &c.—This new manufacture is composed of waste tan or bark, after it has been used by the tanner; threads and scrapings of all kinds of leather, and the short hair of animals. The tan and the leather are to be well cleaned; and, by certain processes, the former is to be reduced to fibres, and the latter to a pulp; the hair is to be washed and separated, so that the ingredients may be rendered fit for uniting with each other very completely. Being thus prepared, they are mixed together in the proportion of four parts of tan, two of leather, and one of hair, with five pounds of refuse tow, wadding, or wool, to every hundred weight of the mixture. The whole is then to be intimately blended together, and conveyed into vats or receivers containing warm water, in which a small portion of glue is dissolved. In this state it is moulded in frames, and the remaining part of the process is very much like that made use of in the manufacture of paper.

24. Mr. Howard's Patent (Manchester) for a Method of making a British Barilla and Pot-ash, and of obtaining a greater Quantity of Alkali than hitherto discovered.—The method adopted by Mr. H. for obtaining alkali is, by saturating with quicklime the ashes made from bleachers' waste lie, rock-salt, soda, natron, common salt, black-ashes of the soap-boilers' lie, kelp, tobacco-ashes, &c. &c. To these substances, being made sufficiently small by grinding, pounding, or rolling, to pass through a fine sieve, is to be added a certain proportion of coke, cinders, charcoal, or any other combustible substance, free from sulphur, and reduced to powder. These ingredients are to be most intimately mixed, and a layer of them to be spread on an even floor, to which is added a layer of quicklime. The mass is then to be sprinkled with as much common water, brine, lie, or sea-water, as it will absorb. Other layers are to be added at pleasure; and when the heap is made, it is to be cut down while warm, and to be reduced, by means of water, lie, sea-water, &c. to the consistence of mortar, then dried on iron plates or pans, and afterwards fluxed in a reverberating furnace, which is the finishing part of Mr. H.'s operation in producing his British barilla. He gives in the specification the proportions which he thinks may be most advantageously used; but as on this point there may be a diversity of opinions, he desires it to be understood, that the saturating by quicklime any of the ingredients mentioned by him, for the purpose of obtaining alkali, will be deemed an infringement of his patent.—Mr. H. particularly describes the mode of obtaining alkali from sal enixum, and the caput mortuum of the sulphuric and muriatic acids; and his mode of separating those acids from common salt, brine, lie, &c.

25. Mr. Arnold Wilde and Mr. J. Ridge's Patent (Little Shelfield) for manufacturing of all Kinds of Saws, Steel Doctors for Printers, Plates made of Iron or Steel, Beads or Mouldings of Fenders, Springs made of Steel, &c.—When the steel or iron articles are made or cut into the proper shape, they are put into a frame and made red hot. They are then to be immersed in water, or a composition of grease or oil, to be hardened in the frame according to the direction wanted. When hardened, they are to be tempered, by being kept in motion over the fire till the grease smokes, and until a blue blaze alternately appear and disappear. They are then to be stretched with as much power as will bring them into the direction required. If they do not require hardening, they must be made red hot, and suffered to cool in the open air; they are then to be ground by a machine, which being put in motion will pare, tooth, smith, finish, set the teeth of saws, sharpen, grind, and polish plates of steel and iron, and form beads and mouldings, and other articles.

26. Messrs. J. and J. Robertson's (Glasgow), for a Method of applying Steam with the greatest Advantage in working of Steam-engines.—In the best-constructed engines, a considerable quantity of steam escapes by the sides of the piston, and is lost without producing any mechanical effect. Messrs. R.'s invention consists in preventing, in a great measure, the escape of the steam, and in making that which does escape act on another piston, and thereby augment the power of the engine. In these engines there are two steam cylinders, one smaller than the other, with pistons fitted to each, which act together in producing the effect. To the cylinders are annexed a condensing vessel and air-pump, which are common to other steam-engines; but the principle of exclusive right is founded in the mode of conducting the steam on and between the pistons.

27. Mr. E. Thomason's (Birmingham), for an Improvement on Corkscrews.—The patentee combines in this invention three screws, the male, the female, and what he calls the hermaphrodite screw. This last acts in some circumstances as a male, and in others as a female screw.—In making use of this screw, the operator, by turning always to the right, draws out the cork, without any other advantage than what is gained by the screw simply; and when the cork is drawn, by turning the screw to the left, it falls off without touching with the fingers.

28. Mr. Christopher Wilson's (Bermondsey), for an improved Method of obtaining a Vacuum applicable to all pneumatic, hydraulic, and mechanic Instruments, in which any Kind of Fluid is made use of as a Power.—The merits of this patent cannot be comprehended without reference to the figures, which are annexed to the specification.

29. Mr. J. Williams's (Portsmouth), for a Method of disengaging Horses from Carriages.—Mr. W.'s invention consists chiefly in the addition of a rolling splinter-bar, affixed to the usual or main splinter-bar, in such a way as will suffer it to turn on its axis when needful, and also in the means of fastening the traces to the said rolling-bar.—The method of disengaging the horses is very simple: a person in the carriage has need only, by means of a cord, to pull back a bolt, when a lever immediately rises; in consequence of the action on the traces, the studs by which the traces are fastened to the rolling splinter-bar change their position, and the traces are instantly set at liberty. The patentee extends his invention to all kinds of carriages. Those that have shafts are to have a socket fixed to the end of each; and those which have shafts, or a pole, which, from its construction, would fall to the ground as soon as the horse or horses are disengaged, are to have a piece of iron, with a broad bottom, or a wheel affixed to each shaft, or the pole, to prevent the motion being checked too suddenly by the fall.—Mr. W. does not claim the method of disengaging the harness from the ends of the pole or shafts, as part of his invention. He observes, that the operation of disengaging the horse or horses is performed with as much facility as the pulling of a check-string; and, notwithstanding the simplicity of the process, it will be found that the horses are as securely attached to the carriage as upon the common construction.—The exclusive right of manufacturing these safeguard splinter-bars has been assigned to Andrew Leith and Co. of Shoe Lane, Fleet Street.

30. Mr. P. Rusher's (Banbury), for various Improvements and Alterations in the Form of Printing Types, and the Manner in which Printing is to be performed therewith, so as to diminish the Trouble and Expense of Printing, and to render it more uniform and beautiful.—According to this specification, the capital letters, with a few exceptions, should be comprised in the compass of an oval, by which they will occupy less room than usual, and be more uniform. Each small letter is to be without any tail-piece or descender; and the metal of the type, usually forming the shoulder, is to extend no lower than the body of the letter; consequently the letters will occupy less room in printing without being less legible. The small letters that have heads or ascending points which rise above the body of the characters, should have their heads shortened about one third, which, besides uniformity, will allow room for a greater space between the lines in printing, or the type may be placed closer, and thereby a considerable saving in paper will be made.

31. Mr. Chester Gould's (Red Lion Street, Clerkenwell), for an Apparatus or artificial Horizon to be attached to and used with the Quadrant or Sextant, for the Purpose of taking Altitudes of celestial or other Objects, either on Land or Water, without the Assistance of the natural Horizon.—This invention consists in applying coloured or other fluids to the instrument, so as to obtain a level for the purpose of taking altitudes, either on land or water; which is performed by making a circular tube or ring of brass, or other substance, from two to three inches in diameter, in which are fitted four transparent glasses, directly opposite to, and parallel with each other, so that the surfaces of the fluid contained in the tube may be distinctly seen by the observer. The inside of the tube may be about a quarter of an inch in diameter, and half full of some transparent fluid. It is then to be fixed to a small apparatus, with proper joints and adjustments, so as to bring it to its true position on the quadrant.—The true position on the instrument being obtained, and the ring filled up to the centre of the glasses, the quadrant or sextant must be held in a vertical position, and the surface of the fluid be brought to form a perfect level with the eye of the observer: then the object whose altitude is to be taken is reflected down to this fluid level, in the same manner as when altitudes are taken by the sea horizon.—The artificial horizon may be so constructed as to be connected with a telescope, such as is frequently applied to quadrants and sextants; by which means, the surfaces of the fluid, and their contact with the image of the sun or any other body, may be more exactly determined, and the altitude may be read off upon the arc, as in common cases.

32. Mr. J. Lawrence's (Lambeth), for a new Method of Tanning.—The patentee makes use of a liquor made from oak saw-dust instead of that from oak bark, and in this consists the whole invention.

33. Mr. J. Lewis's (Brinscomb, in Gloucestershire), for certain Improvements in the Art of Dying by means of a new Method of cooling the Cloth, and other Piece Goods, particularly in dying Black, and a new Mode of applying the Fire for the Purpose of heating the Boiler, which may be applied to the heating of other Boilers where Heat is required.—This method of cooling cloth consists in passing it from the boilers over rollers or cylinders, erected on a stage near the boiler, in the following manner: Immediately opposite the roller, over which the cloth turns in the boiler, a stage is erected of a proper width for the goods intended to be dyed. This stage is so high, that the gutters which are placed under the eaves may be sufficiently elevated to convey the liquor which drops from the cloth while turned over it, back again into the boiler. At each end of the stage a roller with a winch or handle is placed so high above the troughs, as to admit of the troughs holding the whole of the goods; and between these rollers with handles, other intermediate rollers extend over the width of the stage, at about three feet distance from each other. The rollers are about 30 inches in diameter, and the specification contains proper directions for working them, and carrying on the whole operation by means of three men, viz. one at each winch, and the other keeps the cloth abroad while coming out of the boiler.—In dyeing black, it is allowed that repeated cooling is essential; to accomplish this, and to secure the cloth from the possibility of being heat-wrinkled, is the object of this part of the invention.—Mr. L.'s mode of applying the fire for the purpose of heating the boiler is founded on the idea that the stronger the draught, the greater will be the effect of the fire on the liquor, provided the heat so generated impinges in the best possible direction against the boiler. The directions given in the specification seem very well adapted to accomplish the ends intended to be answered in this respect; and, from repeated experience, Mr. L. assures us that the saving of fuel, and, what is often of more consequence to the dyer, in time, is from one third to a half over any other mode that has been tried.

34. Mr. B. Hawkins's (Red Lion Street, Clerkenwell), for a new floating Mill or Engine, to be worked by Tides or Currents of Water, for grinding all Sorts of Grain, and various other Purposes.—This invention consists in converting a ship, brig, sloop, or other vessel proper for the purpose, into a floating water-mill, and obtaining sufficient power to work the mill for grinding all sorts of grain, by the application of a sufficient number of water-wheels to the hull of the ship or vessel, in a proper manner to be acted upon by the tide or current, so as to give the wheels a rotatory motion, and by connecting them with proper machinery.—When the ship or mill is to be stationary, it must be made fast, so as to swing with the tide when necessary; but the mill may be worked whilst the vessel in which it is erected is sailing. The number and size of the wheels may be varied in proportion to the size of the vessel, the strength of the current, and the power required: and the wheels may be constructed as in common cases, or with folding floats, for the more readily freeing them from the water. They may also be placed in a vertical, horizontal, or oblique direction. The water-wheels may extend into the water from three to eight feet: they should be so connected as to be easily engaged with, or disengaged from each other, so that during the weak part of the tide they may all be made to act on one pair of mill-stones, if necessary, and, as the strength of the tide increases, more stones or other machinery may be put in motion, so as at all times to do business in proportion thereto.

35. Mr. H. Tickell's (Mansell Street, White-chapel), for an Apparatus or Method of more effectually dissolving and extracting the Virtues and preserving the essential Oil of Hops, Malt, and other vegetable Substances used in brewing, distilling, dyeing, and sugar-refining, and dissolving animal Substances in making Soap, and which is also useful and applicable to various other chemical Processes.—The apparatus described in the specification of this patent is very extensive, and accompanied with a variety of figures, without the assistance of which it is impossible to explain the several principles of the invention upon which Mr. Tickell founds his claim for exclusive privileges. It is by the application of steam in various ways that the vegetable and animal matters are sooner dissolved, and their virtues or properties more effectually extracted, than can be done by the usual method.

36. M. A. G. de Poggi's (of New Bond Street), for Improvements in the constructing and using of Ordnance, to be employed both in Sea and Land Service.—The objects intended to be answered by this invention are, to produce a rapid fire, and to secure the men.—The improved gun is constructed from a calibre scale as usual; but the trunnions are nearly in the axis of the piece, and no more increase of weight is left behind them, than what is sufficient to cause the breech to preponderate, and the piece to be steady on the prop that supports it behind at the moment of fire, and to descend when that support is withdrawn.—(Here follows a particular account of the several additions to the old construction of the gun.)—To regulate the elevation and depression of the gun, some machinery is fixed, consisting of a spindle, with pinions acting on two wheels, between which is a cylindrical barrel, and on this two double and single flat-linked chains wind their ends, extending to the lower part of a fixed box, where two eye-bolts are fixed, and an iron pin runs through them, which is kept in by a nut, and the chain is kept closer at that end to enable it to wind without riding. The gun by this means is capable of being elevated or depressed by the turning of a winch. By putting a catch-bolt back, the breech of the gun falls down on the axletree, and the charge being previously laid in the bore, immediately runs home. The gun is brought up by cords in an instant, and as speedily laid to the object by the machinery and contrivance of the carriage; by which means a rapid and destructive fire may be kept up, without exposing the men who load to the least danger in the operation.—Other contrivances for elevating and depressing the piece are intended to be introduced; and all guns on the new construction may, if in any case it should be thought more advisable, be loaded and fixed in the usual manner, since the pieces and their carriages are not, by these improvements, rendered in the least unfit for the mode of manœuvring now used.—This specification contains also full descriptions of the improved grenade gun, or long howitzer, and its sea-service carriage; of the sliding carriage, constructed to admit of the guns being traversed to a very open angle with the ship's side; and of an improved brass mortar and bed.

37. Mr. T. Malby's (Nottingham), for a Stirrup.—This invention is intended to preserve the rider from the accidents occasioned by the foot hanging in the stirrup, should be thrown from his seat.—The bottom of Mr. M.'s stirrup is made larger than the lower surface of the foot, and may be plain or in bars, according to the fancy of the workman. From the middle of the sides a hoop springs, very much like the hoop of the common stirrup; then at small distances from each other, all round the front part of the stirrup, bended bars are fastened, and being carried up, unite in the centre hoop, and thus make a sort of basket-work for the front part of the foot; the bars are placed too close to admit the boot or shoe, and therefore the possibility of entangling the foot is effectually prevented, should the rider be thrown from his horse; and the whole is so contrived, by adapting the stirrup to the particular person for whom it is made, that the instep and ankle can never be injured by friction. The whole may be made of iron, or any other metal fit for the purpose.

38. Mr. T. Richardson's (Iron-Acton, Gloucestershire), for Improvements in the Art of preparing, colouring, and uniting the Skins of Sheep and Lambs.—The specification of this patent contains particular and minute directions for the whole process of tanning and colouring skins, from the time they are taken from the animal till they are in a finished state. Mr. R. shews in what manner they may be made to resemble any animal, either by spotting the skins, or by different kinds of shading. The manner which he adopts as the most preferable for uniting the skins, is by cutting the several pieces to the same length, and then by lapping them over each other a small distance, and sewing down the edges.—The patentee proposes to apply this manufacture to a great number of articles, such as bed-side and coach carpets, using the wool side in the winter, and the plain leather in summer; bed-mattresses and hammer-cloths; the stands for urns; rugs for the hearth, and for the door, to clean the feet: and, by being able to unite different skins, they may be made of any size, so as to appear but of one piece. He means also to apply his invention to the manufacture of muffs, shoes, &c.

39. Mr. Matthias Koop's (James Street, Westminster), for manufacturing Paper from Straw, Hay, Thistles, Waste and Refuse of Hemp and Flax, and different Kinds of Wood and Bark, fit for Printing and other useful Purposes.—For each pound of straw or hay, a pound and a half of quicklime is to be dissolved, in about a gallon or 6 quarts of river water. The hay or straw is to be cut into portions about 2 inches in length, then boiled in a considerable quantity of water, viz. about 2 gallons to a pound of materials, for $\frac{1}{2}$ of an hour. It is then to be macerated in the solution of lime and water, for 5, 6, 7, or more days, taking care to agitate the mass, by frequently stirring and turning it over. At the end of this time the lime-water is to be drawn off, and the materials to be washed very clean, and boiled in a large portion of clean river water. This part of the operation is to be repeated, and, for the sake of improving the colour of the paper, one pound of dissolved crystals of soda or potash may be used to every 36 pounds of straw or hay. When the materials are pressed out of the water, the manufacture of them into paper may be proceeded with by the usual and well-known processes. In some cases the patentee has thought it advisable to suffer the materials to ferment and heat before they were reduced to a pulp. This, however, will always depend upon the warmth of the season.—When thistles are used, they are to be cut down at the time when the bloom begins to fall, to be dried, and reduced into lengths of 2 inches; and then the same process to be made use of as has been already described with regard to the straw and hay.—The manufacture from wood, bark, refuse hemp, and flax, is carried on by similar processes. The wood is to be reduced into shavings, and the outside rough bark is to be first scraped away. Wood containing much turpentine or resinous matter cannot be beneficially made into paper.—Mr. K. does not mean to rest his invention upon the exclusive use of soft water: he lays claim to his privileges, although it should be hereafter found that spring-water is equally adapted to the purposes before mentioned.

40. Mr. R. Dickinson's (Long Acre), for a new or improved Method of fixing Straps of and to Saddles, to which the Girths are usually made fast or buckle.—This invention consists in the application of the power of a lever to a spring which is attached, by means of screws or rivets, to a plate of metal that is fixed to the upper or under side of the bar of the saddle-tree. There are two of these springs in correspondent situations upon the opposite bar of the saddle-tree, to which straps are attached for the purpose of fastening the ends of the girths; obstacles are, however, wisely placed to prevent the lever from being overdrawn.—The patentee mentions the following advantages as certain effects of this invention. By drawing the buckles of the girth with more or less force, the reaction of the said springs upon the levers, and consequently upon the straps, causes the girth to be applied with any desired firmness or tension; at the same time that the elasticity of the said spring affords a degree of ease and liberty for the horse to breathe and perform his various movements with much less constraint, and a greater degree of comfort and ease than can be had when the girth is applied and fixed in the usual manner.

41. Mr. R. Collins's (New Suram), for a Cephalic Snuff, being a Remedy for most Disorders in the Head, which it purges, strengthens the Nerves, and revivifies the Spirits.—To the best snuff made from Virginia leaf-tobacco, add one twelfth part of recent rasped snuff, and a small quantity of the true naccabaw; herbs, betony, eyebright, marjoram, thymysyrac, flowers of maram-syrac, equal quantities, dried and made into a fine powder, to which add the one twentieth part of the leaves of assari, dried and powdered in like manner; also of East India cloves one fiftieth part, essential oils of cinnamon, nutmegs, lavender, and balsam of Peru, a small quantity of each. These ingredients must be all well mixed, and put into an earthen pan, for four days, and then an ounce of eau-de-luce with a little orange-flower, lavender, and rose water, are to be added to each pound of snuff. It must be kept in bottles, and a pinch to be used as occasion may require.

42. Dr. G. F. Bauer's (Swithin's Lane), for Improvements in the Construction of Carriages, and the Wheels of Carriages.—The principles of this invention cannot be comprehended without referring to the drawings annexed to it; the advantages resulting from it, the patentee describes in the following manner:—first, machines made according to this plan are much lighter, without losing any thing in solidity; secondly, the friction is considerably diminished; and, thirdly, in the superior degree of elasticity which attaches to carriages made after his plan.

43. Mr. T. Fryer's (Halifax), for a Method of manufacturing and finishing Goods from Cotton, Cotton and Woolen, Cotton and Silk, Cotton and Linen, or Cotton and Mohair, in such Manner as to make the same appear as if covered with Ermine or Fur, and in Imitation thereof.—This method consists in the following particulars. 1st, After the cloth has been woven, it is to be rubbed with pumice-stone boards covered with emery, or metal blades, so as to remove or destroy the knots or knobs upon the surface thereof. 2d, It is then to be singed or sheared, and afterwards raised with cards or teazles to a shag, which appears like fur or ermine, which finishes the process for manufacturing the sort of goods already described.

44. Mr. Dearborn's (Boston), for Steel-yards. Are said to promise to be of great utility. On these, pieces of ordnance weighing 8000 pounds are easily suspended and accurately weighed. The whole apparatus is so compact, that two men may readily transport it on a hand-barrow to any distance. In the ordinary mode of weighing with scales, a great number of weights must be twice handled, and the common beams could scarcely be made strong enough to sustain so great a weight, as is easily managed with these steel-yards.

45. Mr. G. Hudson's (Chester), for the making or manufacturing of mineral or fossil Alkali.—This gentleman enumerates a great number of substances which he makes use of for the purpose of obtaining the mineral alkali, with the particulars of each process in the manufacture. It will give a general idea of his plan, to particularize the method which he takes with kelp: this is the substance which stands most prominent in the specification. To two hundred weight and a half of kelp, beat into very small pieces, or ground into powder, he adds one hundred and a half of soaper's ashes, and one hundred weight of waste tan, which he mixes together with water, or other fluid, till it comes to a proper consistency; it then is to be taken and placed on the bottom of a reverberatory furnace, the construction of which is shewn by a drawing annexed to the specification; a strong heat is to be applied, and constantly kept up, and the flame made to pass over and act upon the mixture. At the interval of every ten minutes, more water is to be thrown in, and more tanner's waste bark, and the whole to be kept moving about with an iron spatula: at the end of four hours the substance begins to flux, and in about six hours it will be found completely fluxed, and the operation finished.

46. Mr. Forder's (Portsea), for a Method of stopping the Leaks, &c. of Ships.—According to the plan described by the patentee, all trifling damages sustained by any vessels may be repaired without bringing them into dock. He has contrived a kind of diving-machine, made principally of copper and leather, the joints of which are to be rendered water-tight, by a sort of cement, likewise described in the specification. Mr. F. has not forgotten, that air and light will be wanted by the diver, for both of which he has provided; he seems also to have taken into consideration the immense pressure to which the machine must be subject at any given depth below the surface, and has so constructed it, that it may sustain the force: he has also a contrivance for taking down lighted candles, when the work is to be performed in the light. According to the plan which he has submitted to the public, the diver may remain under water, without inconvenience, two hours, during which a considerable quantity of work may be performed with regard to stopping leaks, &c.

47. Mr. T. Sawden's (Lincoln), for a Machine for cutting Straw for Fodder for Cattle, on Principles entirely new.—This machine is worked by hand. A man turns a wheel four feet in diameter; this gives motion to a wooden roller, laid with ribs of iron, and to one made of cast-iron; by the operation of these the hay or straw is drawn from the box to the knives, of which two or three are fixed upon an iron axle, and are of course turned round with the motion of the wheel, and are made to cut against a plate of polished steel.

48. Mr. W. Wabnsley's (Manchester), for a Machine for bailing and opening Cotton Wool, Sheep's Wool, Tow, Hemp, and Flax.—The patentee has given with his specification a bird's-eye view, a side view, and an end view, of his machine; by these, and a careful attention to his description, the mechanic and manufacturer will be able to estimate the value and importance of the invention.

49. Lord Dundonald's, for a Method or Methods of preparing a Substitute or Substitutes for Gum-Senegal, and other Gums, extensively employed in certain Branches of Manufacture.—Lord D.'s invention consists in procuring a substitute for gum from the class of plants called in botany lichens; from the plants of hemp and flax, previously to being steeped in water, or after having been steeped; likewise from the bark or rind of the willow or lime-tree.—The first process in preparing gum from the lichen is to free it of the outer skin of the plant, and the resinous matter, which is done by scalding it two or three times in boiling water, or by actually boiling it for fifteen or twenty minutes, then washing it in cold water, and laying it afterwards on a stone or brick floor for ten or twelve hours.—The scalded lichen is then to be put into a copper boiler, with a due proportion of water, that is, about two wine-gallons to every pound of lichen, and boiled during ten or twelve hours, adding about a quarter of an ounce of soda, or pearl-ashes, for every pound of lichen, or, instead of these salts, about two ounces of volatile alkali. The boiling should be continued until the liquor acquires a considerable degree of gummy consistence: it is then suffered to drain, and after to be squeezed in a press similar to that used by the melters of tallow.—The first boiling does not extract the whole of the gum, and should be repeated a second, and even a third time, diminishing, at each time, the quantity of water and the quantity of alkali: but when the volatile alkali is made use of, the boiler must be made of iron, instead of copper, which is acted upon by the volatile alkali.—Hemp, flax, and the bark of the willow and lime trees, or sea-weed, are to be heated in a similar manner, to extract the gum or mucilage contained in them; and his Lordship includes in this patent every tree, plant, or vegetable, of whatever kind, from which a gum is to be extracted by the action of volatile or fixed alkaline salts, when used in the processes of maceration, digestion, or boiling these vegetable matters.

50. Mr. Nathan Smith's (Brightelmstone), for a Method of Construction, or making a Vapour-bath or Vessel, of different Sizes and Shapes, by uniting thereto, and using therewith, a certain mathematical Instrument or Machine, called an Air-pump or Exhauster, for curing and relieving Persons afflicted with the Gout, putrid and inflammatory Sores of various Kinds, with which the human Body may be afflicted.—This vapour-bath is made either to receive the whole body of the patient, or any particular part of it that is afflicted. It is first filled with steam, and then the external air is drawn out of the vessel in a less or greater degree, as the patient can bear it, thus giving aid to the elastic force of the internal air contained within the human body, to throw out and expel the matter which occasions pain, or hinders the natural functions of the human frame. The operation is to be repeated each time, as often as it may be deemed necessary.

51. Mr. T. Martin's (Clerkenwell), for Improvements in the Art of tanning and dressing Hides.—This invention consists in placing a boiler of convenient size, near a reservoir of water, with a pipe near the edge of the boiler to convey hot water into a vat intended to regulate the warmth of the water, and which is placed rather higher than the vats which contain the raw goods, and those working out the limes; so that the first may empty itself into a second and third vat, or into as many as may be deemed necessary. These vats are made with false bottoms, for the reception of the sand, blood, filth, &c. collected by the pelts in the slaughter-houses and markets, and which will, by the application of water rather warmer than blood-heat, be more readily separated from the skins, and will sink under the false bottoms, whence it may be conveyed into a sewer by pulling out a plug from the real bottom.—The application of warm water will revive dried hides, and expedite the process of tanning or dressing, by expanding the pores for the reception of the ooze, alum-liquor, &c. When the hides are perfectly clean, they are to be limed; and when the hair is taken off, they must be cleaned from the lime with warm water.—Mr. M. gives a very particular and accurate description of his method of constructing his vats; of what materials they are made; and of the nature of the ground on which they are to rest. He then describes the nature of the planks to be used in passing from one vat to another; the necessity of frequently removing and handling the goods, without impeding the circulation of the ooze; and how the ooze is to be removed from one vat to another, by means of pumps or jets. The necessary pumps may be wrought by men, or by a bark-mill commonly turned by horses, or by a boiler, the steam of which may be employed to grind the bark and work the pumps; and the fire for this purpose will prove of great utility in drying the new bark, and making it grind well, and in drying the old exhausted bark for burning; also for drying the leather, hair, wool, glue-pieces, &c.

52. Mr. J. Weekes's (Plymton), for a Machine to grind Bark and other Substances.—This machine is, we are informed, calculated to produce the article of bark in the best possible state for tanners, sufficiently soft and small, with none of that fine dust caused by friction, so prejudicial to the process of tanning; and the whole expense of a machine, which will last for a great number of years, may be saved by the grinding of about one hundred tons of bark, without taking into consideration the risk and expense of drying bark by fire, which is never recurred to by those who make use of this machine.—The mills may be made of any size, and grind any quantity of bark, by applying an adequate power: and they may be worked by water, wind, steam, horses, or even by manual labour.—This patent extends to grinding any other substance besides bark, and to an apparatus for raising liquors, and conveying them from one place, vessel, or vat, to another; so that no man is obliged to dip or pump the liquor, or handle the leather, as has hitherto been done.—It may be applied to any tan-yard already planted; to breweries; and to many other useful purposes.

53. Mr. Wyatt's (New Bridge Street), for his Invention of certain Improvements in the Apparatus for, and Mode of Distillery, drying Coffee and Sugar.—The improvements in distilling consist, first, in applying steam to produce the heat required for distillation, and adapting an apparatus for that specific purpose; and, secondly, in varying the construction and disposition of common stills, when fire alone is to be employed.—In the process of distillation, steam is conveyed through proper tubes, either into the matter intended for distillation, or through it, or wholly or partially round, or beneath it, and in contact with the external substance of the still or vessel in which the matter is contained, or in any of those methods combined: that of introducing the steam wholly and totally into the body of the liquid to be distilled, so as to be mingled therewith, being the most effectual and advantageous.—The liquid being thus heated by the action or contact of steam, the subsequent parts of the process proceed in the same way as a common distillation over a fire.—The parts essential to the system of distillation by steam may be omitted, and then the apparatus will be applicable to the common mode of distillery by fire alone, which constitutes the second part of the improvement, and consists in making the roof of the still a medium of condensation, and applying a channel beneath that roof to conduct the liquid arising from the condensation into the ultimate condenser.—The mode of drying coffee and sugar consists in exposing those substances to the action of air, raised to a necessary degree of heat, by passing over, or in contact with, a body of heated steam. If, therefore, any receptacle, admitting and discharging occasionally the external air, be allotted for drying coffee and sugar, and that receptacle heated by the access of steam, so that none of the steam shall come in contact with either of those substances; that construction of an apparatus will produce the effect described, and is claimed by Mr. W. as his invention.—This apparatus may be applied to the drying of other substances, such as grain, gunpowder, &c.

54. Mr. R. Fryer's (Halifax), for a Method of manufacturing, cutting, dressing, drying, and finishing of Cloth, the Warp whereof is composed of Silk, Cotton, Woollen, Worsted, or Linear Yarn, and the Weft of Sheep's or Lamb's Wool.—This new method of manufacturing cloth, &c. consists, first, in carding, rowing, and spinning in the common method; 2dly, after the weft is manufactured, it is wove into a warp or warps, by causing the weft or woof to float or pass over two or three or more threads of the warp, for going under, or being attached to the cloth only by one or more threads of the warp, which causes it to form a roll or figure on the face of the cloth; 3dly, the cloth so manufactured is then to be cut with a knife, or other instrument, by introducing it under the roll or figure, and running it along with the hand, or by a machine, which cuts that part of the weft which is left above such roll or figure, or afloat in the figure, and thereby produces a fine rich cover upon the face of the cloth; 4thly, the cloth is then to be singed by means of a red hot cylinder, instead of being cropped or sheared; which method of finishing woollen cloth so manufactured, the patentee claims as a new invention, and never practised before by any other person.—The cloth is then to be scoured in soap-suds or lie, or any other alkaline solution fit for the purpose, and afterwards boiled a few hours in clean water, when it is fit for dyeing and finishing according to the discretion of the manufacturer.

55. Mr. J. Tate's (Tottenham Court Road), for Improvements in the Construction of Wheel-carriages.—Mr. T.'s invention appears to be an admirable method of diminishing the effects of friction. The whole weight of the carriage is made to rest on two or more new-invented friction-wheels; by the action of which the whole axle-tree is made to turn round, as well as the wheels on the axle. The friction-wheels are made something in the form of inverted cones; they are fitted up with cups to contain a certain quantity of oil; turn upon centres; and revolve only once during three revolutions of the carriage-wheels; by which means the friction, which increases with the velocity, will be always kept to a very moderate degree.—Mr. T. from various experiments, is confident that, by his plan, one horse will be able to do as much work as four in the common mode.

56. Mr. J. Smith's (Red Lion Street, Holborn), for a Method of fixing and setting an Alarm, or Alarm-bell, so contrived as to alarm Families in case of Fires, &c.—It is known to every body that alarms, on the old construction, are acted upon by means of wires, connected with doors, window-shutters, &c. and that no person can force these parts of the house without breaking or disengaging the wire, which instantly sets the alarm off. This, of course, would be of no use in the case of fire, as it would be a considerable time before the flames would make sufficient impression on it as to cause a separation of its parts. Instead, therefore, of wire, the patentee makes use of a fine, but strong, string, which flames will speedily burn in two. As a preventive against burglarie, the little bolts that confine the string are made so sharp, that a very small pressure may cut it asunder, which instantly disengages the alarm.—Obs. We have only to observe, that inventions which tend to the security of lives and property merit every attention. The great objection to alarms is, that from a variety of accidents the wires in the old construction, and the cord in the new, are apt to snap, at times when there is no danger, by which persons and families may be terrified without any real cause. It is obvious, that for Mr. S.'s invention to serve as a perfect alarm against the effects of fire, the cord should be carried to every door and window, and those be previously shut; and then a fire could not extend beyond a single room, without awakening the family.

57. Mr. T. Pritty's (Stowmarket), for a Method or Invention of affixing, or hanging, certain Springs, Joints, and Apparatus to Doors, by means whereof, such Doors may be opened from either Lamb.—In the door made according to Mr. P.'s plan, there are two projecting balls or handles instead of one, and according as it is intended to open the door on one side or the other, must the corresponding ball be turned towards the edge. This ball, or handle, is connected with a latch that acts as a lever, by means of which a certain wire, and two pins, are raised out of that part of the hinge which is fast on the door, and immediately it is free to open with the same ease as a door hung in the common way. It appears then that there are in this contrivance two sets of hinges, and that the projecting balls or handles serve, by the act of turning, to extricate the pin from one hinge, and giving liberty, at the same time, to the door to play on the other.—Doors formed on this construction are made, where there are no obstacles to prevent them, to open completely back, or one hundred and eighty degrees. And for chambers, &c. where security is required, there is a contrivance for dropping in two small pins into the balls or handles, which effectually prevents them from being turned on the outside of the room.

58. Messrs. Henry Pemecck and Robert Dunkin's (of Penzance), for Methods of improving the sailing and navigating certain Ships.—Several improvements in the methods of navigating vessels are mentioned in this specification: the action of the square sails is increased by forming the leeches of such convexity, that the bolt-ropes may not be drawn tighter than necessary to preserve the sail, and to allow it to produce the required effect. Two new and improved fore-and-aft sails are next described, which may be readily managed without dipping; besides full directions for the construction and management of these and other sails described, with their various tackle, &c. We have in the same specification a claim for a new-invented compass, called a transparent or luminous compass, whose inner box, or ring, as it has no bottom, is balanced round its lower circumference, across which are fixed wires that support the pedestal. The card is painted on both sides; its letters and points, as well as a point for the ship's head, are rendered transparent; a mirror is placed below it, which turns on a hinge by night, and the lamp-light is admitted either below or above the card, according as it is desirable to steer, by the simple or reflected transparency: in the former case, the mirror is turned to throw the light on the card, and the eye is admitted above; in the latter, the mirror is turned to meet the eye, which is admitted below. The light is of course admitted or excluded by the proper application of shutters, and by raising or lowering the lamp. It may be likewise used as a common compass.—Obs. by the patentees. It must be remarked, that although on the common compasses black and white are strongly defined, yet no little difficulty, at night, often occurs, in readily ascertaining the exact point, which must yield to the superior contrast of light and darkness; and when its capability of being elevated to meet the eye, as well as its emitting less light on the sails in chase, or when pursued, are thrown into the scale, it is fairly imagined considerable advantages will be found in its use.

59. Mr. J. Ashworth's (of Tottington, Lancashire), for a Method of making Iron-liquor, for the Use of Dyers and Painters.—The patentee prefaces this specification by observing, that, according to the usual processes in making iron-liquor, a space of seven weeks is required for the operation; but according to his invention, the same may be brought to perfection in two or three days.—Mr. A.'s method is thus described: any metallic oxyd is dissolved in a vegetable acid; and as between these substances there is less affinity than between the same acid and the oxyd of iron, iron in its metallic state is added to the above solution, which precipitates the metal before dissolved, and is taken up in its place. Example: dissolve about six ounces of red lead in vinegar, at a boiling heat, which is to be poured into a vessel containing pieces of iron, and there left to stand all together about twenty-four or thirty-six hours. The liquor is then boiled with the same or fresh pieces of iron, and when cool it is ready for use. A similar effect is produced by substituting any of the oxyds of manganese, tin, copper, bismuth, antimony, or arsenic, in the place of lead, or by the substituting any of the vegetable acids instead of vinegar. The application of this principle to the making of iron-liquor with vegetable acids, is claimed by Mr. A. as an exclusive privilege.—The second principle in this specification, depends on the solution of any iron oxyd, as ocre, Venetian red, or Spanish brown, in a vegetable acid brought to a boiling heat, then poured on iron in its metallic state; and after it has stood a day or two, and boiled a second time, it is good iron-liquor, and fit for use.—Obs. of the patentee. Although the principle of this second process differs from that described under the first head, and does not depend upon elective attraction, yet the solution of the metallic iron is, probably, effected by its attracting the oxygen from the oxyd of iron previously dissolved, and a compound is by this means also obtained of a vegetable acid, with iron oxydated to the extent proper for producing good iron-liquor.

60. Mr. J. Fryer's (of Raistrick, York), for a Machine for the Purpose of cutting, dressing, and finishing Woollen Cloth.—This machine is applicable to the cutting, &c. the shag, fur, or pile, from all kinds of cloth or woven fabrications which require the same, made of woollen or worsted yarn, down, silk, hair, cotton, or linen, used for wearing apparel, in a more expeditious manner than has been hitherto accomplished. It is not possible to describe the parts of this machine, so as to make it intelligible to the general reader, without the assistance of plates.—After the cloth has undergone the operation of shearing, it is, in its descent to a cylinder, exposed to a current of steam, thrown out from a horizontal tube with a number of apertures, so as to give it softness and pliability; a brushing cylinder is next made to move against it, by which the remaining wool or fur is laid in one direction. It then passes between two polished metal, hollow cylinders, kept hot by the admission of steam or otherwise, which press it firmly, and dissipate all the water imbibed from the steam.—The steam employed is procured either from a boiler, kept hot for the purpose, or from a small steam-engine, of peculiar construction, made use of for working the machine.—The simplicity of the steam-engine merits a description here. A piston is alternately pressed upwards and downwards, by means of elastic steam, in a cylinder closed at both ends, with a wadded hole for the piston-rod to move through, which gives motion to a crank and fly, or balance-wheel. Instead of condensing the steam, as in other engines, it is in this suffered to escape, after it has forced the piston, in either direction, to the end of the cylinder; it is then conducted through proper vessels to soften the cloth, and heat the pressing cylinders, or made use of for any other purpose where heat is required, such as heating drying-houses, stoves, hot-houses, &c.—Remarks by the patentee. This mode of finishing cloth gives it a much handsomer appearance, and renders it more durable in wearing than that finished in a common way.

BURDETT AND PARR.

Copy of a Letter from Sir F. Burdett to Dr. Parr.

SIR, I am sorry that it is not in my power to place you in a situation which would well become you—I mean in the Episcopal Palace at Buckden: but I can bring you very near to it; for I have the presentation to a rectory now vacant, within a mile and a half of it, which is very much at Dr. Parr's service. It is the rectory of Graffham, at present worth two hundred pounds a year, and, as I am informed, may soon be worth two hundred and seventy; and I this moment learn that the incumbent died last Tuesday.—Dr. Parr's talents and character might well entitle him to better patronage than this from those who know how to estimate his merits; but I acknowledge that a great additional motive with me to the offer I now make him, is, that I believe I cannot do any thing more pleasing to his friends, Mr. Fox, Mr. Sheridan, and Mr. Knight; and I desire you, Sir, to consider yourself obliged to them only. I have the honour to be, Sir, with the greatest respect, your obedient servant,

FRANCIS BURDETT.

Vicarage-house, Buckden, Sept. 26th, 1802.

DEAR SIR, After rambling in various parts of Norfolk, I went to Cambridge, and from Cambridge I yesterday came to the parsonage of my most respectable friend, Mr. Malkby, at Buckden, where I this morning had the honour of receiving your letter. Mrs. Parr opened it last Friday at Hatton, and I trust that you will pardon the liberty she took in desiring your servant to convey it to me in Huntingdonshire, where she knew that I should be, as upon this day.—Permit me, dear Sir, to request that you would accept the warmest and most sincere thanks of my heart for this unsolicited, but most honourable, expression of your good will towards me. Nothing can be more important to my worldly interest than the service you have done me, in presenting me to the living of Graffham: nothing can be more exquisitely gratifying to my very best feelings than the language in which you have conveyed to me this mark of your friendship. Indeed, dear Sir, you have enabled me to pass the years of declining life in comfortable and honourable independence. You have given me additional and unalterable conviction, that the firmness with which I have adhered to my principles, has obtained for me the approbation of wise and good men. And when that approbation assumes, as it now does, the form of protection, I fairly confess to you, that the patronage of Sir Francis Burdett has a right to be ranked among the proudest, as well as the happiest, events of my life. I trust that my future conduct will justify you in the disinterested and generous gift which you have bestowed upon me: and sure I am that my friends Mr. Fox, Mr. Sheridan, and Mr. Knight, will not only share with me in my joy, but sympathize with me in those sentiments of respect and gratitude which I shall ever feel towards Sir Francis Burdett.—Most assuredly I shall myself set a higher value upon your kindness, when I consider it as intended to gratify the friendly feelings of these excellent men, as well as to promote my own personal happiness.—I shall wait your pleasure about the presentation; and I beg leave to add, that I shall stay at Buckden for one week only, and shall have reached Hatton about this day fortnight, where I shall obey your commands. One circumstance, I am sure, will give you great satisfaction, and therefore I shall beg leave to state it. The living of Graffham will be of infinite value to me, because it is tenable with a rectory I now have in Northamptonshire; and happy I am that my future residence will be fixed, and my existence closed, upon that spot where Sir Francis Burdett has given me the power of spending my old age with comforts and conveniences, quite equal to the extent of my fondest wishes, and far surpassing any expectations I have hitherto ventured to indulge. I have the honour to be, with the greatest respect, and most unfeigned thankfulness, dear Sir, your very obedient, faithful servant,

For the Political Register.

SIR, Amidst the various information contained from time to time in your valuable Register, on the affairs of France, I do not recollect to have seen any account of her PUBLIC FUNDS. The history of the French finances from the commencement of the revolution; of the mode in which money has been raised, year after year, for carrying on so long and expensive a war; the origin and amount of their present debt, their resources, and other particulars connected with this subject, would, no doubt, be very interesting to many of your readers. I am led to make these observations by the following circumstance. Seeing the French Tiers Consolidé frequently quoted in our newspapers, curiosity prompted me to make some inquiry respecting their public funds of a friend, whose situation I thought would enable him to procure me the desired information. He sent the following statement, which was taken from a paper just put into his hands, and is probably a translation from the French. I here insert it, that, if inaccurate, it may be corrected, and that its deficiency of information may be supplied by one of your correspondents qualified for the undertaking.—The public funds of France consist of, 1st, Bank Shares, or Actions de la Banque, as they are called; 2d, Third Consolidated, or Tiers Consolidé.—The speculation on the Exchange at Paris turns principally on the Third Consolidated.—It is presumed that the amount of that stock is about 38,000,000 francs already consolidated.—Life annuities, including pensions, may be 39,000,000 francs; but this sum decreases in proportion to the expiration of the lives. There will be this year about 2,800,000 francs of the provision consolidated in the Tiers Consolidé; and there remain moreover to be liquidated 2,000,000 francs in perpetual annuities: 20,000,000 francs in life annuities.—The settlement of the above two annuities will take at least ten years.—The writ-

ter concludes that the whole amount of the interest of the public debt is about 101,800,000 francs.—A franc is in value a little more than 10*d.* of our money.—The Tiers consolidé is a 5 per cent. stock, and has been lately quoted in the Moniteur as such. The price stands at present between 55 and 56; i. e. a capital of 100 bearing interest at 5 per cent. per annum, would cost between 55 and 56*l.* sterling: consequently this stock pays between 8 and 9*l.* annual interest.—The interest is paid every six months in cash; but he who buys at any time between the 21st of March and the 21st of September, will have a right to the interest only commencing from the latter day. If he purchase between the 21st of September and 21st of March, his right to the interest does not commence till March 21st, and he would not receive his first half-yearly dividend till September 21st. The seller always retains his right to half a year's interest at the succeeding stated time of payment. This is the rule.—For buying, no sort of formality is required; but for receiving interest, or selling, a power of attorney is necessary. The bank-stock is disposed of in shares or actions of 1000 francs each. Its capital is computed to be about 31,800,000 francs, and there is every reason to believe, that, as soon as commerce resumes its flourishing state, it will establish an annual dividend from between 8 to 10*l.* per cent.—It is a curious circumstance, that the 3 per cent. stock of this country, burdened with a debt of between 5 and 600,000,000*l.* sterling, is upwards of 70, while the 5 per cent. stock of France, whose public debt does not amount to 5,000,000*l.* (if the above statement be accurate), is not at present quite 56.

MALTA.

Translation of a Memoir, containing the Sentiments of the Maltese on the Evacuation of their Island by the English.

THE Locotenenti of the cities and boroughs, and the representatives of the towns, humbly represent, The sensation produced at Malta by the news that has been brought by the French cartel, that the island is to be delivered up to the Order, is violent and universal.—The conduct of the captain and his officer who landed, in communicating with those who are notorious partisans of the French, gives suspicion that Buonaparté has consented to restore the island to the Order, only with a view to make himself master of it. The Order has itself but few partisans, who never have had, since their expulsion, any weight with the people, farther than by exciting discontent occasionally on various false allegations.—The French are generally detested; and as the Maltese foresee that the putting the Order in possession of the island is tantamount to giving it to the French, they are determined to resist it.—All those who have heretofore opposed, either the Order itself, or the French, look on themselves as certain victims; and this description composes the great body of the people. In the desperate situation they will be placed in, we must expect to see the most obstinate resistance made by a people, whose bravery and high spirit has been proved; they began to taste the advantages, and enjoy the happiness of his Majesty's government; they saw prospects of an extensive commerce; of this island becoming the emporium of the Mediterranean, and arts, sciences, and manufactures flourishing; they began to feel a consequence in having become a part of a vast empire, and every individual found himself elevated from a state of dejection to a respectable member of society. Whether in future they be under the Order, or the French, they know importance only will be attached to their island as a port and a military post, and that the people will return to a more abject state than they have been in at any past period. Every merchant of property has determined to quit the country, in the apprehension, that under the Order their commerce will be cramped, as it was before, from motives of policy, not to excite the jealousy of other powers. Under the French, they well know that Marseilles and other ports will have every preference given to them.—The apprehensions of those who took up arms, and fought with the utmost intemperacy against the French and the Order, need not be described.—With respect to the ability of the Order to maintain itself in independency, and as a neutral power, they remark, 1st, That the other nations having taken from the Order all its revenues, it must be dependant on France, which will not fail to support its knights, and who are much more numerous, as France is in possession of three langues. Thus, in the very beginning, without any open attack, France will be mistress of Malta, and whenever it suits her to throw off the mask, she may hoist her tri-coloured flag on their impregnable bulwark. 2dly, The garrison of Malta was formerly composed of Maltese. The Order will not trust them now. It must, therefore, employ foreign troops, which there is no doubt will be such as are in the French interest, let them be of what nation they may. The French having the garrison in their pay, and devoted to their interest, will therefore be masters of the island. 3dly, The Maltese may hope to dispossess the French as they did before; but will not the French lay up timely a store of provisions to hold out a long siege? and a blockade in winter is almost impossible. Will they not easily disarm the inhabitants, or turn them out of their fortresses, and, in general, take measures to prevent their being again surprised? 4thly, Will the Maltese, after being abandoned and sacrificed by the English, trust on their protection a second time? From being our ardent friends, they will become our most inveterate enemies. 5thly, If it is therefore determined to withdraw the British troops from Malta, they entreat that they may be left to themselves to settle with the Order. They are determined not to submit to any foreign power but Great Britain; and to perish under the ruins of their cities, or maintain their liberty and independence. After having received us as friends and liberators, after having so cordially united with us, they have reason to hope that we will not unite with their enemies in assisting to subdue them, and deliver them over as slaves to other masters. As yet they cannot suspect us of such conduct. They complain heavily of their being sacrificed in the capitulations of the French, and they were by the tyranny and the insults they experienced lately under a military command, so provoked, that they were on the point of rising, when the giving them a civil government perfectly reconciled them: from all this the more enlightened Maltese insist that the anger of the body of the people will so awaken, at being abandoned by us now, that it will ever be out of our power, on any future occasion, to repossess ourselves of the island. 6thly, They feel the great political importance of Malta to whoever may hold it. They know that, in the hands of the French, they may at all times reconquer Egypt, and proceed to India with more experience and force than before.—They know that Russia is at this moment eager to see the Order, or, what is equivalent, France, hold Malta (the intercepted letters prove this): that Russia, however her projects against Turkey may lie dormant during one reign, will ever be revived; and that whoever has Malta has a sure means of uniting with Russia; and that if France will give up the Turks, she may rely on the co-operation of Russia to oppose the British having any power in the Mediterranean.—They know that Russia, united with France, may exclusively enjoy all the commerce of the Levant; that France may be supplied with naval stores from the Black Sea in all security; that a Russian army may march in a few days from their settlements in the south of the Caspian, to the dominions of Zaman Sha, and put into effect the threats of the late Empress Catharine, to drive us out of India.—In short, as long as they are persuaded that Malta is the key of India, and the link that will unite Russia and France, that will shut us out of the Mediterranean, and prevent us for ever from counteracting the influence of France in Italy; that will create a naval power, which may one day appear, and bid us defiance in the Atlantic.—As long as Great Britain possesses Malta, though every surrounding nation be our enemies, she will be mistress of the Mediterranean.—With respect to England, they are not ignorant of the importance of this island as a place of commerce; that this would be the great market for British manufacture, and Italian, Turkish, and Russian products; that in this arsenal every convenience for building, fitting out, or laying up a fleet, is to be found; that this might be the granary of Europe; that corn, to any amount, might be collected here, and stored up, from the Black Sea, from Egypt, and from every port where it were cheap, to supply every country where it may be wanted, and Great Britain itself in time of scarcity.—With respect to the knights personally, they affirm they cannot be neutral, wanting internal power, and the protection of neighbouring states. The only power that can take up their cause, is the power which has it in view to dispossess them.—They have violated their solemn vow at the altar, sealed with the sacrament, in delivering up their island, or consenting in betraying their Grand Master, and their own religious and military institutions; they have violated every tie of honour, as religious, as gentlemen, as soldiers. Can such be trusted? A great number entered the regicide service, and went to Egypt. The whole of them, with scarcely any exception, behaved in a manner incompatible with their obligations.—Those only could plead guiltless who were absent from the island: but they behaved in a manner not less reprehensible; not one of them came, as their oath obliged them, to Malta, to help to recover the ancient seat of the Order: the road to honour was open to them; an army of natives were in the field, and there was the powerful co-operation of allies. In fine, there is not one single knight who is not, according to the statutes of the Order, degraded, and has lost all pretence to be of the body; he is tacitly excluded and dishonoured.—The Order, therefore, does not exist. It is annihilated according to its own statutes.—The few despicable mendicants took refuge in Russia, where they were more safe from danger than in the camp before Valetta, and created, for a piece of bread, a schism in their Order; which was as much a violation of all their obligations, though not so scandalous a prostitution of honour, as was the part the more infamous took in opening their gates to the French. These are our sentiments, until we can have time to make a formal representation, and send a national representation to England. You are entreated to make them known to the King's civil commissioner, and to implore him, by all the attachment we have to his person, to the British government, to honour, virtue, and religion; by the attachment we have for our wives, our children, our paternal island, by the dignity of man, and by the sacred law of justice; by humanity, generosity, and gratitude for our sincere attachment, that he will be pleased to represent our miserable situation at the foot of his Majesty's throne, praying that it may stand for ever the bulwark and the asylum of liberty, fidelity, and religion.

MALTA.—(Morning Post, Jan. 23, 1802.)—Sir, The Times, of the 18th inst. pronounced its own judgment, fortunately neither competent nor decisive, upon Hompesch, the Grand Master.—The honour of an European being a matter not less sacred than the hereditary right of a nabob, I hope, Sir, that you will give admission to the following observations in your paper. This is an article from the Bamberg Gazette, No. 325, of the 21st Nov. last.—“Bamberg, Nov. 20.—We have been requested to publish the following declaration at full length. We have hesitated so much the less in doing it, as the imputations laid against the Grand Master Hompesch have been pointed out for false and calumnious in the Vienna Court Gazette, No. 33.—The Declaration of the Bailly de Tigné, respecting the Production against the Grand Master, printed in all the Newspapers under the Name of that estimable Character.—A production in five sheets is in circulation at St. Petersburg (dated the 21st of June 1798), of which I am marked out as the author. It is full of the most atrocious calumnies against our lawful chief, the Grand Master of Malta. Though the writing bears all the marks of improbability, it has yet acquired some credit, because they have had the assurance to publish it in print. My sorrow was inexpressible when I learnt that so dark a deception, and destitute of all credibility, had however occasioned so unhappy a division in our Order. If every honest man is obliged to clear himself from a similar imputation, which closely attacks his honour, this duty is more strongly imposed upon an ecclesiastic, to whom the editing of a libel against his superior is falsely attributed—I am persuaded that every one who is acquainted with me has given no credit to such a calumny. Looking at its want of likelihood, and its absurdity, it would not have made any impression upon the public, if they did not so readily pick up reports which tend to tarnish the reputation of any one whatsoever. This is a sufficient reason for me to give the lie to the defamer, and to defend my own honour thus attacked unjustly. I might adduce numerous motives to remove the suspicion from myself that I could ever be capable of composing such a libel. My years, my conduct, manners, and habits, sufficiently justify me; they would rather form my panegyric. It will suffice for me to observe, that at the time when I should have written that piece, I was ready to expire under a mortal complaint, and had received the sacrament as a dying man. Can any reasonable man suppose I would have thought of such calumnies in a similar state, or even could have dictated them?—What advantage could I expect to derive from so dark a proceeding, which was likely to expose me to the hatred and detestation of every reasonable and honest man? I declare then to all my brethren, ecclesiastics of my Order, and to all those to whom this justification shall come to hand, that I have not written, and that I could not have written that libel which is circulated under my name. I call to witness all those who have known me, and have had connexion with me; they acknowledge me incapable of having written it. I will that this declaration, signed by me, and duly attested by a notary, shall be set forth wherever it may be necessary, in order that the public may have likewise an authentic proof of the truth, and of my innocence. Done in the city of La Valette, in the island of Malta, the 3d of October 1800.

BAILLY DE TIGNE',

[Here follow the declarations of the witnesses, and of the notary.]—These are the means that have been employed to impose upon the more romantic and fantastical than chevaleresque author of the challenge to sovereigns, and of the Northern Confederacy, to overwhelm an unfortunate honest man, by persuading a married sovereign of the Greek church that he had the right himself with honorary, married, Greek, and Catholic chevaliers, to judge without a hearing, upon forged accusations, as unlikely as untrue, the chief of a religious Catholic Order, bachelors upon oath, who could not be judged without being heard, and only by a legal chapter assembled of all the divisions (langues) of the Order, under the countenance of the Pope. Doubtless the Grand Master Hompesch has been culpable, if it be true that notice had been given him, and, being so, that he had still had the power to proceed against the traitors; yes, if it be so, he has been to blame himself, chief of the very essence of the Catholic nobility, to believe that indulgence and confidence would bring back his knights to duty and to honour. But the great ones of the earth, who would judge him upon that, for the fact of weakness, would they not be apprehensive that he should say to them in the words of the Gospel, he who is without fault, let him cast the first stone at me? The pretended dismissal given by the Grand Master Hompesch is equally exceptionable; he could not give it but in the form above mentioned, speaking of his judgment, and still would it be requisite that it should be accepted by the tribunal composed in this manner. This pretended dismissal never existed, except in a letter to Paul the First from the Grand Master, whose counsels had engaged him, for the repose of the world, to flatter his folly, in seeming to legalize it in some manner; but this letter was never even answered by Paul. The Pope besides, and the langues of this Order in Spain and Portugal, have never ceased to acknowledge, and to call the Baron Hompesch Grand Master. He caused to appear then successively two justificatory addresses equally convincing and noble; and it is useless to repeat that the money which the French permitted him to carry away from Malta, he deposited at his arrival on the continent in the first chest belonging to the Order; exposing himself to the most extreme misery, which had menaced him really, if he had been equally abandoned, betrayed, and forgotten, by every-body, as he has been by his knights in Malta and Russia. If in our times, then, those who reclaim rights for themselves were the first to acknowledge and respect them towards others, the Grand Master Hompesch would be before all re-installed and replaced in his dignity. Those sentiments of justice, loyalty, and humanity, manifested by Alexander the First, allow no supposition that he will oppose so equitable a measure. The Grand Master might after that give in his dismission legally, and wish well for the safety of Malta under a new Grand Master, and under the eventual guarantee stipulated for that island. As to his base accusers, it will suffice by ranging them under the same class as those who have delivered up Malta to the French, to yield them up to the contempt of mankind.

PHILALETHES.

A Letter addressed to Philalethes, from a Man full as well disposed, but better informed than himself, dated March 7, 1802.

THE Times declares, "that the Grand Master caused a letter, written by the Bailly of "Tigné, to be circulated at the moment of the "elections." This is false. The letter was inserted in the Italian gazettes, in 1800. Paul the First was then living; this letter was sent to Paul the First, attested by twelve witnesses, present at the declaration of the Bailly of Tigné, viz. the Baillies Rabasters, Belmont, Barres, Clugny, St. Foix, the Commander Fricon, the Knight Djenne, brother Lewis Abaté, and John Lewis Reddi, conventual chaplains; Augustin Chiappe, merchant; Francis Arcina, commissary of the granaries, and the notary Frendo, who received the solemn act from the magistrate of Messina, by whom it was legalized. The Vienna Gazette, of the 16th of May 1801, has made mention of it, and quoted the Italian gazettes. If this declaration has not had more publicity, it is because the newspapers, who received it, were afraid of offending Paul the First, and dared not to give it to their readers. They were even afraid of inserting a reply to a letter written by Dolomieu. —In the printed memorial, which I send you, you will see that the Grand Master is inviolable; that the General Chapter is only legislative by the consent of the Grand Master and the Pope; that it can only approve or reject the matters laid before it by the Grand Master for its discussion; that it has no initiative power; that its duration is limited by the Grand Master, who presides in the persons of his delegates, who breaks up the assembly when he pleases, and annuls all its transactions. according to his pleasure: afterwards follow the other powers; for, being co-proprietors, they are interested in the admission of no statutes that can be offensive to them. You will see that the Pope cannot pass sentence upon the Grand Master, because he is a sovereign. The Pope may pass sentence upon the religieux; but here there is nothing contrary to canonical forms.

The Pope may pass sentence upon the knights for offences against the Grand Master; but there exists a written law which commands silence as to the Grand Master, and a law which forbids every General Chapter to infringe upon the rights and prerogatives of the Grand Master.—The Maltese deputation in London was the rebellion of a minority.—The majority had assembled in parishes, and demanded the restoration of the Order, and the Grand Master Hompesch. This majority had deputies at Paris and Rome. The proceeding bears date the 10th November 1801, and was forwarded to the King of England, and to Buonaparté, thanking them, in the name of the Maltese, for having restored their Sovereign Hompesch, and the Order. These are the precise words of a letter written by the Grand Master himself, on the 17th of January in the present year, and I have in my possession the proceedings of the different deputations from 1799 to the present day.—I have also in my hands a summary, which I drew up, of the correspondence of the knights with the Grand Master, since the pretended abdication: it consists of five hundred letters, expressive of fidelity and attachment, and of requests for nominations. Among them are letters from Sicilian, Portuguese, and Spanish knights; and justificatory memorials given in by these knights, who were all at Malta, who saw the treason and pointed out the traitors—those who were desirous of poisoning and assassinating the Grand Master. This agreement of sentiment between knights of different nations, writing at a considerable distance from each other, is an evident proof of the innocence of the Grand Master.—Alexander the First did not openly constrain, but he privately demanded: several priors complained of the violence used to force them to elect. The Prior of Bohemia, for example, declared on the 4th of December, that he was ignorant of the Grand Mastership being vacant. The 18th of the same month was the day of election!—Portugal, Spain, Tuscany, and Rome, neither voted, nor replied to the invitation. Spain alone forms a majority: France has hitherto not declared herself.—Let us examine this pretended dismission. The statutes take from the Grand Master the power of resigning his situation. He must ask permission of the Pope, and if it be granted, he is then at liberty to resign.—The Grand Master can give in his resignation to the Pope only. He is prohibited from giving it, even to the council of the Order. The council demanded this privilege about two hundred years ago, but it was refused by the Pope, in order that no Grand Master advanced in years might be forced, by a cabal, to resign his situation.—When the Pope has accepted the resignation, he alone has the power of notifying a new election to the council. In the present instance, nothing of this kind took place. The Pope never acknowledged Paul the First. The Prior of Rome, who is under the sovereignty of the Pope; never replied to Paul the First, but always addressed his letters to Hompesch.—We come, now to the protectorship of Alexander the First. It is an usurpation. The protectors naturally springing from the Order, are the sovereigns in whose states the Order has any possessions. This protection is natural: it is their duty to watch over the political and territorial existence of the Order; they are interested in so doing. With its religious and internal discipline they have no concern whatever. A protector in an exalted situation, would be offensive to the other sovereigns: he would thereby become their lord paramount on a portion of their own territory. If he possessed other superior attributes, the Order would, in fact, lose its sovereignty and independence; without independence it would become the instrument of an individual, and would no longer be enjoyed in common amongst the knights. It is therefore the policy of all the states of Europe that the Order should be delivered from so unheard-of a protection.—In Russia many a false step has been taken, more from ignorance than design. But to what sort of counsellors has she listened? to individuals, strangers to the Order, to adventurers.—You have well exposed the ridiculous composition of this Order, and of these Russian knights: to your account might be added the following particulars. The newly created priorship (for the intelligence was received at Malta only five days before the place was taken) had not been acknowledged by the other priors. In fact, they had not time for so doing. The enrolment had not taken place, nor even the notices of this affiliation. It exists only by the condescension of those sovereigns who acknowledged Paul the First Grand Master, and who obliged their priors to do the same. But this was an act of violence, and altogether illegal.—But of what use is this Russian priorship, composed as it is of schismatics and married men? Can it be represented in the council? No: for that council must entirely consist of profès, that is to say, religious of the Catholic, Apostolic, Roman church: which the Russian priors are not. Can it arrive at the least preferment? No: for the same reason. Thus it is not capable of voting, nor of enjoying dignities; because the priors must of necessity be profès. Neither can they take the title of knights, because, for that purpose, it is necessary to pass through a novitiate: nor become members of the council, because these profès can alone be the members of the Order. It can have no religious existence: and as the Order is itself a religion, it has every where the distinctive marks of that religion. No name can possibly be given to this singular creation: and this is so evident, that these Russian endowments, these creations of commanderies, are all mere child's play, unless the Order had been consulted; and that the Order has not been consulted is very clear; because Malta was taken five days after the arrival of the Russian courier.—The very excess of folly could alone have marched with so rapid a step. This priorship can only exist by violence. The Pope and the Order will never be able to harmonize with it. Nevertheless, it is this very priory that is anxious, by the assistance of a few persons, whom I will not call apostates, to judge, to depose, and to change the statutes of the Order. If the Order were to cease to be religious, the persons composing it would be nothing more than a foreign soldiery, even in Malta itself, which would remain attached to their country, their wives, and their children; and, having no chief, must be destroyed by other hands immediately; otherwise it would devour itself.

INTERESTING EXTRACTS from Col. Charmilly's Refutation of Bryan Edwards's "Historical Survey of the French Colony of St. Domingo;" pointing out the fatal Consequences of a Peace with the French Republic; and particularly as it regards our Possessions in the East and West Indies. [Written in November 1797.]

WHY, Sir, did you not call the attention of Great Britain to the happy situation in which she finds herself, in spite of the war? Why did you not publish this great truth, viz. that the commerce of all Europe has centred in England? Why did you not draw the attention of the public to this happy and important fact, that she alone has preserved her manufactures, and increased her commerce? Why did you not exhibit the English navy as being more flourishing than ever, and that of her enemies almost destroyed? the Dutch navy annihilated; Spain flying before the British flag, blocked up in her ports, or reduced to burn her ships with her own hands, to prevent their falling into those of her conquerors, as at la Trinité? In short, why did you not call the attention of your country to her flourishing situation, the true period of her glory, in being mistress of all the European colonies, her flag flying triumphant in every sea? What could the friends of England desire more? What could a commercial nation hope for more than to be mistress of the commerce of the whole world? Did those who laid the foundation of this amazing power hope or foresee, that your Navigation Act would have produced so many and such glorious successes to Great Britain? In short, why do you not repeat to your readers, that PEACE ALONE may make you lose, in a very little time, all these mighty advantages?—Why do you not draw the attention and thoughts of your readers to the gigantic power of the French upon the continent? Why did you not exhibit the critical situation of your country fallen from her power, if peace gives her enemies the means of recovering their losses, their manufactures, their commerce, and particularly the re-establishment of their navy, by recovering their colonies?—Why did you not repeat to your countrymen, that England can only lose, and gain nothing by peace? Why did you not remind her that she can only make restitution without receiving any thing in exchange? In short, why did you not prove that no peace with the republic can be made with safety, from the uncertainty of her situation and her government? that, being surrounded with many exterior enemies, and having many interior ones, a civil war in France is every moment ready to burst forth? — Even in this situation, will England venture to disarm? And, if she does not, what advantages will indemnify her for the sacrifices she must make for a peace, which will never be of long duration; but which, doubt it not, would bring upon her greater dangers than the war? — For, according to what is going on in Italy and Germany, you should remind your readers that the French revolution is more dangerous for all the European nations by a peace than by a war. If England were to make peace, how could she preserve herself from the poison which would soon be brought to her by a French ambassador and that heap of Jacobins that would be attached to his suite? How could she preserve herself from their principles, if, in spite of the war and her careful watchfulness, this country has several times been upon the point of being overturned? In short, how could she prevent, in the people of this country, the consequence of this dreadful reflection (supported by the example of the success and presence of republican envoys)? They were desirous of placing themselves in the situation of those who possessed every thing, and they fixed themselves there by assassinating, by pillaging, and by forcing them to wander far from their country; they wished it, and they have succeeded. — — — — In fine, Sir, why do you not rouse the public spirit of your country against her real enemies? Why do you not remind your countrymen of that profound hatred which has for so many ages existed between the two countries? Why do you not animate their courage by reminding them of the wars for these 300 years past, in which the English have so often triumphed? Why, above all, do you not continually repeat to the English, that the nature of her government, her position, her population, and her climate, destined her only to be a secondary power; and say to her: “In spite of the efforts of a numerous, brave, and active nation, we are become the first maritime power in the world? Why should we not support ourselves in this happy situation, since we are enabled so to do by all the united advantages arising from circumstances? Would it be more difficult for us to preserve the situation in which we have placed ourselves than to attain it?” — War alone, I repeat it to you, Sir, can enable you to preserve that noble and magnificent position—with peace, you will soon descend from it.—May Great Britain and her chiefs reflect upon the fate of Carthage! There is a greater similitude than one is disposed to believe between the situation of the French and English, with that of the Romans and Carthaginians. Let England cast her eyes upon the new republic that has just established itself at her doors! Let her consider the effects of that force (of a nation consisting of twenty-five millions of souls), which, whilst forming itself into a republic, has from the beginning of this government, uneasy from its nature, given to the bravest and most turbulent people in the world those successes which Rome in her most glorious days never surpassed! Let England for a moment reflect upon the power of this people, who, by their revolution, have made themselves the friends of the populace in all nations! — In short, consider, Sir, and repeat in the bosom of the Senate of your country, to your friends, and to your readers, that France, in spite of the misfortunes attending her revolution, in spite of the destruction of her finances and commerce, is arrived at such a height as to be able to extend her frontiers, and has acquired a new population, consisting of upwards of eight millions; represent to your readers and the English in general, that the Scheldt, the Maese, and all the coasts and ports, from the Texel to the Straits of Gibraltar, and the Adriatic, are now in the power of her natural enemy. I ask what degree of force must that nation attain after ten years peace, which she alone hereafter will be able to break? What will become of all the neighbouring states, if her finances, her commerce, and her colonies, and through that her navy, are restored? Do you think that England can long remain free, ruler of the seas and the commerce of the universe? It is not difficult to foresee her fate, if the French republic, from her foundation, is more powerful than all Europe. What will she be, when order in her finances, her agriculture, her commerce, manufactures, and her navy, are placed in such a situation as the efforts of the peaceable French government are capable of raising them to? What will soon be the fate of England, when we know that the French are, of all other people, the most active, the most uneasy, and the most ready for war? Yes, the ostentation of Rome will soon be eclipsed, if England, who alone can, and ought, to stop the increase of this inimical power, does not support herself in the happy situation in which chance, circumstances, her constitution, her manufactures, and her commerce, have placed her—if England does not say to France, You have rendered yourself the most considerable power upon the continent; what right had you? Strength and courage. Well! then by the same right we are sovereigns of the seas. We will preserve our power; we will respect yours, if you will respect ours, which our situation renders absolutely necessary. You will soon be masters of the interior commerce of Europe; well then, we will be masters of the exterior commerce. Our 660 ships of war will secure to us our maritime power, in the same manner as your two or three millions of national guards will secure to you the sovereignty of the continent. Your conquests, your activity, and our safety, demand and require, that we suffer neither you nor your allies to have more than a certain number of ships of war; and that you possess no colonies: the time is come when England, from necessity, must concentrate all her power and force within her walls and wooden fortresses.—The English nation is arrived to the highest degree of prosperity, and the cruel revolution which has ruined every other nation, has enriched the English nation; her commerce, manufactures, and agriculture, are in a flourishing state; her credit is unimpaired in spite of her enemies; her troubles are domestic, and are, as to herself, a family concern, and with which, her situation prevents foreign powers from interfering. She has nothing to fear then—peace, yes, peace alone: this precious blessing, so advantageous for all people, is dangerous for her. This is the agreeable and smiling enemy whom she should mistrust, whom she ought to dread more than France and her warriors. Let her secure herself in her true situation, let all her efforts be directed towards her commerce, her navy, and her possessions in the two Indies, and she will soon see her enemy reduced to the necessity of receiving such commercial laws as her interest and her situation will dictate to her to prescribe!—You might explain these simple truths to your readers in a hundred different ways, and which you might support by a comparison between the situation of the two nations. Both the warlike and mercantile navy of England are carried to a height beyond any example ever mentioned in history. France furnishes an absolute contrast to this situation; without finances, without credit, with few raw materials, without manufactures, with a declining agriculture: she is without commerce as well as without either a warlike or mercantile navy; and, whatever may be said of her, without the means of procuring one. Why then should not Great Britain say to France: “By the extent of your European conquests which you have kept, you are become too powerful for us to make peace by restoring to you any of those we have taken, either from you or your allies in the two Indies: consequently we will make peace only upon condition, that one of the fundamental bases shall be, that you and your allies shall, at no period whatever, have above a certain number of ships of war:” then the peace may be both honourable and useful to England, and without danger to her. If she makes any other, she will soon lose her power in the Indies and her western colonies; for if, forgetting her true situation, her glory, her interest, and the immense power to which she is raised; if, in order to obtain a momentary peace, Great Britain restores the Cape of Good Hope, Trincomalé, and Ceylon, to the Dutch, what will be the consequence? Why, in less than twelve months these possessions will be occupied by French garrisons, which will be voluntarily received by the Dutch, or by the supreme order of the French republic, that domineers over them.—What must be the consequence that will ensue? Why, 12 or 15,000 French will be carried to the East Indies, both by these ports as well as by the islands of France and Bourbon. In short, if the French should at any time hereafter penetrate into India, I can venture to predict, that the English would soon after possess no territorial property there.—But let England not deceive herself! The natural hatred between the two nations has attained to that degree among the French, which is the cause that republics never forgive. It is at present then a deadly war between the two powers, in which England will come off victoriously, but by making only a conditional peace, and preserving the means of causing it to be observed. Moreover, in the treaty which she may some time or other conclude, she cannot and must not forget to have a positive determination concerning the measures she is to take to preserve herself against the catechism of the French revolution and the catechisers. Upon any other conditions, war is much better for England than peace.

England is the only power that has a navy capable of defending such a great colony, on which the fate of Jamaica absolutely depends; for I repeat it to you, Sir, to all the colonists, and Great Britain, the fate of Jamaica will follow that of St. Domingo. Should the latter be re-established, the former will be saved; if it be delivered up to the French, Jamaica will speedily be destroyed; and, so far from a powerful empire being established in that island, such as you here speak of, I predict that all the colonies in the Antilles will be entirely and speedily ruined and annihilated.

If the East Indies are exposed to the greatest dangers from a sued for and shameful peace, the western colonies will be much sooner and more certainly exposed by it, as it would allow the French to re-enter their colonies. In order to convince both you and our readers, particularly those who know that the regimen of slavery is absolutely necessary in the colonies of the Antilles, let them read what judicious and informed men, acquainted with the colonies and the interests of France, men possessing great talents, and having the interest of their country at heart, have lately said, in the councils of the republic, respecting the importance of the colonies to France.—After such an acknowledgment, will England furnish France with the means of recovering her losses, in order that she may increase her immense power? If, by their conquest, the French are masters, so as to give law to the continent, what does there remain for England, in order to balance this new power, but to preserve the empire of the seas, which henceforth nothing can deprive her of, without producing her certain destruction?

—If England compares her situation with that of every other power, she will be very careful how she makes a peace that will deprive her of all the advantages of an unprovoked war; which alone has preserved her from complete destruction, and procured her those advantages which, as a commercial nation, she could, and ought never, to have expected; advantages

(and I think I have proved it) which are, and will be more serviceable to her than all the conquests of the French will ever be to their republic, and which she has purchased at so dear a rate; whilst England is sound in all her parts, and is mistress of all the colonies which belonged to her enemies, and thereby mistress of their commerce, that is to say, of their real power.

COLLECTION OF THE DEBATES IN BOTH HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT,

On, and relative to, the Preliminary and Definitive Treaties of Peace, between Great Britain and France: the former signed at London, on the 1st of October 1801, and the latter at Amiens, on

HOUSE OF LORDS *, OCTOBER 29TH, 1801.

LORD BOLTON, in moving the address, adverted to the royal communication of the preliminaries of peace between Great Britain and France being ratified by the respective countries. Of the nature of the ground on which the House then stood, with respect to expressing its sentiments on that part of the speech, his Lordship displayed much constitutional knowledge in commenting; and we understood him to observe, that by their Lordships voting the address he should have the honour to propose, they were not pledged to approve of the specific terms. However, he had to remark, that the truly desirable event in question gave the most heart-felt satisfaction to every rank and description of people, in every quarter of his Majesty's dominions; and on this head, too, he had to remark, he should have no occasion to trouble their Lordships with any detail, as the period would come for its regular discussion, and on which occasion he expressed his hope their Lordships would, with joy and thankfulness, unite their voice of approbation. He was perfectly aware that distinct examinations, with respect to measures of that importance, were necessary; and a degree of suspicion on the grounds of such examination, might constitutionally be held. By such investigations alone would a satisfactory opinion be given as to the merits of particular terms, and a knowledge of the probability of such proving advantageous or the reverse, be attained: he therefore could not mean to trespass on the House, by intruding, in the present instance, his sentiments, in detail, on this very important subject; at the same time, he could not refrain from observing, that the termination of the arduous contest in which we were recently engaged, did not, on our part, proceed in the least from any deficiency in the national resources for continuing the war, or a want of the necessary supplies for that purpose. Against this consideration they would have to weigh the probability of their being able to maintain advantages commensurate to a protracted expenditure: they would,

* This debate was on the motion for an address, in answer to the King's speech; so much of it only is, therefore, taken as applies to the peace with France, to which subject the King had, in his speech (see Register, vol. i. p. 1.) adverted. The reader will see, in the first volume of the Register, an abridged account of all the debates during the session; but, on the important subject of the peace, it was thought necessary to give this more full and accurate account.

in considering the important topic of the conclusion of peace, also have to recollect the situation in which the scanty remnants of the independent powers of Europe, which were opposed to France, then stood. With respect to Britain herself, the case was widely different; that noble spirit of loyalty and patriotism which pervaded all ranks, from the highest to the lowest, rendered her superior to any attack which our powerful adversary was capable of making.

LORD LILFORD seconded the motion for their Lordships agreeing thereto. He thought there must exist but one opinion in that House with respect to the leading feature of his Majesty's most gracious speech; namely, the announcing the happy and glorious termination of the most arduous contest this country was ever engaged in; a contest equally glorious to the arms of the nation in its progress, and to its councils in its successful and happy termination. His Lordship observed, the wise and vigorous measures of Ministers had placed the nation in such a state, as that we might truly say,

“Would laugh a siege to scorn.”

It was such as clearly evinced what may be effected by the single operation of British force. Considering the national circumstances in other points of view, their Lordships could not contemplate the prospect with less satisfaction. The blessings of peace were restored; —not through any means of humiliation or national disgrace, but on terms equally honourable and advantageous: these we reaped as the well-earned fruit of our exertions under the guidance of the wisdom of his Majesty's councils. Our objects were thus attained, and the real ones of our warfare, namely, the attainment of security for ourselves, and the preservation of our good faith to our allies. Their Lordships had that day the satisfaction of beholding their sovereign in the exercise of his best prerogative, in announcing the return of peace, and with it the increase of prosperity and happiness to his people.

The DUKE OF BEDFORD rose, and observed, that with respect to a peace, generally speaking, he believed there was but one opinion in the House; for his part, he sincerely congratulated their Lordships and the country on the attainment of that invaluable blessing.

HOUSE OF COMMONS†, OCTOBER 29TH, 1801.

LORD LOVAINE, in moving the address, said, he was fully impressed with the importance of the communication they had just received from the Throne. He did not doubt he should be joined by every one in heart-felt congratulations upon the happy events which had been formally announced, events which consummated the glory of the British arms, secured the interests, maintained inviolate the honour, and bid fair to increase and consolidate the prosperity of the British empire. In contemplating the happy conclusion of peace, he saw every reason to hope for a still further increase of those blessings which had hitherto peculiarly distinguished this kingdom, calculated to meet every wish and desire of the people. In looking back upon those successes which had ultimately led, after a severe struggle, to the happy event we were now called upon to celebrate, there was every reason for the most unbounded exultation. Success had crowned his Majesty's arms, both by sea and land, in a long train of victories and triumphs; amongst which he could not sufficiently dwell upon the late glorious success of our arms in Egypt, which appeared to have immediately led to a pacification with the French republic. It would be of course irregular for him to enter into any detail relative to the terms of the peace with the French republic; but he did not doubt, when the preliminary treaty was laid before the House, it would be found that no material interest of the country had been neglected; but that, on the other hand, every provision had been made which could be considered as necessary to the welfare of the kingdom, or expedient for its security. He trusted it would be found to be a glorious termination of the war.

Mr. WODEHOUSE said, he felt confident in the approbation which, he doubted not, would be awarded to the address by the vote of the House. He joined with sincere congratulation in the general joy expressed upon the subject of a treaty of peace with France, in which the security of the country was amply provided for, and its interest firmly maintained. Every one must, he said, feel a considerable degree of elation at the happy and glorious termination of a war which was not begun for the purpose of gratifying the ambition, or extending the territories of Britain, but which she was compelled to commence and carry on during the long period in which we had been fated to continue it, for the purpose of preserving her honour and her interest, and the dearest rights of religion and independence; and which had been thus terminated by a treaty of peace; which, though it could not now be discussed in detail, would, he was convinced, be found adequate to every purpose of honour, of interest, and of security.

Mr. Fox rose, and in a few words expressed his most cordial concurrence in the address to his Majesty upon the happy and long-desired attainment of peace with France. It was an event on which he desired to express his sincerest joy and exultation—an event in which the people of England had the greatest cause to rejoice and exult; and, for the present, he felt it unnecessary to trespass on the attention of the House beyond this short but sincere expression of his sentiment on the event, and to declare his hearty assent in the address.

Mr. PITT next addressed the Chair: "I rise, Sir," said he, "to express my sincere satisfaction in being called upon, for almost the first time, to concur with the Hon. Gentleman in a vote of the House, which, from all present appearances, promises to be unanimous. I shall not now, Sir, enter at large on the subject of the pacification with the Northern Powers, nor on the preliminaries of peace with France; but when I come to state the grounds of my opinion relative to the Northern Convention, and to those preliminaries; when I come to state my cordial approbation of them both, perhaps it will be seen that they arise from considerations of a different nature from those which guide the vote and opinion of the Hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Fox). I behold them, Sir, with the most exalted satisfaction; and, to whatever inferior criticisms either of them may be liable, I think that, on the whole, they afford matter of great joy and exultation to the country, and entitle the Government to its warmest approbation and most grateful thanks."

Mr. WINDHAM.—"Sir, it is a very painful task to me to declare my sentiments in opposition to those with whom I have long agreed. But as the address proposed to the House does not go to pledge us to any specific approbation of the measure of peace, it is not now my intention to enter into a consideration of the question of the terms; especially, as future opportunity will be presented, when I may state to the House those reasons upon which I found my disapprobation of them. It is not, therefore, my intention this day to give my negative to the proposed address, but to wait for the day of discussion, when I shall go more fully into the subject; at the same time wishing to be understood, that, in agreeing to the motion of to-day, I do not feel myself pledged to support any future motions upon the subject.—This point being secured, Sir, I should be inclined to leave my opinion, and the reasons which are to support it, to be stated in that debate which may be expected shortly to take place, if the declarations of opinions in favour of the peace did not seem to me to require similar declarations on the part of those who find themselves compelled to condemn it. Other reasons also make it necessary to say a word or two even in the present stage of the business. To dissent from any prevalent opinion, to be a solitary mourner in the midst of general rejoicing, to wear the face of sadness while the countenances of others glisten with joy; to be sunk in dejection and despondency, while others are animated with the most brilliant hopes, is to be in a state which every one must be anxious to explain, so far, at least, as to make known the general nature and character of such an extraordinary difference. The House has seen, and can perfectly understand that those who are united in feeling may, nevertheless, be perfectly opposite in sentiment. An instance, Sir, may be seen this very night: the Hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Fox), and my Right Hon. Friend near me, both agree in rejoicing and exulting in the present peace, though, I presume, on reasons widely different. It is my fortune, on the other hand, Sir, to agree with the Hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Fox) in his opinions, but to differ from him wholly in his feelings. I do think, with him, that this is a glorious peace for France; but I nevertheless do not agree in feeling either with that Hon. Gentleman or my Hon. Friends. This, Sir, may serve to explain the cause of that diversity which I unhappily find between my own opinions and those more generally prevalent in the country. If I have not partaken in the rejoicings, it is because I have not been able to convince myself that there are any real or solid causes for rejoicing: it is because I fear, that, before many years shall pass over our heads, this rejoicing will be turned into repentance and bitter sorrow: it is because I dread that the advantages which peace may bring will be transient and unsubstantial, and be followed, at no very distant period, by the commencement of endless calamity and ruin. I have seen all around me bonfires and illuminations; I have heard the joyous ringing of the bells. But, were they the signs of any real good? the effects of any well-founded national joy? or rather, were they not the lights that were to light up our sepulchre, and the knell which was tolling us to our graves? I cannot consent to appear in my wedding-garment, until I know whether the feast, to which I am invited, be really a wedding or a funeral. Sir, I speak in perfect plainness and sincerity, from the bottom of my heart, and with the solemnity of a death-bed declaration (a situation much resembling that in which we all stand), when I declare, that my Hon. Friends, who, in a moment of rashness and weakness, have fatally put their hands to this treaty, have signed the death-warrant of their country. They have given it a blow, under which it may languish for a few years, but from which I do not conceive how it is possible for it ever to recover. I feel how very unpleasant it is to deal in predictions, which I who make them most devoutly wish may never prove true. I know also the uncertainty of all human affairs, and am not profane enough to set bounds to the dispensations of Providence; but as far as any hope now appears, any hope which can be rationally acted upon, such as any man would venture to avow, I can see, though anxiously I look for it, no possible means of escape.—There is but one thing which could enable this country to counterbalance the power of France on the continent; and this is our navy, which depends upon our commerce and navigation, as these do upon our colonial possessions. On the other hand, there is but one thing wanting to them to make their empire universal as well by sea as by land; and that is, that they should have our commerce and navigation, and through that, a mean of re-establishing their marine; this is now given into the hands of France, and the consequence seems to me inevitable.—Only one thing more, Sir, I shall notice, which is drawn from me by what has fallen from the Hon. Mover or Second, and is, I believe, also to be found in the address. It is the calling of this an honourable peace. I would suggest to the Hon. Gentleman, and all who are to talk in future upon the subject, that the less is said of the honour of the thing the better.—It is besides highly impolitic in the Hon. Gentlemen in another view. They are undertaking more than they are required to do. Much as I think of national honour, esteeming it as I do the very life and soul of the politics of all great countries, I will, for the sake of argument, in the present case, lay it entirely out of the question. I will be content if the Hon. Gentleman will shew me, that this is a safe peace. Give me safety, and I will ask nothing more. If, however, my Honourable Friends were driven to it by fatal necessity, it must be a sufficient justification. Whether such imperious circumstances existed, we shall hear on the day of discussion. It will certainly be wrong to condemn it prematurely; I shall therefore wait patiently for that discussion, which will clear up the matter to the satisfaction of the House."

MR. ADDINGTON.—"My Right Hon. Friend will pardon me if I decline going into the discussion of the subject more minutely than the question now before the House immediately requires. His Majesty, in his gracious speech, says nothing more of the preliminaries of peace than merely that copies of them shall be laid before Parliament for consideration. In the address moved by the Noble Lord, there is no such idea held out as that of pledging the House to any approbation of those preliminaries; and indeed it would savour much of presumption to call upon this House to pledge itself in the approval of any measure, before it had an opportunity of taking that measure into consideration. My Right Honourable Friend himself set out with acknowledging the address had no such tendency; and, therefore, he will acknowledge it is premature to anticipate, as he has done, any discussion upon the subject, when he can, at so early a day, have so much better an opportunity of discussing the preliminaries themselves.—My Right Honourable Friend says, that, in order to preserve the safety of our marine, and secure the extent of our commerce and navigation, we ought to have extended our colonial system by refusing to surrender our conquests in the war, in order to counterbalance the power of France. But to this I answer, that, relinquishing what we had conquered was the only pledge for our security; and that it is in preserving our own constitution, and defending our own possessions, and not in the ex- tension of our territories by conquest, that we hold the best sureties for our rights and the extension of our commerce.—My Right Honourable Friend, who, I did imagine, would have been the last to depreciate the finances and resources of his country, has suggested that which is not founded in fact, namely, that the accedence to the treaty of peace, on the part of England, was the result of necessity, and of a want of the means to continue the contest. But, Sir, I disclaim the motive so assigned by my Right Honourable Friend. I disclaim being a party to any such plea; and I thus publicly declare, that, had it been found indispensably necessary to continue the contest, no deficiency whatever would have been found in the finances and resources of this country: and it would have been the grossest dereliction of my duty to have let such a suggestion pass uncontradicted.—Many other subjects press on my mind, but I shall not trespass further on the attention of the House at this time; nor by an anticipation of topics that will come more properly for discussion at another day, interrupt the unanimity of this House upon the motion before you.”

Mr. SHERIDAN.—“I feel no inclination whatever, Sir, by now rising, to oppose the general wish of the House, to deprecate all discussion of the preliminaries of peace, and to wait till that period when an opportunity will be given to all regularly to enter on the subject. The Right Hon. Gentleman (Mr. Windham) who spoke lately from the other side of the House, having stated his unwillingness to enter at present on this discussion, it was not without considerable surprise that I heard him enter so far into that very discussion which he set out with deprecating. I shall certainly vote for the address which has now been moved, because it was not, as usual on such occasions, an exact echo of the speech from the Throne. There were words, Sir, in the speech which, in my opinion, much to the honour of those who moved and seconded the address, are wholly omitted. The speech contained distinctions and characters of the peace, which, if they had been re-echoed in the address, I, for one, have no hesitation in saying, that it could not possibly have received my support. As to the address as it now stands, it does not appear liable to any great objection, and I have no wish to disturb the unanimity of our vote. Notwithstanding the unanimity, however, with which this address is passed, I sincerely believe, Sir, that if this were the time for men to deliver their opinions, if this were the moment when they were to speak out their real thoughts, there never was a period of less real unanimity.—(A loud laugh.) The Right Hon. Gentleman (Mr. Pitt) has spoken of the peace in terms to which I can by no means agree. I differ from him in every expression by which he characterized the peace as glorious and honourable. Still more do I differ from those who contend that it was inexpedient to make peace at all. This, Sir, is a peace which every man is glad of, but no man can be proud of. (A loud cry of Hear! hear!) It is a peace involving a degradation of the national dignity, which no truly English heart can feel with indifference.”

EARL TEMPLE, agreeing in the general sentiment of waving all discussion of the terms of the peace, expressed his intention to give the address his decided support. He rose only on the present occasion to state to the House that in giving this support, he wished it to be understood that he gave not the smallest pledge of his support of the measure of peace, for he had no difficulty in saying that this was a measure which he could not possibly approve.

Mr. JAMES MARTIN expressed his sincere pleasure at the peace.

HOUSE OF LORDS*, NOVEMBER 3D, 1801.

LORD ROMNEY rose to move an address, expressing an approbation of the peace, and delivered a prefatory speech, in which, after taking a view of the war, compared with the two former wars, he proceeded as follows:—The treaty before the House secured all the important objects for which the war had been carried on. The settlements of Ceylon and Trinidad, which we retained, are of very considerable importance; the first, both from productiveness and situation, and the second from productiveness and capability of improvement. Besides, in India we have gained signal victories, combining acquisition with security. We have conquered the Mysore, and entirely destroyed the principal friend of France, and the principal enemy of the British name, who, with his father Hyder Ally, has been always either secretly or openly forming projects hostile to England. We have also procured restitution to the allies who continued to adhere to us. We have driven from the Turkish dominions an enemy who had seized the most valuable part of the Sultan's territories, and the granary of his metropolis. To our allies, indeed, during the war, we behaved with magnanimous liberality. We supported them as long as our support could render them any useful assistance: when fidelity to us was no longer beneficial to themselves, we released them from their engagements. France had, no doubt, obtained very great addition to her territories, far surpassing any conquests Louis XIV. had achieved, projected, or even conceived possible. But the conquests of France were not the fault of Britain: we could not prevent its gigantic efforts on the continent, if we were to send five hundred thousand men to attempt the recovery of the conquests of France on the continent, we should not be able to accomplish our aim. Were we to persevere in a hopeless contest? Our loyal and patriotic country had, with most meritorious firmness and patience, borne all the enormous burdens of this extraordinary war, while they reckoned them necessary for their ultimate security; but when that was once attained, were we wantonly to lavish away our resources, and increase burdens already so grievous? Should we, for an island more or less, not necessary to our security, or the object of the war, go on accumulating debt and aggravating taxes? Among the various classes of spirited and liberal supporters of the war, all severely pressed by its expense, were the country gentlemen, who, having a fixed income, find their means of obtaining the conveniences of life, suitable to their rank in society, much diminished by the increase of prices and of taxes? These, and all others who have been hard pressed by the war, and so cheerfully undergone every difficulty, ought not to be pressed when it is no longer necessary, when the objects of the contest are obtained. It has been objected, that peace cannot be lasting. One great security for its permanence is the interest of both Britain and France. Both countries have immense capabilities, which in improving to the utmost extent, they may be so far from hurting each other, that they may reciprocally promote their highest commercial interests. It appears, my Lords, to me, that the treaty, of which the preliminaries are concluded, ensures to Britain security; and, as far as the uncertainty of all human actions admits, promises a permanent peace. I think it our duty to return thanks to his Majesty, and to express our approbation of the treaty." His Lordship concluded with reading his motion for the address.

LORD VISCOUNT LIMERICK, who seconded the address, said, that in his estimation the preliminaries were most opportunistically concluded; their tenour was advantageous, and the whole proceeding highly honourable to the national character!!!!!! Let the present situation of this country be compared even with that in which she stood at the last peace, and the comparison, he averred, would decidedly be in favour of her present circumstances. On the former occasion, our finest colonies were rent from the bosom of the parent state. Island after island, and fortress after fortress, were shamefully ceded to the enemy: that peace was deservedly reprobated by all. The ministry of that day were prevented from perfecting what they had well begun, being driven from their seats by an unexpected and unnatural coalition. He hoped nothing of that sort, no paltry coalition, would take place in the present day. Recurring to the regular subject, his Lordship repeated, let the situation of the country now be considered, and the contrast marked; see the conduct of Britain and her successful interference with respect to her allies, Turkey and Portugal. He believed in regard to those, all that could, had been done. With respect to our late ally, the Prince of Orange, for the interest of whose country and house the war was partly undertaken, his present situation could not fairly be imputed to Britain; the fault lay elsewhere.

EARL SPENCER. "My Lords, I know not that I have ever had a more painful duty to discharge, than that in pursuance of which I now offer myself to the attention of your Lordships. It is painful to me not to be able to give my approbation to peace, the ultimate object to the happy attainment of which, for my country, all my endeavours have been, for a series of years, most earnestly directed. It is doubly painful to me to think that my sentiments, my arguments, and whatever impression I shall be able to make on the minds of your Lordships in this address, must be at variance with those of Noble Lords with whom I have so long acted, and whose abilities and virtues I have found so much reason to esteem. The Noble Lord who has just sat down, talked in a tone of triumph of what we have done by this preliminary treaty for our allies. But, my Lords, was it to be supposed that, after the efforts we, and we alone, made to support the Ottoman throne, we should have seen the Turks reduced, by our fault, to a condition in which they bestow even no commercial advantages on us, their deliverers, but such as must be equally shared with the French, their destroyers? That the French withdraw their forces from the Neapolitan and Roman states, when these forces are no longer wanted, to be shipped for reinforcements to Egypt, is but a small concession, and a concession which they may retract almost as soon as they shall have executed it. And is it for such gains to our allies that Malta is sacrificed; the Portuguese empire is mutilated; all our acquisitions in the Mediterranean are abandoned? The Noble Lord who seconded the motion, was pleased to speak of the Prince of Orange, as if the misfortunes which left him, in his attachment to our cause, in the condition of an exile without dominions, as if those misfortunes had deprived him of all right to be treated by us with the regard due to an ally. And is this the faith of governments and of princes? are such the dictates of common amity or of public prudence? Is the honour of Englishmen so debased, that they can endure a principle to be uttered with approbation in this august assembly which would have been reprobated with horror even by an Athenian rabble? It might be impossible to compel France and Holland to restore the Prince of Orange to his former dignities and possessions in the Dutch republic; but was there no mean of procuring compensation for his losses? Was he to be treated as if not our ally, merely because his means of serving us were exhausted?

Oh, shame!—In India what have we done? We retain Ceylon, it is true: but how much do we not, without equivalent, restore? We give the French again a footing on the Indian continent. We restore, in Pondicherry, a place which, by its contiguity to Trincomalé and Madras, cannot but soon become very valuable to them, and very mischievous to us. But we restore also Cochín, on the Malabar coast, a place of so much strength, and so commodious, that the French may soon fill it with troops to annihilate our power in India, and may, from it, carry on a train of intrigues to raise up enemies against us among all the native powers.—It was to confirm the British power, that, in former attempts at negotiation between this country and France, our retaining the Cape was made a primary and indispensable article. Grant that it may be in all other respects of small value; yet, affording a harbour and a place of refreshment on the passage, as capable of becoming a formidable engine in the hand of an enemy, as useful for the refreshment of troops, if not for delay in mercantile voyages, it was certainly of the utmost consequence to be retained by us. It is, in effect, surrendered; and the Cape and Cochín are the keys which we have put into an enemy's hands, in order to the utter destruction of our power in India. In South America, it was not enough to surrender without equivalent, the settlements of Surinam, Demerara, Essequibo, Berbice, and Curaçoa, but we must sanction a cession of territory on the part of Portugal, by which France must become ultimately mistress of the Brazils. In the West Indies, how many dearly earned possessions are given up for nought! And how have we chosen to preserve precisely the rudest and the least enriched by culture of all the isles we had conquered? Why, my Lords, we have put into the hands of France every means she could desire, in order to rival our naval greatness. We have given, without equivalent, those conquests with which we should have purchased the restoration of the balance of power on the continent of Europe; we have deprived ourselves of these new resources for the increase of our trade, and the aggrandizement of our navy, which the war bestowed; and is it for the preliminaries which bind us to all this, that the Noble Lords propose an address of thanks? Let it never be said, indemnity, security, were the objects for which we persisted in the war. Where are they? where are now our means to obtain them? Is not the triumph of Jacobinism consummated in this extension of the territories and the power of France? in France's doing every thing for her allies, while for ours we can do nothing? For these and other reasons, my Lords, I must, with whatever reluctance, oppose the motion."

The DUKE of CLARENCE reviewed the train of the war in the operations of the British land forces; rapidly enumerated our successes at sea; explained the advantages of Ceylon and Trinidad, on account of particular harbours, capacious and little known, which they contained; stated that we had done for our allies whatever circumstances would allow; affirmed that Jacobinism was destroyed; and asserted Britain to be still in a relative situation to defend her own liberties and those of Europe.

LORD PELHAM, after a high compliment to his noble friend (Earl Spencer), and lamenting the difference between them, entered into a detailed justification of the terms of peace; in doing which he examined the two negotiations that took place at Paris and Lisle, in 1796 and 1797. The first negotiation had broken off, in his mind, properly by the French refusing to agree that we should treat conjointly for ourselves and our allies. In 1797 the situation resembled more that in which the present was made; and he wished to compare the projet which Ministers then gave in, with the preliminaries which his Majesty's present servants had obtained. The Noble Lord just stated the relative situations of the parties at the two epochs, and then said, that as some of the ministers of that day were the most pointed in their disapprobation of the terms now obtained, it was fair to see how far they differed from what they were themselves willing to grant. In the projet of 1797 the Cape of Good Hope, as well as Ceylon and Trinidad, were to be retained. In 1801 the Cape was only to be a free port. Was there such a difference in this as to justify the continuance of war upon account of it? But the difference of our conduct to our allies was an argument. No mention was made in the preliminaries of the Prince of Orange. It certainly was not in our power, by the continuance of war, to replace the Prince of Orange in his power. The turn of events, and the revolution in his country, made it impossible; but the opportunity was not lost of treating for that unfortunate Prince, and the Noble Lord had assured the House that the opportunity would not be neglected. The Prince had a just expectation and confidence in the love and fidelity of his Majesty, whose gracious wishes would be seconded with zeal and promptitude by his ministers. It had been said that Egypt had not been saved to the Porte by treaty, but by conquest. It was immaterial to the discussion by which of the two the integrity of Turkey had been obtained—the fact was so. Naples, at present occupied by the armies of France, was to be restored to its legitimate sovereign; and Malta was to be available to neither of the contracting parties. With respect to the treaties respecting Portugal, when he considered how freely the speeches of Noble Lords were published through newspapers, he must abstain from entering into the particulars at this critical and unseasonable time; he would only say, that Portugal would retain every thing which in reason could be useful to her, and would make no sacrifice that could be injurious: she was essentially protected. With respect to the West India islands, he would entreat Noble Lords to say whether any one island, or all of them together, would have been worth the calamity of continuing the struggle, by which the two nations were to exhaust one another, or rather each to exhaust itself? In the East, the overthrow of Tippoo had secured our possessions against all annoyance. We owed his extinction to the war, since it was by the intercepted correspondence we had discovered his intrigues. Ceylon and Trinidad were great and important acquisitions. And was it no conquest to have subdued the erroneous opinions prevalent in England and Ireland, and to have rescued them from the infatuation of French principles? He concluded with trusting that the peace would be found to be substantially advantageous and safe for the country.

LORD WESTMEATH was fully persuaded that we had obtained the securities of peace: we had consequently established on the firmest basis, those essential qualities which were nearest to his heart, viz. the prosperity and happiness of Great Britain. By the blessings of peace we might restore trade, improve agriculture, and strengthen our constitution, which had always been the envy of the world. We had also an opportunity of checking the restless ambition of a few factious men, who take a pleasure in disturbing the peace and happiness of mankind. The time of trouble was now past, and things would be restored to their former prosperity and vigour. Our system of government, instead of being the sport or attack of mad theorists, who wished to overturn the glorious fabric of our ancestors, would, as hitherto, become the admiration of the world, the envy of the universe! By the peace which the Ministers had attained, we might return to objects of industry and the blessings of peace. Ireland, instead of being a clog and mill-stone about the neck of Great Britain, would prove an inestimable jewel, and one of the most opulent and important parts of the British dominions. He would, therefore, give his hearty support to the motion!!!!!!

LORD GRENVILLE, in a speech of great length, and pregnant with argument, entered into the examination of the terms, and into the reasoning of the Noble Secretary, and particularly engaged the attention of the House. We lament that we can only give a mere outline of his train of reasoning.—It would have filled his heart with joy, and covered with cheerfulness the remainder of a life, the best part of which had been devoted to the struggle which was just terminated, if the objects for which we struggled had been obtained; he would not have said a word, if even expediency, much less necessity, could account for the terms; or if it were a question, whether this treaty, because degrading, was or was not to be executed? he would be silent; because, although bad, and perhaps unsafe, God forbid that the national faith, once plighted by the Sovereign, should be violated! He was convinced that it would not be productive of advantage, but the contrary; that it would not redound to the national character, but to humiliation, and even degradation. The rest of this treaty was a question of terms; and it must be inquired on what basis the negotiation was carried on. The status quo ante bellum was not applicable to the two parties, nor practicable in the case. The basis of the uti possidetis was the ground; and every departure from that basis must be severely examined. To enable the House to do this, they must examine the condition and relative state of the two countries. The Noble Lord in this examination made ours a brilliant state, and such as entitled us to high terms in every quarter of the world. France had acquired inordinate power on the continent of Europe; but every where we had made also brilliant acquisitions; Egypt, Malta, Minorca, Porto Ferrajo, all the keys of the Mediterranean, were ours: in the West Indies, every thing that was valuable, except St. Domingo and Guadaloupe. In South America we had an empire, an empire equal in value to the mother-country, Surinam, Demerara, Essequibo, Berbice. What a source of power and wealth! In the East Indies also we had every thing without the possibility of a rival; and all these we were entitled to bring forward either as equivalents for which the French should surrender their acquisitions in Europe, or which should serve as a counterbalance to their increased power. But the Noble Lord chose to treat the question by the argument ad hominem. This was not a dignified course. He would have disdained such a defence; but he would meet him on it. He would shew that in infinitely better circumstances, they had made terms infinitely worse. At that time the people of England were dejected and depressed. The stoppage of the Bank; the falling off of our allies; the mutiny in the fleet; the tumults at home, all tended to lower the tone, and paralyse the strength of the nation: but even the terms proposed were comparatively more advantageous. The Cape, as well as Ceylon, was secured. The Cape, whatever it may be to your commerce, is essential to you as a military post in war. Your recruits, if sent from Portsmouth to Trincomalé without a rest, would be recruits for the hospitals, not for the field. In the project of 1797, nothing was to be conceded for the allies of Britain. For Portugal there were stipulations safe and intelligible; she was neither to pay in territory, in commerce, or in money. For the Prince of Orange there was a stipulation for full and complete indemnity, as well as for those attached to him. The Noble Lord said, this might be negotiated for yet; but why leave it to chance? From the bottom of his soul he regretted more the loss of honour in the abandonment of that unfortunate Prince, than in the loss of territory. We owed to his attachment, and to the orders which he gave, the capture of many of those settlements which were now delivered up. He had trusted to a nation that had betrayed him. He alluded again to the limited guarantee of the integrity of Portugal, and said that he understood the surrender of the post at the mouth of the river of the Amazons, as most important to them. He knew they viewed it as a most delicate and critical position. To us it was likely to be materially injurious in the hands of France. It may open to the republic the possession of the Brazils; it will give them another military station, which may be most injurious to our possessions in India. They were told of the destruction of Tippoo by the vigour of Lord Wellesley; but still our dominion in the East was to be annoyed and exposed by the surrender of Cochin and Pondicherry. They had no plea to demand Cochin. Driven totally from India, they could ask for it only as a point d'appui for annoyance. We might as well have asked for the garrison towns of the Netherlands. It would afford them the means of a dangerous diversion, whenever they should stir up the Northern Powers of India against us. It left us for ever dependant on their good faith, on the good faith of France! In the West Indies he conceived that the certain resources and produce of Martinique are infinitely more valuable than the mere speculation about Trinidad. He found it was already the opinion of the West India gentlemen, that the cessions there would make a much greater force necessary to the protection of Jamaica and our other islands; so that the peace would not tend to diminish, but increase our danger. In the Mediterranean every thing was possessed, and every thing, he said, was surrendered. Malta, which was impregnable while our sailors and soldiers remained the same as they now are, is to be put into a third hand. He would not inquire what hand; but he might suppose it to be a power with whom we might hereafter have questions to settle, and to whom the possession of this post might be most hostile to us. In these preliminaries much was wanting of what was yet to be settled; a great fault; for by this we had, before the definitive treaty, all the evils of a naval armistice. Our blockade of their ports was taken off. They might procure supplies; they might distribute their forces; and if they refused to adjust points of great importance, we were disarmed. We could have no hope of bettering the articles. There were many points omitted, or stated darkly. The Newfoundland fishery, so beneficial to us, was to be new regulated, which must be beneficial to them, because every thing about it was in our favour before. With respect to Naples, the French troops were to evacuate the territory; but what stipulation for not returning? they might withdraw for exactly three days; that is, to their Cisalpine republic, which is just sixty miles from Naples, and upon any pretext march their 40,000 troops back in three days to resume their station; upon which a memorial would, no doubt, be presented to the British court, full of complaints against the treachery of the Neapolitans. Whether, after telling us that it was not worth while to continue the war on other grounds, they would renew it for this aggression, he could not tell; but this was not an impossible case. The Noble Lord on the woolsack had said, that this day it was a question only of cessions of territory to France: in his opinion we had ceded fully as much commerce as territory. He held a paper in his hand to shew, that by this treaty we had ceded more territory, and infinitely more valuable, beyond all calculation, than when we ceded the thirteen colonies of America by the peace of 1782. We were told, we could have made no more impression on France by continuing the war. What further impression could she make on us? If the threat of invasion terrified us into peace, France will always have it in her hands with tenfold more power, as it will come from so many more points. You cannot reckon on the probability of peace for any long period. Under the monarchy of France, we never could calculate for more than ten years of repose: but you have to dread also the principles and the tenets of revolutionized France, dignified by success. There was not a Jacobin who did not rejoice in this peace, and they would soon feel the danger of the lustre which this peace gave to these tenets. There was one paragraph in the King's speech which on this account he applauded, namely, that in which there was mention of increased military establishments and increased expense. There must be so to a very great degree indeed, and increased vigour of every sort, for nothing else could give us a chance for salvation from the impolicy of this peace. They should have his support in all such measures; not a hollow and a hostile support, but cordial and earnest. Firmness and vigour alone could save us, not only in our measures against the treason of foreigners, but against the sedition of subjects. In this spirit alone they ought to look their situation in the face. By improper concessions, the outworks of the constitution had been given up; but still it might be possible by vigour and exertion to shew that there were men determined to defend to the last the main body of the citadel.

The LORD CHANCELLOR entered into a defence of the peace, in reply to the arguments that had fallen from the last Noble Lord. He was firmly persuaded that the war had been carried on until it became hopeless to proceed any further. The parliamentary character of the war was this: it was undertaken to guard the country against the effect of principles and practices which had been propagated and carried on by persons combined together for the very purpose of overturning the constitution. With this object in view, the war was attended with success, because those principles no longer existed to any extent that could be attended with danger. In advising his Majesty to make peace, he would perish sooner than he would sacrifice any of the essential interests of his country; but when he said that, he must not be understood to vapour in praise of the peace, as if it was a very honourable one. His principal object had been the attainment of a secure and lasting peace. The Noble Lord's observations with regard to Portugal were not well founded; and, whatever consequences might arise from the new arrangements with regard to her American territory, it was an evil which could bear no proportion to that of continuing the war. He would not continue the war with a view of getting rid of the war. There were many things which he might have thought necessary to be insisted upon, but which circumstances prevented him from doing. He thought the circumstances under which this country had entered into the war, might have imposed upon him a necessity of requiring that a competent provision should be made for the illustrious House of Orange; but he did not in his conscience think he would have been justified in hazarding the success of the treaty by insisting on such a condition; and therefore thought it would be wiser to leave it as a subject for future arrangement. With regard to what fell from the Noble Lord, as to the importance of the Cape of Good Hope, he confessed he had himself heard seamen and statesmen say, that it was a place of the first consequence. So far as it served for a harbour to our shipping on their voyage to India, it was of some consequence. This advantage was still to continue; but he would ask, on what grounds could the cession of this port be a matter of regret? Was it because the place had been fed at a most enormous expense, from which this country was now happily relieved? He would not then say any thing about the value of this place as a free port; but if we had no other object in carrying on the war, than that of determining whether a certain point of land, at the extremity of Africa, was to belong to Great Britain or to Holland; and considering, at the same time, that since this place got into our possession, no less a sum than one hundred and twenty-five millions had been spent, and that another year would take away thirty millions more, without this country being one cubit nearer the object in view, he had no hesitation in declaring which course he should pursue. The Noble Lord had found fault with the cession of territory, and a port that had been made in the Mediterranean; and asked, what was to become of our fleets that were sailing in that sea? What would the Noble Lord have said on this subject, had he consented to make peace in 1797, when neither Malta nor Mi-

norca were in our possession? If he conceived the occupation of them on the part of Great Britain as necessary to the security of this country, how could he have supposed it possible for England to make a secure peace when we did not possess those islands? As to Minorca, he did not think the occupation of it at all necessary to our security: and as to Malta, if we considered the facility with which it became an easy acquisition to France, it must appear that our security with regard to that port must be increased with the difficulty of the French being able to take possession of it again, while under the guarantee of a third power. With respect, therefore, to Malta, we were evidently in a better situation than we would have been, had peace been concluded in 1797!!!!!! As to our ships in the Mediterranean, if they had nothing else to do but to sail round that ocean, he thought it by no means an useful employment. There was no use in keeping a naval station there, if we could not command the commerce of that sea, particularly so, if the French had taken possession of Naples and Portugal, as they might have done. As to the West India islands, he could assure their Lordships, that if he could have got Martinique, he would have retained it for this country in preference to Trinidad. If, therefore, it had not been in his power to have obtained what he liked best, what alternative was there? Nothing but that of spending thirty millions more, in order that he might be able to ask himself that day twelve months how many more years were to pass away before peace could be made!!!! If any Noble Lord maintained that peace ought to be rejected, when proposed on the terms of the treaty then before the House, he would ask him, on what terms such Noble Lord would consent to a peace? He knew there were some Members in both Houses, who thought it necessary to go on with the war until the ancient monarchy of France should be restored. He would not then enter into the question how far that was a desirable object; but let it be ever so desirable, he would ask how it could be done? If the present government of France was an evil, how was it to be removed? It could not be done without a great coalition of the European powers; and even when the combination did exist, it was able to effect nothing. If, on the other hand, he had said he would not agree to a peace unless France restored all the territory it had seized on the continent of Europe, and France refused to comply, he should, by holding out on that point, consider himself as guilty of a criminal waste of the blood and treasure of his countrymen.

LORD RAWDON (EARL OF MOIRA) said, that a peace at any price was become absolutely necessary; that the peace was a hollow and precarious peace, as a Noble Lord had termed it, inadequate to what, in our present situation, we were entitled to expect, he could not admit. In order to decide upon this point, it was necessary to examine the relative situations of the French republic and Great Britain; and here he must take notice of an implication drawn from a metaphor made use of by the Noble Secretary of State (Lord Pelham), which was not warranted by the metaphor. That Noble Lord had compared the two countries to two parallel lines, which ran even together; but the fact was, there was nothing like a parallel in their two comparative situations or characters. France was an extensive continental power, and the maintenance of her greatness depended altogether on her army. Great Britain was an insular and a maritime state, and her security rested on her navy. Looking at the acquisitions and conquests of each country, glorious as our victories confessedly had been by sea and land, and especially in the last brilliant campaign, owing to the unparalleled valour, intrepidity, and skill of our brave officers and commanders in both services, and the undaunted firmness and courage of our seamen and soldiers, Great Britain stood in a state of inferiority in point of strength and aggrandizement compared to the French republic. To ascertain, therefore, the value of the cessions that it appeared, from the preliminaries on the table, Ministers had made to the French republic for the purchase of peace, and to see whether they were necessary sacrifices or not, let Noble Lords weigh our acquisitions against the acquisitions of the republic. Were all the islands we had taken in the West Indies equally important with the acquisition of Savoy? Undoubtedly not; and yet Savoy was only a part of the immense territories which the army of France had conquered, and which the French government had united to its ancient possessions, and made part of its dominions. To negotiate a peace with any prospect of effecting it, Ministers must necessarily accommodate the terms according to the relative situations of the two countries, and a precise reciprocity of cession on a pertinacious contest for the uti possidetis, was out of the question where a weaker power had to treat with a stronger. The reasoning of the Noble Lord, as his Noble and Learned Friend had so well observed, would not only serve to make any early peace impracticable, but to render the attainment of peace hopeless at any period, however distant. He, for one, his Lordship said, rejoiced sincerely that peace was effected; he gave Ministers credit for having made the best peace which, under the existing circumstances, they were able to obtain, and it should have his cordial support.

The EARL of WARWICK expressed his satisfaction that the country had been restored to peace, because he knew that it was highly necessary to put an end to the difficulty and distress that all ranks felt, but especially the labouring class of the people, who by their labour could barely obtain a subsistence. At the same time he must confess that the preliminaries appeared to him by no means adequate to the expectations that the glorious successes of the country entitled us to entertain. But what he most regretted was, that it did not appear that we had been able to keep our faith with our allies, or to obtain the smallest pledge of security for the permanence and safety of the peace.

LORD MULGRAVE said, he had risen to have addressed their Lordships before the Noble and Learned Lord had left the woolsack, but he rejoiced that he had given way, as the Noble and Learned Lord had so ably anticipated most of the arguments which he meant to have offered; he should not, therefore, have to intrude many observations on their Lordships. No Noble Lord, he said, who had yet spoken, had hinted a doubt that the islands of Trinidad and Ceylon were possessions of infinite value to our commerce, and our power as a maritime state: there remained only therefore to consider the cessions we had made to the French republic. It could not be expected that we were to hold all our acquisitions in the West Indies when peace was to be negotiated. With regard to Minorca, past experience shewed, that, though of no great intrinsic value, it would always be in the possession of a state most powerful at sea. In the war of 1754, the French conquered it, and took possession. In the war of 1778, we retook it, but ceded it at the peace of 1783. In the present war we had again taken it, but by the present preliminaries we had again ceded it. Neither that, however, nor the island of Malta, were of material consequence to us, but in time of war. With regard to Cochin, the holding of it was important or not, according to circumstances. While we were masters of the Mysore country, Cochin might be in the possession of any other power, without the least danger to us. The Mysore in other hands, Cochin would be of infinite importance to us. Much had been said by his Noble Friend about the Cape of Good Hope, who had laid great stress upon its value. Though he had never seen the Cape himself, yet he had heard from professional men, that it had been greatly overrated in this country; that it was an expensive, unproductive settlement, and obliged to be maintained ever since we obtained possession of it, at an enormous expense to this country. Let their Lordships conjecture what his surprise must have been, when he heard that a Right Hon. Friend of his (Mr. Dundas) had declared in another place, that if a minister should be found bold enough to dare to propose the surrender of the Cape of Good Hope, he ought to lose his head.—Speaking of the army in Egypt, he said, that their conduct there alone would entitle them to immortal fame, and those that have outlived the siege of Alexandria, might say with our Henry V. in Shakespeare's words, speaking of the battle of Agincourt,

"He that shall live this day, and come safe home,
 "Will stand a tip-toe when this day is nam'd,
 "And rouse him at the name of Crispian :
 "He that shall live this day, and see old age,
 "Will yearly on the vigil feast his neighbours,
 "And say, 'To-morrow is St. Crispian.'"

The DUKE OF BEDFORD said, he came to the House with a thorough conviction that the preliminaries of peace were entitled to his support, and therefore should vote for the address.

The BISHOP OF ROCHESTER said, he could not agree to the motion that had been made. He was aware how awkward it was for him to rise from the bench on which he sat, to appear to be the enemy of peace, since it became those of his profession, preachers of the Gospel of Christ, to recommend concord and harmony among men. He was not the enemy to peace, but he was an enemy to the semblance, the counterfeit, and the pretence of peace, which contained in it the germs of future war, and possibly ruin and destruction to this country. The preliminaries on the table he considered to be a mere semblance, a counterfeit, and a pretence, of the description he had just stated. He should be heartily glad to have given his support to a peace that was honourable and advantageous to this country, and likely to be safe and permanent. His Lordship joined in asserting, that good faith with our allies, especially Portugal, had not been adhered to, and concurred with every part of the argument which had, he said, been so ably urged by his Noble Friend (Lord Grenville), and to the great points of which, he denied that any thing like an answer had been given. The Bishop condemned the mode of defending the preliminaries, by considering the value and importance of the island of Malta separately, or that of Minorca and the other cessions: to judge of the merit or demerit of the cessions, the whole must be regarded collectively. Was it right to yield the entire sovereignty of the Mediterranean to the enemy; to open a door to them in India, to yield up the Cape, and give them back their islands in the West Indies, which they considered as the more valuable, from having been cultivated by British industry and British capital? Look at all this mass of cession, and weigh it against the advantages of a precarious and hollow truce, and then the House would be able to decide with judgment and exactness. Having exposed the country to so much danger, he hoped the King's Servants would meet it with vigorous measures; and above all, that they would not rescind those salutary statutes that had preserved peace and tranquillity, and kept down the factious and seditious, the repeal of which had been much hinted at by Noble Lords on the other side of the House. He said, he would not at that late hour fatigue himself, and tire the patience of the House, by going into the full detail that he came down prepared to go into on the subject; indeed, the clear and comprehensive manner in which his Noble Friends, the Noble Earl in the blue riband, and the Noble Lord near him, had treated every part of the subject, precluded the necessity of his doing so. Before he sat down, his Lordship said, he must declare, upon his honour, that these were his genuine sentiments respecting the preliminaries, and that he never had delivered them before. He said this, because he had learned that he was suspected of having written some letters which had appeared in the newspapers, on the subject. He highly approved of many of the sentiments and opinions contained in those letters, but he neither wrote them, nor was privy to the writing of them*.

The BISHOP OF LONDON said, he would detain the House for a few minutes only, being anxious to be heard, lest their Lordships should be led to conclude that all the Reverend Bench were of the same opinion, with regard to the preliminaries of peace, with the Right Reverend Prelate who had just sat down. He was satisfied with the peace, BECAUSE [because] after nine years war, and two of famine, in which the people had suffered such severe distress, repose was absolutely necessary to the country to recover its resources, and renovate its strength. Not that he thought our resources were exhausted, or would not be adequate to a continuance of the war, had such a circumstance unfortunately been necessary !!!!!!! but that he thought was not the case, because we appeared to have carried our successful arms by sea and land, to every quarter of the globe in which the French republic was vulnerable. It would, therefore, be an useless waste of money and blood to continue the war without an object. For these REASONS the Bishop said, he would give the address his cordial support.

EARL FITZWILLIAM said, after the sentiments respecting the war which he had repeatedly delivered in that House, he could by no means consent to give a silent vote on the present occasion; but at that late hour he would endeavour to compress his observations as much as possible. It had, his Lordship said, been imputed to him, that he was unwilling to agree to any peace made with republican France; but that was not his sentiment. There might be conditions of peace to which he could readily agree to give his support, but they must be widely different from those upon the table. He could not but regard the peace that Ministers had made, in the same light in which it had been viewed by the Noble Lord who sat near him (Lord Grenville), viz. that of a bol-

* Mr. Cobbett's Letters on the Peace, the last of which was published on the 3d of November.

low and precarious truce, that carried with it no symptoms of security or permanency. His Lordship proceeded to argue in support of this assertion at considerable length, according with the Noble Lord near him in most of the observations he had made, which had not been answered, although so many Noble Lords had spoken in praise of the preliminaries under consideration. He rested much of his reasoning on the terms of the project tendered at Lisle in 1797, contending that they were more favourable to Great Britain, considering the then relative situation of the two countries, than the conditions that had now been obtained, which were disgraceful and humiliating in the extreme; and the exultation which the people in general had manifested on first hearing that peace was made, had appeared to him to be extremely suspicious, and to have been the effect of momentary delusion, which would vanish as soon as the people should return to their reason, and calmly reflect on the importance of the cessions and sacrifices that we had made, and the comparative insignificance of the cessions of the French republic.

The EARL of WESTMORELAND said, the peace, such as it was, was a desirable one for Great Britain, and that it had been made at a happy moment. He concluded with declaring that he would give his vote for the address.

EARL ST. VINCENT said, the preliminaries, he was convinced, were equally honourable and advantageous to this country; and the share he had the honour to have had in advising them being acceded to, he should ever consider as the pride of his life. By the peace, the preliminaries of which were under consideration, we had obtained two of the most valuable islands in the whole habitable globe, considered either in a political or a commercial view. On many other accounts, which he would not at that late hour attempt to detail, the peace was a fit subject of exultation, and not of sorrow and regret.

LORD NELSON rose to speak a few words respecting a point or two, in regard to which no one of their Lordships could, perhaps, speak with more information than himself. And first, with regard to Minorca, an island of little value to us, as at too great a distance from Toulon to serve as a station to watch the fleets of France that put to sea from that port. To speak next of Malta; when the Noble Earl sent him down, the Mediterranean was in the hands of the French; and on his return from the battle of Aboukir, he thought it his first object to blockade it, because he deemed it an invaluable piece of service to rescue it from the hands of the French. In any other point of view, he could assure their Lordships that Malta was of no sort of consequence to this country. It was true it contained a most extensive and commodious harbour, with a strong fortification, which would at least require 7000 soldiers to man the works. By the preliminaries, that was to be put into the possession of a third power; and he repeated it, that in any hands but those of the French it became immaterial to us. With regard to another point, the Cape of Good Hope, when the Indiamen were heavy ships, it might have been found useful for them to touch there and refit; but now, since the India ships were equipped like our men of war, and swift sailers, it frequently happened that they sailed out to India without touching at any port whatever. He had himself been there, and he considered it merely a tavern on the passage, which served to call at, and thence often to delay the voyage. While the Dutch held it, you could buy a cabbage there for twopence, but since it had been in our hands a shilling was obliged to be paid for a cabbage. It produced little that made it worth holding, and it could not be maintained but at an enormous expense; he therefore thought, that, considering the present situation of our territories in India, his Majesty's Ministers had acted with PRUDENCE and economy in giving up the Cape, and making it a free port.

The MARQUIS of BUCKINGHAM expressed the pain he felt at being obliged not to give a silent vote, but at that late hour of the night to have occasion to rise. He would, however, be as short as possible, and forbear entering into that detail, which, had he risen earlier in the day, he should have felt it his duty to go into. He lamented sincerely that he could not give his consent to the preliminaries on the table, because he thought them highly humiliating and disgraceful to this country. In the first place he held them to be dishonourable, inasmuch as they did not keep faith with our allies, but left them exposed and unprotected. Portugal in particular was most shamefully abandoned; and he could assure the House that the treaty with France, of which they had heard and seen so much, that there could be no doubt of its authenticity, although they had it not parliamentarily on their table, had been ratified since the 1st of October, the day on which the preliminaries were signed. By that treaty with France, this country was all but excluded altogether from her former commercial intercourse with Portugal; and if it were true that the cloths of France were to be received as those of the most favoured nation, our manufacturers of woollen cloth would soon taste the bitter fruits of this peace, for they would not easily forget that Portugal, if not now our greatest customer for our woollen cloths, was certainly our oldest customer. So much, therefore, for the good faith of the peace. With regard to the security of the peace, there was nothing stipulated, but we were left to depend solely for its security on the bare word and honour of the person now holding the government of the French republic. What was there in the character or conduct of that person which should give us any just and reasonable hopes, that he would not take the earliest, the first favourable opportunity of breaking the peace that offered? In what instance had he shewn the milk of human kindness so much as to lead us to rely on his abstaining from fresh hostilities, as soon as he felt it his interest to recommence the war against us? Had he never betrayed a rooted jealousy towards this country, an implacable revenge, and a deep-lodged hatred? Was his milk of human kindness so superabundant and overflowing as to wash from his remembrance all his past animosity towards us? Since the signing of the preliminaries the intrigues of the French had negotiated a private peace between the republic and the Porte, and prevented the latter from feeling a just and grateful sense of the manifold support and assistance we had afforded it (greater assistance he would venture to say than had ever been afforded the Porte by any European power), and prevented it from making those returns to which we were entitled. So much for the good faith of the First Consul of France in the first instance. Let their Lordships remember that by this treaty we had conceded every thing that would aid the French republic to recover its commerce and restore its marine. We had given to the First Consul "a giant's strength, and "we might be assured he would use it like a "giant."

The EARL of CAERNARVON said, that it was not his intention to detain their Lordships long; it was however difficult on so important a subject to give a silent vote; "I shall not, however (said the Noble Earl), trespass on your Lordships' time by following a singular rule laid down by the Noble and Learned Lord upon the woolsock, who will not admit as reasonable, any disapprobation of the preliminaries of peace under our discussion, unless the objector will undertake to furnish a new PROJET for a better peace. I shall, however, take leave to exercise my parliamentary duty, which is that of a censor, called upon from the Throne, to approve or disapprove, not as a Chancellor, to advise his Majesty in the exercise of his prerogative, especially on a subject which his Ministers have already pledged his honour to carry into execution by a definitive treaty; nor will I be impeded by another curious assertion and maxim of the Learned Lord's, that the question has already been decided by Parliament in 1797, in the shape of the projet for peace of that year, approved by Parliament; and that no Noble Lord has a right to disapprove of the present articles of peace, if any former Parliament has sanctioned terms, in the Noble Lord's opinion, worse than those now in discussion. I am not inclined to consider parliamentary precedents as sacred, nor at all times implicitly to subscribe to their justice and wisdom, particularly in a question of this nature, which must be decided on its own peculiar merits, and cannot possibly have an exact parallel in past times; periods, ever so little removed from the present moment, must vary in circumstances, which will defeat the application of any precedent; the opinion of Parliament varying in persons, or subjects varying in circumstances, ought not to have the slightest weight on future parliamentary deliberation; and it would be a tedious and useless waste of your Lordships' time, to canvass the consistency of particular Lords, instead of discussing the subject on its own grounds. If there were no other difference between the two periods alluded to by the Learned Lord, than the mutiny in the fleet, it would be sufficient to annihilate all comparison; and indeed it is so difficult to find two remote periods exactly corresponding at all points, that, even in the present existing moment, the Noble Lords who argue on the same side, concurring in their approbation of the same articles of peace, do not concur in the relative situation of the two negotiating countries at this instant. The Noble and Learned Lord says, that it is a necessary peace; he places us at the feet of France, suing for peace, and he laments that more advantageous terms could not be obtained. Other Noble Lords, speaking with ministerial information, assert that the country never stood higher; that our resources are unexhausted; that we have treated for a peace, in an hour of triumph, upon equal terms; and they defend the peace, as a safe, honourable, and adequate peace. The Noble and Learned Lord has felt that nothing but necessity could justify a peace so inadequate and dishonourable; and if the other Noble Lords have truly stated the flourishing state of the country, the terms must appear dishonourable and insecure. The Noble Marquis (Buckingham) has expressed his opinion of the instability of the proposed peace, by doubting (on the supposition that the French seamen had been returned) whether the preliminaries would ever reach a definitive confirmation. I confess that I feel no apprehension, that France will not wait till the definitive treaty has put her in possession of all the advantages of this peace; but when we have restored to France, without equivalent, all that she had lost in nine years of war, and to her allies, all that we had taken from them, with small exceptions, and disgracefully submitted to the uncompensated plunder of our friends and allies, she may then pursue against this country any object which her policy or insatiable ambition may dictate, and her augmented power may enable her to execute. We are called upon to approve the preliminaries of a peace, which, the moment it is put into execution, will place us in a worse relative situation than at the moment of its signature, or in any period of the war; and we must then depend on the good faith of a nation, not conspicuous for that virtue, and generally esteemed our natural enemy, and trust that she will not avail herself of her advantages. Some Noble

Lords have silenced all their apprehensions, by persuasion that this peace will have left us no bone of contention; it is a singular argument, for the surrender of every thing valuable, that we shall enjoy the beggar's security, who CAN-TAT VACUUS CORAM LATRONE. Two articles retained by us in this unequal peace, may be objects of future hostility, and meant only as temporary concessions; or the present or future ruler of France may again adopt the maxim, DELEND EST CARTHAGO, before the rest of Europe have recovered their exhausted strength. The Noble and Learned Lord, in his defence of his necessary peace, puts a question on each individual article, whether it was an object worth the continuance of a bloody war, and the annual expenditure of millions, as if each separate article required a separate war, and its pursuit the separate expenditure of millions, as it may require separate discussions on its utility. The Noble and Learned Lord, who uses a question for an argument, may be answered by his own question applied to France: Is each separate article worth to her a separate war and the expenditure of millions? The Learned Prelate (Rochester) truly observed, that the terms of peace were composed of all the articles, and could not be considered but as one, good or bad peace, taken conjointly. Those who have considered the peace as a necessary peace, have only considered the state of this country, and have shut their eyes to the state of France. I scarce know any single object worth the expenditure of blood and treasure of a long war, and yet other circumstances in the relative situation of two countries, may make war necessary; if this peace was desirable to us, was it not equally desirable to France? It may be reasonably imagined that France was as fatigued and exhausted with the war as this country, and ready to purchase peace upon equal terms. The fact, I am persuaded, was so, and that peace, more adequate, safe, and honourable, might have been obtained, had not our negotiators ineffectually surrendered the interests of the country. Every article in the preliminaries is concession on our side, and advantage to France and her allies; and so much is left for discussion in the definitive treaty, that the principal effect of the preliminaries will be to show how much disposed we are to renounce every thing for peace. In the article respecting Portugal, nothing is obtained for her; we sanction the terms which France has imposed upon her, by reference to her existing situation, and we may, for aught we know, approve of our own exclusion from the ports of Portugal, which was understood to form an article of that treaty. The comfort given to us by the Noble Lord, that we may be better by the definitive treaty, and cannot be worse than now fixed, is as fallacious as his former reasoning; for the same observation is as just, and I fear will be more effectual, in the mouth of France, that they also may be better by the definitive treaty, and cannot without folly be worse; and then all the undecided points will probably be influenced by the same predominant influence which dictated the preliminaries; and it is impossible, under these circumstances, that I should approve the preliminaries as (under the existing circumstances) safe, adequate, and honourable, or that it will produce such a peace, as the speeches from the Throne have from the commencement of the war till this hour held out to the country."

LORD HOBART said, that, with regard to the Cape, it could only be kept at an enormous expense to this country; that it had already cost us a million of money; that we had, on our first taking possession of it, imported home all the corn we found there, hoping to supply this country, and that the consequence had been, that we had since, even during the great scarcity, been obliged to re-export corn to the Cape, to preserve the settlement from starving. As to any necessity for ships to touch there in their passage to India, he denied it to exist. He had himself known a fleet of thirteen Indiamen sail from Madras home, without touching any where; and if in war-time a squadron of his Majesty's ships were sent to India, and on the voyage stood in need of water, they might take it in at the Cape de Verd islands, at Madagascar, and at various other islands.

The question was then put from the woolsack, and the House divided,

HOUSE OF COMMONS *, NOVEMBER 3D, 1801.

SIR EDMUND HARTOP moved the address; he said that he could not repress his sanguine hope, that as the sentiments of the people without doors were universally and unanimously in approbation of the peace, so would the sentiments of those whom he had now the honour to address.—He said, the cause of failure in one great object of the war was the want of co-operation on the part of our allies, the consequence of which has been, that whilst our enemy has been able to add extensively to her dominions by territories wrested from her neighbours, it became expedient for us, under all existing circumstances, to enter into negotiations for peace; for, deserted as we were by all our allies, we had no room to hope that we should be able to force her back within the limits of her ancient boundaries. But in the unparalleled events of the last glorious campaign, amidst the victorious and brilliant achievements of our arms, we have beheld the pacific councils of his Majesty's Ministers so attached to the restoration of tranquillity as not to be shaken by the splendour of our successes, not to be stimulated to a renewal of the contest in another campaign, where so much more of the national blood and treasure must have been exhausted in an useless pursuit. No; but, on the contrary, his Majesty's Ministers, wisely considering the second great object of the war no longer attainable, and considering the honourable advantages we had acquired in the struggle, formed the resolution of treating for a peace; and in forming the preliminaries, to secure the interests of those allies who had maintained their faith with us to the last extremity.—Having then preserved through the whole of this arduous contest the integrity of our own dominions; having maintained through every vicissitude the strictest faith towards our allies; and having shewn that no ambition of extending our territories could induce us to prolong a war by refusing to surrender even a part of our conquests as a price of security to those allies, we have held forth to Europe an illustrious example of honour, of justice, and of faith, worthy of admiration and example, and highly advantageous to our reputation and our interest, which he held to be inseparable.

Mr. LEE said, that the question he wished to ask, with respect to the good policy of the peace, was, whether we had obtained our objects in the war? In his mind we had, completely, in the preservation of our constitution, and the defence of our territories; and if we had so far succeeded in the Cape of Good Hope as to make it a neutral port, he would ask, was it worth while to risk another campaign for the chance of effecting a better alternative, whatever was the probability of success? In such an attempt, if we could not succeed in our purpose with all the great powers in Europe in our alliance, was it now probable that we should singly succeed against France, who had shewn herself able to resist the world in arms? He thought not; but was convinced the best security we had for the permanence of peace, was, because France and England, the two greatest powers in the war, have approved it, and had both been considerable gainers by the contest. One great objection heretofore to the conclusion of peace, was the great instability of the French executive power; but in his mind this was one of the best sureties for it now; and whether that great colossal power was permanent or crumbled to pieces, we ought not to interfere with its internal policy. The present Chief Consul amused the people of France with an idea that they enjoyed a free republic, while, in fact, he himself possessed more absolute power over them, than all the Bourbons ever had done; but the people of France were satisfied with it, and no form of government ever was established in France since the revolution, that promised so much stability. But what security was there for peace between any two nations the moment it became the interest of either to violate it? He recollected to have heard the saying of an Emperor of Morocco, in proposing to make war, and being told that it was a violation of faith to break peace, he answered, "I break it because it is my interest." Such was the language of the savage monarch. He suspected that he had spoken in plain, blunt terms, the liberal language and principles of the modern courts of Europe.—The blood and treasure which had been exhausted by England in this war was no more than our duty to posterity demanded; and if the expenses were considered, the national debt was increased no more than 170,000,000*l.* more than it stood at the conclusion of the American war, with this difference, that we had then no such prospect of its reduction as the admirable sinking fund established by the Right Honourable Gentleman who lately and for so many years presided over the finances of this country had given. By this fund, he said, that in little more than seventy-three years, supposing a permanent peace, the whole of the debt would cease to be a burden on the people of England.

LORD LEVISON GOWER, after disapproving of the terms of the peace, said that he was not disposed to give a vote against it. Peace was an object for which he was heartily joyful, and he was not now prepared peremptorily to assert that it could have been obtained on better terms. The peace, such as it was, had excited universal joy throughout the country; and having himself witnessed this joy, he could not consent to vote against it, though he had thought it his duty to throw out these observations to the House.

LORD HAWKESBURY rose, and addressed the House to the following effect:—"Sir, I rise at this early hour of the debate, in consequence of the observations which have fallen from my Noble Friend, and in order to explain, I trust, to the satisfaction of Gentlemen, the motives which induced his Majesty's Ministers to enter into a negotiation with the French republic, and to conclude the preliminaries of that treaty submitted to-night to the consideration of the House. The very reasons urged by my Noble Friend against the nature and terms of the treaty, tend, in my opinion, most directly and strongly to evince their propriety and claims to the approbation of the country, and to the sanction of Parliament. He has undertaken to compare the projet as proposed by Lord Grenville at Lisle with the articles of the present adjustment; a mode of proceeding unwarranted by the fair consideration of both in their various relations: and he has ventured to assimilate things, between which no comparison can exist. I state in positive terms, that they cannot be compared; for no man will venture to deny that Lord Grenville would have been glad to have taken less from the government of France than he demanded at that period of the negotiation. After nine years effusion of blood; after contracting an increase of debt to the amount of nearly two hundred millions; after the indefatigable and uninterrupted exertions of the country; but at the same time, after a series of the most splendid achievements and unexampled successes, there is not a man in the kingdom who must not admit that peace was a most desirable attainment, was the object of his sincerest wishes and most ardent desires. But notwithstanding the hope and zeal with which all must have looked and laboured for the restoration of tranquillity, I solemnly disclaim the plea which has been set up by some persons, the plea of overruling necessity. I am persuaded, that such a cause for the conclusion of the preliminary treaty will not be traced to any thing like satisfactory grounds. I am desirous that his Majesty's Ministers should, in the adoption of that measure, be tried by those reasons in which the war originated, by which it was carried on, and which were found to exist when the contest ceased. In saying thus much, I am, Sir, aware that the peace, however eligible, however adequate to the relative state of this country and of France, however it can be justified upon the principles of sound policy, is not free of all evil, of all chance, of all risk or danger. But let me ask, what event has taken place in the recollection of all who hear me, or what event may yet take place, in accounting for which it has been or will be possible to remove every objection? Under all the circumstances in which we were situated, I maintain that the treaty is honourable and advantageous; and the question now for the decision of the House is, whether his Majesty's Ministers have been to blame or not? In the consideration of this question, Gentlemen will not, I am persuaded, lose sight of the relative state of the two countries, nor hesitate to examine whether better terms could have been obtained. Some persons object to the peace, because they contend that the end of the contest is not gained. They argue that the war was undertaken with the view of destroying republicanism, and of interfering in the internal affairs of France, for the purpose of stopping the progress of the revolution. I maintain, on the contrary, that the destruction of republicanism was not its object; and that no interference in the internal concerns of France was intended. Such statements I absolutely disclaim; and declare, on the contrary, that the country was forced into the war by the conduct of France. It was she who interfered in the affairs of other nations; who took part and direction in the internal regulations of all countries; who, both openly, and by her agents and intrigues, propagated disaffection, sedition, anarchy, and revolt. The revolution was a torrent so dreadful and violent in its origin and progress, that no man, or set of men, could be so sanguine as to entertain a hope of checking its rage and impetuosity: but if we had opposed it even in its fatal and almost irresistible course with some success; if we had, even when there existed but a very faint prospect of a favourable issue to our labours, rendered it less dangerous in its effects than it would otherwise have been; if we had, at least, changed its direction, and made it flow in a channel less harmless to the general happiness and interests of the world, I trust, Sir, that some acknowledgment is due to the wisdom, vigilance, and perseverance of Government, as well as to the spirit and exertions of the country. It is indeed impossible to look at the present state of France without being convinced that we have at least effected this important change; a change which is manifest to the most superficial observer, in the manners, the opinions, the habits of the people of France. Let those who pretend to doubt the justice of this observation look to the state of France as it was in 1793, and to the state of France as it is in 1801! Let them take the trouble of comparing the striking and almost incredible alteration which has taken place in the manners, opinions, and habits to which I have alluded, and then give me a candid answer! If after this comparison, if after all that has been done, I am called upon to deliver my opinion with respect to the moral evils of peace, I must say I feel, under all the circumstances of the present moment, that they are certainly less than on any former occasion. With regard to the continuance of hostilities, there are two considerations by which we are to be regulated: the first is, whether we possessed the power of forming another coalition against France; and the second, if we continued the war, what harm could France do to us, and what harm could we do to France? The first coalition had failed; the second coalition had equally failed; and had we any satisfactory grounds to make us desirous of framing a third, and hazarding another experiment of the same nature? What was the chance, what was the probability of forming a new coalition in the least degree likely to be of service to the powers of the continent, or to this country in particular? It was, I will venture to assert, altogether impossible to find in Europe the elements of such a combination of force directed to the attainment of one grand end. Were they to be found in the Empire of Germany? Were they to be found in Prussia? Were they to be found in Russia? I ask then, what was the prospect of success that could be derived from a third confederacy against France? And if, therefore, it be evident that no coalition could be formed, I ask, what object could we possibly have, under that point of view, in the further prosecution of hostilities? As to any harm which France could do to us, or which we could do to France, I believe it does not require many words to shew to the satisfaction of Gentlemen, that a cessation of any thing like serious and decisive aggression had taken place. Where and in what manner was it possible for us, with our immense superiority by sea, to affect France by striking a fatal blow? The fact was, that neither power could affect the other. These remarks, Sir, I have made with a view of shewing the inefficacy of any new coalition against the French republic, as well as the inefficacy of the continuance of the war between her and this country. In discussing the preliminary articles of peace, there are three considerations which press strongly upon my mind, and which I am sanguine enough to hope will not be deemed destitute of weight; I mean the time, the tone, and the terms of the treaty. And first, with respect to the time at which the treaty was signed. It was concluded under a just impression of your success; it was concluded at a moment when your triumphs were complete. Such a time was worthy of the country to accelerate the important work of pacification. Would it have been prudent, would it have been consistent with political wisdom, to have pushed matters to an extreme point? It was, on the contrary, in the hour of victory that it became the spirit and magnanimity of the Government, and the people, to listen to the voice of peace; and if the terms appeared advantageous, I have fair grounds to presume, that a more glorious opportunity could not present itself. In speaking of the tone in which the peace has been concluded, it is sufficient for me to observe, that it is marked with a tone of dignity and independence; that the honour of the nation has been preserved, and that every idea of humiliation has been resisted with success, both with respect to ourselves and our allies. When I come to an examination of the terms of the treaty, I must disclaim the support, and condemn the opinions of those who have been accustomed to undervalue the resources of this country, and to extol those of the enemy. The circumstances under which we were, as opposed to the enemy, have been essentially different, and it is in that difference that the best reasons for the concluding a peace will be found. But first, Sir, it may not be improper to call the attention of Gentlemen to our conduct towards our allies; and particularly to the strict maintenance of that good faith for which we have been so eminently distinguished. The first power which I have occasion to mention is the Ottoman Porte, whose territories and dominions are to be restored and maintained in their integrity, as they were before the war. An instance of our generosity, as well as of our good faith, must not however be passed over; I allude to the release which we gave to those powers connected with us, from express and positive stipulations, when they were exposed by the necessity of the moment to danger, from continuing faithful to their engagements. To Portugal every protection has been given, consistent with our strength, and with her interests; and in the case of Naples we displayed a magnanimity which we might have been well justified in omitting. Naples was called upon by France to exclude our shipping from her ports; but she went further, and joined in an alliance which would have warranted on our part a declaration of war: yet with sufficient grounds to justify to Europe and to our own conscience such a measure, what was our conduct upon that occasion? We interfered in her favour, and obtained the restoration of her dominions and territories, and the re-establishment of her independence. In the case of Portugal, our conduct had not been less exemplary. To the Ottoman Porte we were under peculiar obligations; and of all our allies she remained faithful to us to the last. To her we evinced proofs of the most inviolable attachment; for we obtained for her, without sacrifice, not only the restitution of all her dominions and territories in their integrity, but we also obtained the renunciation of France to acquisitions which threatened not only her independence, but existence. France had ceded Venice to Austria; Austria had, in return, ceded the Ex-Venetian islands to France. These islands, which from their situation might have been productive of the most serious danger to the Ottoman Porte, have been abandoned by the French republic, and their independence recognised. Thus, Sir, you have obtained by the treaty all that could be obtained for your allies, and not only preserved your good faith inviolate, but manifested your generosity where it could not be expected. There are indeed two other powers of which it may be proper to take notice; the Stadtholder and the King of Sardinia. It is obvious that we were not bound by any obligation of strict faith towards them; yet I can safely state that every thing which this country could do for them has been performed. An arrangement with respect to the former had, at our instance, been carried on at Berlin; but that arrangement had, from various causes, been withdrawn. In favour of Sardinia we had also interfered, although she had given up the coalition, and entered into an offensive alliance with France.—Having noticed the manner in which we have uniformly and honourably displayed our good faith, I now come to the question of acquisition, as it should be fairly taken with respect to the power and resources of a country. And here let me observe, that the spirit of acquisition may be strained beyond its proper limits. It is not of this country alone that I am speaking; for the principle will, if properly scrutinized, apply with equal force to France. I contend, that an increase of power does not take place in proportion to the increase of acquisitions. That this doctrine applies no less to France than to this country, is justified by the opinion of men well qualified to form an estimate of the strength and resources of nations; and we accordingly find it supported by Dumonier and Carnot. I think it unnecessary to enter into any detailed reasoning to shew, that the principle applying to the continent is equally true with respect to the acquisition of colonial power. In looking to the state of our settlements in the West Indies, I do not see any cession made by us which can be the subject of regret; nor is there in the East Indies any possession given to France which ought to be viewed with jealousy. The possessions in which she is to be reinstated in that quarter, are not calculated for the purposes of aggression; and if she were formidable in the force and extent of her naval resources and power, the island of Mauritius would, under every consideration, afford a more dangerous point of attack against our empire in the East. But it is maintained, that we give up by the treaty another possession of great importance to our foreign concerns and to our commercial prosperity. I allude to the island of Minorca, which I do not consider as an acquisition. Let us, in order to form a clear judgment, reflect upon our conduct with respect to that island in former wars; and I believe I shall not incur the charge of presumption in delivering this opinion. We have always acquired that island whenever we pleased, and we have always lost it at the conclusion of peace. By relinquishing it then after the war, we avoid the expense of preserving it in peace; and if the situation be advantageous to us in war, we can always make ourselves masters of it. Of Malta I speak with less confidence, which, from its situation, and its almost impregnable state, is certainly of considerable political importance in the Mediterranean: but giving up this point, as far as it relates to political weight and influence, I must observe that Malta is no source of trade and opulence; and that if it be considered as connected with the prosperity of the Levant trade, its importance in that respect will be greatly diminished. The Levant trade may, like many other topics of commercial speculation, be highly valued; but it is, as far as it relates to this country, next to nothing. Gentlemen will give me credit for this statement, when they hear that the whole of the British manufactures exported to the Levant, during the war, does not exceed the sum of 112,000*l.* and this is to be taken out of the aggregate exports of twenty-four millions. The trade of Great Britain is nothing when compared to that of other countries to the Levant. It is chiefly supplied by the south of Europe, and it must remain with the southern countries, from the nature of its articles, and the facility of communication and intercourse. With respect to the north of Europe, it has certainly been principally in the possession of the Dutch, yet the Dutch have had no settlement in the Mediterranean. Why, then, it may be asked, did the Dutch succeed in cultivating this particular branch of trade? I answer, Because their policy was much wiser than ours; because we prevented ships with forged bills of health from entering our ports, and made all vessels coming from the Mediterranean perform quarantine; because we equally prohibited the landing both of sound and bad goods. The Dutch, on the contrary, gave them airing within their ports, separated the good from the bad merchandise, and allowed the immediate importation of the former. Thus they occupied almost the whole of the northern trade to the Levant; and this was so strongly felt by us, that about two years ago it was judged expedient to repeal these laws, in order to encourage a system of trade which the Dutch converted to their own profit, although they possessed no port in the Levant. After considering what has been given up by the treaty, it remains for me to say a few words on those possessions which we are to retain; and in what I have, Sir, to offer on the subject of Ceylon and Trinidad, I hope I shall not be thought to overrate these two islands, when I call them the two great naval stations of the parts of the world to which they belong. Ceylon, in every point of view, cannot be too highly appreciated. It contains ports so capacious and secure, that the whole of the navy and commerce of Great Britain might ride with ease and safety in them. It is also in its native productions of immense value, and holds out a position to which our Indian army might retire, if necessary, and defy the attempts of the united force of the world. Thus the very object, which above all others we should from our duty and interest prefer, we have gained by this treaty. Trinidad is also a naval station of very considerable importance, affording not only a secure retreat for our navy, but so very productive and so healthy, as to induce us to select and appropriate it to ourselves in preference to every other possession in that quarter. Thus, Sir, considering the results of the war; considering all our old possessions with our acquired territory, I say, if the term glory is not to be taken into the account by some Gentlemen, that we have at least made an honourable peace. (A loud cry of Hear!) I say, if it is not in all respects as advantageous as you could wish, it cannot, however, be denied that it is honourable. Let it be compared with the last five treaties of peace which have been made; and then when all the circumstances are duly weighed, let Gentlemen form an estimate of its merits. Let it be compared with the treaties of Ryswick, of Utrecht, of Aix-la-Chapelle, of Paris, and of Versailles; and let it be remembered that the relative state of this country with that of the contracting parties, both at these periods and at present, should be fairly canvassed. By two of these peaces the country gained nothing. I need scarcely mention those of Ryswick and Aix-la-Chapelle. By that of Versailles we lost very considerably, for we were deprived of our American colonies and some valuable possessions. It was only by the peace of Utrecht in 1713, and that of Paris in 1763, that we gained any thing. Yet if we compare the treaty of Utrecht with the present treaty, the latter will be found by no means inferior, either in point of advantage or in the promise of stability. The severity of the conditions rendered the former the source of bitterness, and the cause of subsequent contention. France had been every where defeated, and found no consolation in continental victories, while in the present war she triumphed over all the great powers of the continent. She makes the present treaty after a series of unexampled successes; and though some persons may not pronounce it as glorious as that of 1713, or as surprising as that of 1763, yet, taken together in all its objects and effects, it may be justly considered as advantageous to Great Britain as either of them. It may be argued that we obtained Minorca and Gibraltar by the peace of Utrecht; yet whatever reliance may be placed on these advantages, I believe neither of them can be deemed superior to the possessions of Ceylon and Trinidad. By the treaty of Paris, France gave up Canada, and Florida was ceded by Spain; yet with all that extent of territory, I am strongly inclined to think that they were not real acquisitions. I now ask fairly, whether the peace given by Government to the country, compared with every former peace, is not as honourable to the character of the country, and as advantageous as circumstances could allow? With respect to the negotiation at Lisle, I am at a loss to conceive the consistency of persons who could sign the one and not sign the other. The question, Sir, for our consideration is, not a peace in which the powers of the continent take a leading part, but a separate and naval peace between Great Britain and France. I will not, however, assimilate the two proceedings, for it would be comparing a first projet with an ultimate peace. In the projet we only required Ceylon, Trinidad, and the Cape; but the Noble Lord says, we have since obtained several important possessions. I grant we have, but we have been deprived of others, amongst which we have to reckon the island of St. Domingo, where we had some of the most valuable points and strongest holds. The only power we then stipulated for was Portugal, yet nothing was attempted at that time to what has been effected now. There is no comparison whatever between the two periods and the outlines and substance of the negotiations. In discussing the terms of this peace, I am aware that the great power of France ought to be considered in a general scale, which will make them appear less advantageous, and there is no man who regrets the circumstance more sincerely than myself. Yet the increase of that power is, perhaps, not altogether so vast as it may appear at first sight, if we take it in proportion to the increase of the other principal powers of the continent. Austria, Russia, and Prussia, have had a very considerable addition by the division of Poland; and the first power in particular has augmented in a superior degree both her extent of territory and her population, by the annexation of Venice to her dominions. In appreciating the power of France, we must consider the diminution sustained by her commerce, the ruin of her manufacturers, and an incalculable loss of wealth; while, if we consider the real increase of the substantial power of Great Britain, it will be found in proportion to the continental increase of France. Under this impression, allow me, Sir, for a moment to consider the possessions of Great Britain as they were previous to the war; and first, in taking an estimate of the exports of British manufactures to our old West India islands for the last three years of peace, I find them amount to 2,185,000*l.* while they are not less during the three last years of war than 3,561,000*l.* Our imports from the same quarter were, during the same periods, 3,877,000*l.* in peace, and 5,101,000*l.* in time of war. I also find, by referring to the proper documents, that our exports to the East Indies were, during the three last years of peace, 3,183,000*l.* and during the last three years of war 5,617,000*l.* The amount of our exports to the United States of America is still more surprising, making in the same periods of peace 3,694,000*l.* and in the same periods of war, no less than 6,232,000*l.* With respect to the continent of Europe, the total of our exports was in the first instance 1,530,000*l.* and in the latter 2,545,000*l.* From these statements, respecting which, authenticated as they are, there cannot exist a doubt, it appears, that the commerce of this country, as applied to our old possessions, has been nearly doubled in some instances, and has had in all an augmentation of one third. I beg, Sir, to press this the more, as it is necessary to consider the increase of our trade with the decrease of that of France. In calculating the power of both countries, as it should possess weight in the general scale, it is but fair to enter into a comparison of their respective navies; and here the best and most candid mode that presents itself is to take them as they stood at the commencement and the end of the war; on the 1st of February 1793, and on the 1st of October 1801. On the 1st of February 1793, the British navy consisted of 135 sail of the line, and 133 frigates; and on the 1st of October 1801, it comprised 202 sail of the line, and 277 frigates. The navy of France was, at the commencement of the war, composed of 80 sail of the line, and 66 frigates; and at the conclusion, it consisted of 39 sail of the line, and 35 frigates. This disparity is so striking and extraordinary, both in the navy and commerce of the two countries, that it must be attended with the effects I wish to point out in the relative situation of general affairs. It has indeed been said, that France will give her whole attention to recruit her navy, and I give full credit to the assertion. She will, no doubt, wish and exert herself to accomplish an object so very desirable for the accumulation of political power; but I cannot help observing, that, whatever her efforts may be, there are two points in the arduous task, which are well entitled to our consideration. The first is, the number of years she must be employed in building ships to make her naval establishment equal even to what it was; and the second is, the number of ships necessary to be built, in order to enable her to enter into a competition with this country. All who examine this subject thoroughly will have no objection to give to France a great many years, and afterwards to take the chance of a war with her. We shall not be employed in building of ships, but in making seamen. It is with the increase of our commerce that our navy will always increase. France will, no doubt, make great exertions for the purpose; but whether a contest will take place in the course of eight or ten years, I am confident that we shall be enabled to renew it with more advantage than we began it in the late war!!!! One of the reasons which induced me to entertain this opinion, arises from a conviction that the country will possess all its ardour and spirit, a lively recollection of all its brilliant exploits, and a just confidence in the extent of its resources and finance. I have one question to put to every man who hears me, and that is, whether peace could be concluded upon safer and more honourable terms? We accepted the situation which we have the honour of filling, when the country was involved in war with almost every power of Europe; we had to contend with France, Spain, Russia, and the rest of the Northern Powers. The convention concluded with them will, I trust, be considered as a fair acknowledgment of our maritime rights; and with that acknowledgment it is ardently to be hoped, that the complete restoration of peace and harmony will take place. Since that event, a peace with France has been effected. I do not wish to say that it has been brought about by any extraordinary means; but I can say with confidence for my colleagues and myself, that nothing has been neglected, nothing left undone on our part, in exertion, in perseverance, and in moderation, to give to the country that blessing of which it was so much in want, and for which it is so eminently indebted to its own admirable spirit and patriotism, and to the zeal and gallantry of its soldiers and sailors. We have been engaged in a most tremendous contest; but we have come out of it with honour and advantage. The situation of Europe, and that of Great Britain, may still appear critical; yet I hope that in a sound system of policy, consisting in a mixture of firmness and moderation, will be always found a counterpoise to every danger, and a remedy for every evil. I beg pardon, Sir, for having so long trespassed on the indulgence of the House, and shall not trouble them with any further observations."

THE HON. THOMAS GRENVILLE said, that those who opposed the peace had been represented as frantic people, who contended that the restoration of the French monarchy should be the sine quâ non of peace. This charge, however, could by no means apply to him, because he had never entertained such an idea. Gentlemen, therefore, who advanced the charge had gone farther than they were warranted to go. As to the right of interference in the affairs of France, we had surely a right to interfere for the purpose of preventing that enormous aggrandizement, which was big with danger to ourselves. This had ever been considered, by our wisest statesmen, as an object of the first importance to this country. Whenever a peace had been concluded between two contending parties, it followed, of course, that one party had the superiority over the other, which it was fair and proper to exert for the purpose of ensuring advantageous terms, such terms, at least, as should place the country which accepted them in a state of security. And he hoped that the spirit of the English would ever lead them to resist, with energy and decision, terms of a different nature, fraught with dishonour, and big with humiliation.—But while he disclaimed the wild notions which had been falsely imputed to him, he hoped he should never be found amongst those faithless watchmen of the state, who should seek to lull the people into a false security and a treacherous repose, but ever act with such as should endeavour to rouse them to a just sense of existing danger, of a danger which threatened them with ruin, with annihilation.—It had been the practice of some of the public papers to accuse those who condemned the peace, of being hostile to his Majesty and to his Majesty's Government. He, however, had no hostility to his Majesty, nor yet to the Ministers; but no dread of misrepresentation should ever deter him from giving his sentiments, freely and fully, respecting a measure which appeared to him calculated to increase our danger instead of diminishing it. He felt it his duty to oppose it; and he would contend, that both in the present treaty, and in the convention with the Northern Powers, Ministers had assumed an humble tone, which would lead to consequences dangerous to the existence of the country.—The Gentlemen who had that night supported the peace, had purposely dissembled the real object of the war. He had ever considered it as a war for indemnity and security. The enemy had threatened the existence of our liberties and our constitution. To preserve them, then; to prevent the diffusion of principles subversive of all the bonds of civil society; to obtain indemnity for the expenses which we had been compelled to incur, and security for the future, was the real and avowed object of the war. Ministers had thrown our successes aside; they seemed to have forgotten our victories, and to have lost sight of our conquests. But the recollection of those victories and those conquests would remain to heighten and to aggravate the reflections that must arise from the contemplation of our sacrifices. To have been victorious, and yet to have treated as a vanquished nation, was a galling and a mortifying reflection to a British mind. It implied, indeed, a contradiction of terms, and a confusion of ideas, which no acuteness could reconcile, no strength of understanding dispel.—The Noble Lord (Hawkesbury) had begun by stating, that the present period was very different from that at which the former negotiation took place; that we had originally opposed the principles of France, but latterly we had opposed her power. But in his opinion both led to the same end; and if the power of France threatened the existence of this country, it was as much our interest and our duty to oppose that power, as it was to oppose her principles, when exerted for the same purpose. Mr. Grenville then entered into a comparison of the terms of the present treaty with the terms which were offered to us at Lisle; and clearly shewed that the latter were far preferable to the former. It had been said, that the general language of the country in respect of the peace was, that it was such a peace as every man was glad of, but no man proud of. But he hoped and suspected, that this was an epigrammatic expression, and not a true picture. For if Englishmen could rejoice at a bad peace, at a peace of which they could not be proud, the national character was totally lost.—Though the supporters of the peace had prudently forbore to insist on its glory, they still persevered in representing it as honourable. But in what light was it honourable? The Noble Lord had contended, and truly contended, that time and circumstances were necessary considerations in the conclusion of a treaty; but he was at a loss to perceive the wisdom of that policy, which would reject better terms in a moment of dismay, and accede to worse, in the hour of victory and confidence: there might be a shew of magnanimity in such conduct, but was it wise, was it politic, was it compatible with the real interests of the country?—Let us see in what respect it was honourable, as it relates to our allies; how far their interests have been consulted. Ministers have assumed great credit to themselves for their conduct towards our allies. What has been done for them? Turkey was the only power which could be truly said to be in alliance with us. It was said that the integrity of the Sublime Porte had been secured. But is that her opinion? does she feel secure? A week after this stipulation for her security, a week after this extraordinary instance of our magnanimity had been displayed, Turkey preferred the guarantee of her enemy to that of her ally, and chose to negotiate for herself. As we had compelled the French to evacuate Egypt, both the security of Turkey and our own required that we should have retained in our possession some strong fortress, garrisoned by British troops. Without this precaution, what was there to prevent the French from returning to Egypt? At the very moment when we magnanimously stipulated for the evacuation of that country, there was not a French soldier remaining in it, (thanks to General Hutchinson, whose military skill, whose firm perseverance, and whose manly courage could only be exceeded by his modesty), who was not a prisoner to our gallant, persevering, and victorious army. As to the integrity of Naples, that was as insecure as Turkey; for, though the French troops had evacuated a part of the Neapolitan territory, what was to prevent them from returning, especially, as they retained possession of the Cisalpine Republic? “I wish to know what is to prevent the French who evacuate Naples to-day, Monday, from re-entering it on Wednesday, the distance from the Cisalpine Republic not being more than sixty miles?” Such is the situation, such the security, such the integrity of Naples. In casting our eyes over the map of Europe, we look in vain for the kingdom of Sardinia. The territories of his Sardinian Majesty live only in our memory. In the Mediterranean, he had only the little island of Sardinia left, for the security of which, he was solely indebted to the protection of our fleet; a protection which he would lose the moment the definitive treaty should be signed. The next of our allies, the integrity of whose dominions exhibits an illustrious proof of our magnanimity, is Portugal. On this subject he had endeavoured to obtain information; but he had not been sufficiently successful to speak with decision of it. He adverted to the treaty of Badajos, and to the cession of a portion of the Portuguese territory in the Brazils; and he asked whether it was to be understood that our treaty with France sanctioned that cession? Portugal, like Naples, had been secured by us, in the integrity of her possessions; and our magnanimity on this occasion had been loudly vaunted by the noble lord, because those two powers had formed separate treaties with the enemy. But were not those treaties the effect of compulsion on the one hand, and the result of conquest on the other? Should we have been justified in declaring war against Portugal and Naples for yielding, against their will, to dire necessity? If no blame, then, attached to Portugal, if she ought really to be considered as our ally, as no human being could suspect her of possessing the ability to resist her enemy, there could not be the smallest reason for any diminution of our attachment to her. How have we provided for her security? The preliminary articles will tell us how. Mr. Grenville then took a large bundle of papers out of his pocket, but begged the House not to be alarmed, as he only meant to read about half a dozen lines. He then read the following articles of the preliminary treaty. V. Egypt shall be restored to the Sublime Porte, whose dominions and possessions shall be secured in their integrity such as they were before the war. VI. The territories and possessions of his Most Faithful Majesty shall also be maintained in their integrity. France, as far as any treaty can bind her, has concluded a peace with Portugal;

but on what terms? She has taken from her Olivenza and the adjoining territory, which Spain had long coveted; and for which nothing more was requisite than to express a wish, in order to obtain it from France. France, at the same time, took for herself a portion of the Brazils, which gave her the command of the river Amazon and the whole of the adjacent coast. Mr. Windham quoted Monsieur de la Condamine, in order to shew the advantage which France would derive from the possession of this tract of country; in addition to what she already enjoyed in the proximity of Dutch Guiana. Is this the mode of guaranteeing the possessions, of securing the integrity of a faithful ally? If integrity and dismemberment be synonymous terms, then, indeed, the assertion may be true. In allusion to the term honourable, which the noble lord has absurdly applied to the peace, every man must feel that no peace was safe that was not honourable, and that no peace was honourable which was not safe; but, unfortunately, this peace was neither safe nor honourable: nor could any peace be honourable, which gave us territories that did not belong to the power by whom they were given. The conduct of our government in the negotiation at Lisle was very different: they did what was wise and proper to attain peace for the good of the country. They selected certain points of importance, which it was necessary, for the preservation of that honour, to insist upon. He was surprized to hear certain expressions which had fallen from the noble lord, relative to the acquisitions we had made by the present peace, which he contrasted with Lord Malmesbury's project, the wisdom of which he extolled. We should have been fully justified in the retention of Ceylon, the Cape, and Cochin, for the more effectual defence of our eastern empire. When we look at the cessions which we have made, we should find the conquests we had retained comparatively trifling. His mind was not at all satisfied with the situation in which the Cape was left by the treaty. We had ceded a port which might become a great annoyance to our trade. The Cape furnished a military station of vast importance in the event of a sudden war, not preceded by a proclamation. The Marquis Cornwallis, in his return from India, had strongly pressed the necessity of retaining Cochin, and the Cape; or if only one of them could be retained, the Cape in preference to Cochin.—Though Ceylon was an important settlement, Cochin, on the western side of the peninsula, was one of the strongest military frontiers in India. In the event of a war, a fleet might sail from the Cape and arrive at Cochin before any person in India could know of its arrival, and before any person in England could be apprized of its sailing.—He might possibly be told, that our merchantmen were advised to avoid the Cape; that the importance of that settlement was not so great as was represented; and that our ships might touch at the Brazils.—The settlement which the French had acquired in the Brazils, would, in that case, give additional importance to France. The Cape and Cochin were insisted on by Lord Malmesbury, at Lisle, as points from which we would not accede; and these were now given up, from that want of vigour, spirit, and prudence which mark our negotiations. An attempt had been made to represent the Levant trade as unimportant to this country. But our manufacturers, he conceived, would tell a far different tale. Was it true, that Malta was unimportant;—that fortress which had sustained a blockade of nearly two years:—It could not be seriously contended.—To rescue Malta and Egypt from France is deemed an object of primary importance; but when it is considered expedient to give them up, their importance suddenly vanishes, and they become trivial and insignificant. No part of the treaty of peace, nor any thing connected with it, excited so much astonishment in his mind, as our treatment of the house of Orange, except the defence of that treatment. Britain was formerly bound by a solemn treaty with that house. He understood some private arrangement was making, between France and Prussia, relative to that subject. But the Prince of Orange was not to be thrown as an outcast on the world, by those for whom he had sacrificed his all. Where would have been the difficulty in introducing an article in the preliminary treaty, similar to one which was prepared at the negotiation at Lisle, which stipulated for the restoration of the whole property of the House of Orange, or the full value of it in money. There could be no objection to this; but we wanted the spirit, the vigour, or courage to support an ally, who had been so unfortunate as to be an enemy to France!—Though he did not think the peace of 1763 was either glorious or honourable; yet he would recommend it to the gentlemen to read the preliminaries to that treaty, and compare them with the present. Let the cessions made then be compared with the cessions made now; and, though he thought the former a bad peace, which presented nothing but defeat and humiliation, yet would the latter be found infinitely worse in itself, and unfortunately more dangerous in its consequences. The present peace was not honourable, in respect of our allies; nor was it necessary to be made. Mr. Addington had indignantly disclaimed the plea of necessity. Although a difference of opinion existed as to the terms of the peace, no one would contend that we were reduced to the necessity of making a peace, dishonourable to our allies or unsafe to ourselves. He contrasted the terms of the peace of Utrecht, and of the peace of 1763, with those of the present peace; shewed the vast increase of power which France had acquired now, and the consequent increase of danger to ourselves. The noble lord had contended, that our danger did not accrue from the existence of republican principles in France, but from the extent of her power, that, in this respect, things had changed. Admitting such to be the case, could any man view the present power of France, and consequently, our present danger, without shuddering? In the event of a war, notwithstanding our stipulations, all the ports and fortresses in the Mediterranean would be seized by France, and shut against us. She will monopolize its commerce in time of peace, its power in time of war. Acting upon such a principle of negotiation, or rather of sacrifice, and let the definitive treaty be completed, and he would desire to know whether it would not place us in a state of war with France in twelve months? Could peace be good if its duration were so short? It would reduce us to the necessity of dismantling our navy, and of disbanding our army and our volunteers; it had deprived us of all the military points and stations; and, notwithstanding all our exertions of economy, what would be our state, if France, in the course of twelve months, should take us unprepared, and direct her whole power against us! He called upon the House to reflect seriously on our situation; and to ask themselves what state we should be placed in if France should so declare war against us? Did they not believe, that such a war must shake our country to the very center! Feeling, as he did, that the peace was neither honourable to our allies, nor safe to ourselves, he should give his decided negative to the motion.

LORD CASTLEREACH said, that upon a subject of such importance, he could not reconcile it to his feelings to give a silent vote; he would therefore, with the permission of the House, shortly state his reasons for concurring in the motion before the House. The first question that presented itself for the consideration of the House was, whether, taking every circumstance into consideration, it would be consistent with sound policy for England to have continued the war? He considered this war to have been entered into on the part of Great Britain purely for the purpose of defence, and though, in all respects, the war had not answered to our wishes, yet Great Britain had the honour of having acted, throughout the whole of this eventful contest, in the most disinterested manner: she had not only poured forth her blood and treasure in defence of her own independence and constitution, but she had offered to Europe the means of preservation. From causes which it was unnecessary to state, the confederacy of powers upon the continent was dissolved, and therefore it became necessary for Great Britain, either to carry on the war alone against France, or to make peace with that state, if it could be done upon terms consistent with the safety and independence of this country. In deciding upon the question of the safety of this country by the peace, it would be vain to deny that France had attained a degree of power, which could not but create uneasiness in the mind of every thinking man. It was absurd to contend that Great Britain, with a navy all-powerful as it was, could affect France upon the continent, unless assisted by a confederacy of continental states; we were therefore under the necessity, as he had before stated, of continuing the contest without the hope of making any serious impression upon France, or of concluding a peace upon fair and equitable terms—His lordship then entered, at considerable length, into an examination of the preliminaries, which he contended were as favourable as we could look for in the present state of Europe; and that by them Great Britain had not only maintained her own security, but had, with that generosity and good faith which always marked her conduct, stipulated for the integrity of her allies.

LORD TEMPLE could not help disapproving of the concessions which ministers had made, as dangerous to the safety, and degrading to the honour of England; no security having been retained to counterbalance the immense territorial acquisitions of France. He apprehended much from the exultation with which the tidings of peace seemed to have been received by the disaffected; their hopes appeared to revive; and a party of degenerate Englishmen, he saw with regret, was to be found, mean enough to drag the coach of General Lauriston, the bearer of these tidings, through the streets of London, with cries of "Long live Buonaparte!" It was an affliction prospect, and augured ill to the country: but it was in some degree encouraged by the conduct of ministers; for he understood it to be a fact—if not so he should wish it to be contradicted—that Citizen Lauriston was accompanied from France by a person who had been twice sent out of this country under the alien act; that on his arrival at Dover, this person being recognized by the proper officer in that port, he refused him permission to land; but Citizen Lauriston threatening if he did not he would return to Paris with the Preliminaries, the officer, afraid of taking the responsibility upon himself, suffered him to land and proceed to London, and he was actually in the coach with Citizen Lauriston, when dragged through the streets. His lordship added, that he was informed ministers had not the spirit to take notice of the exceptionable person alluded to—an unhappy omen of what this country had to expect from an intimate connexion with France, particularly under such ministers. He professed that he opposed them from no factious motive; he thought them undeserving the confidence of the country, and the preliminaries on the table convinced him they were. He was aware that he should not be seconded in his objections to the terms of the proposed peace, by those who were in the habit of opposing the conduct of administration; but he did not wish for their support. He who should declare his pleasure at the peace, "because it was glorious to the enemy," was not the connexion he would court; it was a sentiment which could not dignify the patriot or the Englishman—he should shrink from it with abhorrence; the man who employed it should be carefully avoided, and his principles guarded against. The peace which was supported upon such motives, must be hollow and suspicious.

MR. BANKS considered the question to be, whether the present treaty was better for the country, than a prolongation of the war. The terms, perhaps, may be considered, by moderate men, as good as could, under all the circumstances, be fairly expected. He would accept the hope which was held out to the nation. France had subdued all the alliances made against her on the continent, and we could have no further expectations from a confederacy. We could no longer expect any coalition which could materially preserve us from the continental powers. He could not conceive how those who disapproved of the terms proposed in the treaty at Lisle could condemn these. He could now entertain no hopes of any thing which could proceed from internal commotions in that country. It must not be forgotten, that our situation was so much worse since the year 1797, as we had since sustained all the hardships and expense of a state of warfare; we stood now in need, not of war, but of peace and tranquillity. Should we proceed in the war, we should make France realize the character given it, of a military nation. Suppose, for a moment, that we could obtain better terms; that we might, for instance, retain the Cape of Good Hope, and some of our other conquests, but he would ask, whether these were objects of sufficient magnitude to continue the war even for one month? He, for one, relied not on any terms of treaty, but on the vigour and nerve of the country to sustain itself in every situation. He wished for peace to be made in the spirit of peace; and wished the House seriously to consider, that suspicion on the one side could not fail of engendering distrust on the other.

Mr. PITT said, that upon a subject in itself of such importance and one upon which it was unfortunately his lot to differ from some with whom it had been his happiness to have been connected by the strictest ties of friendship, for the greater part of his life, he was anxious to deliver his sentiments before the attention of the House, and his own powers, should be exhausted by fatigue. In considering the question, whether these terms should be accepted or rejected, there was one proposition which he might lay down, with, he believed, but little danger of contradiction, and that was, that now for some time past, all rational, all thinking men, had concurred in an opinion, that whatever their wishes might have been, whatever hopes might at different periods of the war have been entertained, yet, that after the events which had taken place on the Continent of Europe, the question of Peace or War between Great Britain and France became a question of terms only [there was a cry of Hear! Hear! from the opposition benches]: in laying down this proposition, to which gentlemen seem to assent, he desired not to have it admitted in words, and rejected in substance. After the conclusion of the peace between France and the great continental powers, after the dissolution of the confederacy of the states of Europe, a confederacy which he had supported to the utmost of his power, and with respect to which he still retained the same sentiments; after the dissolution, however, of that confederacy, it became merely a question of the terms to be obtained for ourselves, and for those allies who still remained faithful to us, and to their own interests. In saying this, he was aware that he differed from many, of whose judgments he had the highest opinion, and whom he both loved and honored; but it was the firm conviction of his mind, and it was his duty both to the House and the public, fully and candidly to state his sentiments upon the subject. When he said, that the question of peace or war between this country and France, was a question of terms only, he wished to be understood as being more anxious about the general complexion of the peace, as affecting the character of this country for good faith, honour, and generosity, than he was about any particular acquisition that might be made, or any specific object that might be attained. In considering the terms that ought to be accepted, it would be necessary to inquire, in the first instance, what would be the expense of continuing the contest, what were the difficulties with which it would be attended, and what hopes could be entertained of its ultimate success. It was undoubtedly the duty of every government, in negotiating a treaty of Peace to obtain the best possible terms, but it was sometimes difficult to know how far particular points might be pressed without running the risque of breaking off the negotiation. For his own part he had no hesitation to declare that he would rather close with an enemy upon terms short even of the fair pretensions of the country, provided they were not inconsistent with the honour and security of the country, than continue the contest for any particular possession. He knew that when he had the honour of a seat in His Majesty's Councils, if it came to a question of terms, and if the pacific disposition of the enemy corresponded with ours, he for one should have acted upon that principle; and knowing that to be his own feeling upon the subject, he should neither act with fairness nor candour, if he did not apply it to another administration. He did not pretend to state to the House, that this peace fully answered all his wishes, but the government had undoubtedly endeavoured to obtain the best terms they could for the country; and he was ready to contend, that the difference between the terms we had obtained, and those of retaining all which we had given up, would not have justified Ministers in protracting the war. He was anxious upon this subject to speak plainly, because it was one on which he ought to have no reserve, either with the House or with the country. What the terms were to which this country ought to look in the present state of Europe, had been, in his opinion, most accurately and most ably described by his noble friend (Lord Hawkesbury). The principle upon which administration acted, and in which he perfectly concurred with them, was, that in selecting those acquisitions which we wished to retain, it was our interest not to aim so much at keeping possession of any fresh conquest which we did not materially want, but to endeavour rather to retain those acquisitions which, from their situation, or from other causes, were best calculated for confirming and securing our ancient territories. The object which must naturally first present itself to every Minister, must be to give additional vigour to our maritime strength, and security to our colonial possessions. It was to them

we were indebted for the unparalleled exertions which we had been enabled to make in the course of this long and eventful contest; it was by them that we were enabled, in the wreck of Europe, not only to effect our own security, but to hold out to our allies the means of safety, if they had been but true to themselves. In thus considering the subject, it was necessary to look to the leading quarters of the world in which we were to seek for this security. It was evident that our acquisitions were all in the Mediterranean, in the East and in the West Indies. Those who thought that this country ought to retain all its acquisitions, would of course consider any cession made by us as incompatible either with our safety or with our honour. But those who did not go that length, would agree with him in thinking, that when we were to give back a part, and retain a part of our conquests, it was our duty to consider which of them were the best calculated to promote the two great leading objects to which he had before alluded, and if it should appear upon examining the present treaty of peace, that in two out of the three quarters which he had mentioned, viz. in the East and West Indies, we had retained such possessions as were the best calculated to effect the security of our ancient possessions, we had, every circumstance considered, done as much as could be expected. Without under-valuing our conquests in the Mediterranean, and the gallant achievements by which they had been effected, especially the capture of Malta, and certainly no man was less inclined to undervalue them than he was; yet it must be admitted by every man acquainted with the real interest of this country, that compared with the East and West Indies, the Mediterranean is but a secondary consideration; indeed, this was a proposition so obvious, that it was unnecessary for him to enter into any arguments upon the subject. Of the importance of the Levant Trade, much had formerly been said, volumes had been written upon it, and even nations had gone to war to obtain it: the value of that trade, even in the periods to which he had alluded, had been much exaggerated; but even suppose these statements to have been correct, they applied to times when the other great branches of our trade, to which we owe our present greatness and our naval superiority, did not exist; he alluded to the great increase of our manufactures—to our great internal trade—to our commerce with Ireland, with the United States of America, with the East and West Indies; it was these which formed the sinews of our strength, and compared with which the Levant trade was trifling. In another point of view, he admitted the possessions in the Mediterranean were of importance to enable us to co-operate with any continental power or powers, with whom we might happen to be in alliance. He agreed with his noble friend (Lord Castlereagh), that when there was not a powerful confederacy on the continent in our favour, this country, with all its naval superiority, could not make any very serious efforts on the Continent; but in the case of such a confederacy, much undoubtedly would be done by the co-operation of the British navy in the Mediterranean. But at the present moment, and situated as Europe at present is, we ought not, upon any one principle of wisdom or policy, to prefer acquisitions in the Mediterranean to the attainment of the means of giving additional security to our possessions in the East and West Indies. It was upon this principle that he heartily approved of the choice which Ministers had made, in preferring our security in the West Indies to any acquisitions we might have made in the Mediterranean; because he considered it as a rule of prudence which ought never to be deviated from, not unnecessarily to mortify the feelings or pride of an enemy—[There was a cry of 'Hear! Hear!' from the Opposition].—Gentlemen, from their manner, seemed to think he had not always adhered to that maxim; he would not interrupt his argument by entering into a personal defence of himself, but whenever gentlemen were inclined to discuss that point, he was perfectly ready to meet them, giving them the full benefit of any expressions he had ever used.—Supposing the events of the war to be equally balanced, and in negotiating for one of two possessions, both of equal value, but that our possessing one of them would hurt the feelings, or mortify the pride of the enemy more than the other, he should think that a justifiable reason for selecting the other: he did not say this from any affectation of sentiment, or peculiar tenderness towards the enemy, but because an enemy would not give up such a possession without obtaining from us more than an equivalent. Upon this principle, he hoped the House would concur with him in thinking, that we ought not to insist upon retaining the Island of Malta. If our object had been to retain any possession which had formerly belonged to the enemy, and which we had captured from them, with the view of adding to the security of our old dominions, then Malta did not come under the description, because it was not an ancient possession of the enemy, but had been acquired by him, unjustly, from a third power. It therefore appeared to him more consistent with wisdom and sound policy, rather to put Malta under the protection of a third power, capable of protecting it, than by retaining it ourselves, to mortify the pride and attract the jealousy of the enemy. The other possession which we had acquired, and upon the propriety of retaining which much had been said, was Minorca. With respect to this island, he perfectly concurred in the opinion of his noble friend (Lord Hawkesbury), that it would always belong to the power who possessed the greatest maritime strength; the experience of the four last wars proved the justice of this observation, for Minorca had regularly shifted hands according to the preponderance of maritime strength in the Mediterranean.—In time of peace, Minorca was a possession of no great importance or utility; in time of war, it could be of no use whatever, unless we possessed a maritime superiority; and if we did possess that superiority, experience had shewn, that it would probably fall into our hands. Upon these grounds he, for one, would not have advised much to be given in another quarter for the purpose of enabling us to retain the island of Minorca; doubting, as he did, whether in time of peace, it was worth the expense of a garrison. He thought, therefore, that we were justified in looking to the East and West Indies for the possessions which it was our interest to retain, but he could not help expressing his regret, that circumstances were such as to prevent us from retaining a place as important in many points of view as the Island of Malta; he lamented also, that it was not possible for us to have made a more definitive arrangement respecting its future fate; but unless we had been prepared to say that we would retain it ourselves, he did not know any better plan that could be adopted, than to make it independant both of England and France. In turning his attention to the East Indies, he certtrinly saw cause for regret, because the opinion he had been taught to entertain of the value of the Cape of Good Hope was much higher than that expressed by his noble friend. He knew there were great authorities against him; but on the other hand, from what he heard from a noble Marquis (Cornwallis), and from a Right Hon. friend of his, who had long presided over the affairs of India, he was induced to think the Cape of Good Hope a more important place than it had been represented on this occasion. But thinking thus highly as he did of the Cape, he considered it as far inferior indeed to Ceylon, which he looked upon to be of all the places on the face of the globe, the one which will add most to the security of our East India possessions, and as placing our dominions in that quarter in a greater degree of safety than they had been from the first hour that we set our foot on the continent of India. An Hon. Friend of his on the other side of the House (Mr. T. Grenville), had lamented that we had not stipulated for the retention of Cochin, and stated, that in the former negotiations, Lord Malmesbury had been instructed to insist upon its remaining in our possession. How far Lord Malmesbury was instructed to insist upon, or recede from certain points contained in that projet, he did not feel himself now at liberty to state, but he believed no man would be inclined to say, that it must of necessity be an ultimatum, because it was contained in a projet. Indeed, one of the complaints which we had made against the French upon that occasion, was, that they wanted us, contrary to every diplomatic form, to give in our ultimatum first. He knew that it was the opinion, at that time, of a noble Marquis, to whom he had before alluded (and who had rendered such essential services in India; but he was wrong in particularizing India, for there was scarce a quarter of the globe in which this country had not derived important advantages from the exalted talents and virtues of that noble person who was now about to receive the last reward of his services, in putting the finishing hand to a treaty which would give peace to the world after a war in which he had had so large a share in averting from this country the dangers which threatened the most vulnerable part of our possessions), that the retaining of Cochin was necessary to the security of our Indian dominions. But the noble Marquis, he was sure, did not now retain the same opinion, because its importance then depended upon its being a frontier post, to secure us from an enemy whom we had since completely destroyed. It would not surely be contended for a moment that the power of Tippoo Sultan was entire, and when there was a direct road from his dominions into ours, that Cochin was not of infinitely more importance than it could be now when his dominions were in our possession. He did not wish to give a ludicrous illustration of this argument; but he was really so much astonished at what had been said upon this point, that he could not help stating a case which appeared to him directly in point with the present. If we were to look into the ancient periods of our history, when Scotland was a separate kingdom, hostile to us, and in strict alliance with France, the town of Berwick upon Tweed was a place of the greatest importance to us as a fortified frontier post; but surely it could not be said to be of equal importance now, when Scotland and England were united into one kingdom. This parallel did not appear to him to be exaggerated; and if Cochin was of no importance as a military post, he was inclined to think that its commercial value was not very great. As to the advantages we must derive from the possession of Ceylon, it was unnecessary for him to enlarge upon them—they were too obvious not to be felt by every body. With regard to the Cape, he before stated his opinion of its value; but if we could not retain it without continuing the war, he thought Ministers had acted wisely in giving it up, upon the terms they had, because, in point of value, it was inferior to Ceylon and Trinidad. He now came to the consideration of our situation in the West Indies, and he was decidedly of opinion, that of all the islands which the fortune of war had put into our hands in that quarter, Trinidad was the most valuable—he should prefer it even to Martinico!!!—undoubtedly, as a protection to our Leeward Islands, it was the better of the two; but in point of intrinsic value, Trinidad was the more important. As to its value as a post from which we might direct our future operations against the possessions of Spain in South America, it must be felt by every one to be the best situated of any part in the West-Indies. He had always been of opinion that it came to be a question merely of terms between England and France, that we ought to retain the possession of one of the great naval stations in the West-Indies, because our great want in that quarter was a naval port. The four great naval stations were Guadaloupe, Martinico, St. Lucia, and Trinidad; and of those Trinidad and Martinico were the best, and the former the better of the two!!!—He would now trouble the House shortly upon the subject of our allies. With respect to the Porte, we had done every thing we were bound to do—nay, more—we had compelled the French to the evacuation of Egypt, and had stipulated for the integrity of her dominions. There was another object which we had obtained, and to which he did not think as much importance had been given as it deserved.—He meant the establishment of an infant power, viz. the Republic of the Seven Islands, which would perhaps have otherwise fallen under the dominion of France: this certainly was an acquisition of great importance for this country, not inferior perhaps to the POSSESSION OF MALTA ITSELF !!

The only answer he had heard upon this subject was, that there had been a treaty concluded between France and the Porte, by which the evacuation of Egypt was stipulated for; but it could not be for a moment doubted that it was to the exertions of this country, and to the brilliant achievements of our army and navy, that the evacuation of Egypt must be attributed; and if France had by a diplomatic trick taken the advantage of this in two treaties, that could not derogate from the merit of this country. With regard to Naples, we were not bound to do any thing for her. She had even desired to be released from her engagements to us, but she was compelled to do this by an overruling necessity, and the government of this country, in its conduct towards Naples, had not only acted in conformity to its own interest, and that upon large and liberal grounds, in endeavouring to repair the fortunes of an ally, who had given way only to force. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Grenville) had argued, that we ought to have guaranteed to Naples her dominions, because, from the contiguity of the Cisalpine Republic to Naples, the French may, in pursuance of the treaty, evacuate their territories one day and re-enter them the next; but if, from the situation of Europe, the present stipulation could not effect the security of Naples, it must be obvious, that any guarantee would be equally unavailing. With regard to Sardinia, the same observations were applicable, for we were not bound to interfere for her, unless it was to be maintained that we were to take upon ourselves the task of settling the affairs of the continent. But if we were unable to settle the affairs of that part of the continent, which was in our own neighbourhood, with what effect or propriety could we attempt it in Italy? He was ready to grant we ought to have claimed Piedmont for its sovereign, but could we have obtained it? Could we have procured its restoration unless we could have disposed of the king of Etruria, unless we could have the Cisalpine and Ligurian Republics, and driven the French from the mountains of Switzerland:—Unless we could have done all this, it would have been in vain to restore the king of Sardinia to his capital, surrounded as he would have been by the French, and by their dependent and affiliated republics.—As to Portugal, every body must lament her misfortunes. But if it was right in her to ask to be released from her engagements to us, and if it was right in us to consent to it, then clearly we were absolved from any obligation to her, because an obligation which is put an end to on the one side, can, upon no fair reasoning, be said to continue on the other. As to the cession of Olivenza, it certainly was not of any great importance; but much had been said about the territory which France had obtained from Portugal in South America, and a considerable degree of geographical knowledge had been displayed in tracing the course of rivers; but gentlemen should recollect, that a South American and an European river were materially different, for when you were talking of the banks of a river in South America, it was in fact very often little less than the coasts of an ocean. It had been said, “You affect to guarantee the integrity of Portugal, but it is only after France and Spain have taken every thing they wished for.” But this again was not correct. The treaty of Badajos certainly did not give to France all she desired, because France, by a subsequent treaty, extorts another cession of still greater importance to her. What happens then? Portugal has given up this second portion of her territory by force, when you interfere and cancel the second treaty, and bring them back to the stipulations in the first. To you, then, Portugal owes this difference in the limits of her South American empire, and to her you have acted not only with good faith, but with dignified liberality. The only remaining ally was the Prince of Orange; from our ancient connexions, from our gratitude for the services of the House of Orange at the period of the revolution, from his connexion with our sovereign, we could not but take a lively interest in his fate, and we had shewn it by our conduct; he was not to be told of the guarantee of the constitution of Holland, without re-calling to the recollection of the House, the efforts we had made to defend, the unparalleled exertions we had made to restore him to his dominions. Even on the present occasion his interests had not been neglected; we did interfere for him, and we were told that his interests were at that time the subject of negotiation, and that he would receive an indemnity. Even if we were to take that upon ourselves, it ought not to stand in the way of a great national arrangement. Thus stood the case with regard to our acquisitions and to our allies. But it has been said, that we ought to have obtained more; that we ought to have obtained something to balance the great increase of power which France had obtained—that we have given France the means of increasing her maritime strength, and, in short, that we have signed the death-warrant of the country. Now, in the first place, if we had retained all our conquests, it would not have made any difference to us in point of security. He did not mean to say, he would not have retained them all if he could, but they were no more important, than they would give us a little more or a little less of colonial power, and only tended to promote our security by increasing our finance. But would the acquisition of all these islands have enabled us to counterbalance the power which France has acquired on the Continent, they would only give you a little more wealth; but a little more wealth would be badly purchased by a little more war; he should think so, even if we could be sure that one year's more war would give it to us; particularly when it was recollected how many years we had now been engaged in this contest. In speaking however about our resources, he would take upon himself to state (and he hoped the House would give him credit for some knowledge upon the subject), that if any case of necessity should arise, or if our honour should require another contest, we were far, very far indeed, from the end of our pecuniary resources, which, he was happy to say, were greater than the enemy, or even the people of this country themselves had an idea of. For the purpose of defence, or for the security of our honour, we have still resources in abundance, but they ought to be kept for these purposes, and not lavished away in continuing a contest, with the certainty of enormous expense. You might sit down in a worse relative situation than you are at present, your object not obtained, your security not effected. —As to the general point, we could not now think of balancing the powers on the Continent; it was undoubtedly right, that if the French had conquered much, we ought also to endeavour to retain much; but in treating with France, we were not to consider what France had got from other countries, but what was the relative situation between us and France. Gentlemen had talked of the uti possidetis, but France had not insisted upon that principle in her treaties with the powers on the continent;—she had not retained the possession of all she had conquered, and consequently we could be justified in insisting upon that principle. He admitted, that if a country had increased in power and territory, faster than its natural rival, for, without speaking hastily, he must consider France in that character, that might justify the engaging in a confederacy to bring him back to his ancient strength; but if he had been able to dissolve that confederacy, that would, perhaps, be the worst reason in the world why, when we came to make peace with him, we were to expect the more favourable terms. It would be but bad reasoning if one power was to say to another, you are much too powerful for us, we have not the means of reducing that power by force, and therefore you must cede to us a portion of your territories in order to make us equal in point of strength. Gentlemen might undoubtedly wish this, but that which regulated wishes would not regulate action, many things might be prayed for, but were hardly to be expected. But he did not see that we were giving to the enemy all this colonial wealth and maritime power which had been represented; what you give back is not only smaller than what you retain, but much of it is in a ruined state. He was therefore inclined to think, that for many years at least, we should have the colonial trade, and that too increasing in extent and value.—That we should not have been justified in asking for more he did not mean to assert, but that we should have got more, or that we ought to have continued the war to increase our possessions, was a proposition to which he could not give his assent. Allusions had been made to former opinions and language; upon this subject he should only say, that peace having been restored between England and France, forbearance of language, and terms of respect, were proper, but it would be affectation and hypocrisy in him to say he had or could change his opinion of the character of the person presiding in France, until he saw a train of conduct which would justify that change. He would not now occupy the attention of the House by entering into a discussion of the origin of the war; the unjust aggression which was made upon us was established by recent evidence, but it was unnecessary to enter into it now, because upon that subject the opinion of the House and of the country was fixed. The great object of the war on our part was defence for ourselves and for the rest of the world, in a war waged against most of the nations of Europe, but against us with particular malignity. Security was our great object; there were different means of accomplishing it with better or worse prospects of success, and according to the different variations of policy occasioned by a change of circumstances, we still pursued our great object, security. In order to obtain it, we certainly did look for the subversion of that government which was founded upon revolutionary principles. We never at any one period said, that as a sine qua non we insisted upon the restoration of the old government of France,—we only said, there was no government with which we could treat: this was our language up to 1796; but in no one instance did we ever insist upon restoring the monarchy, though, he did not hesitate to acknowledge, that it would have been more consistent with the wishes of ministers, and with the interest and security of this country. He was equally ready to confess, that he had given up his hopes with the greatest reluctance, and he should, to his dying day, lament that there were not, on the part of the other powers of Europe, efforts corresponding to our own for the accomplishment of that great work. There were periods during the continuance of the war in which they had hopes of being able to put together the scattered fragments of that great and venerable edifice; to have restored the exiled nobility of France, to have restored a government, certainly not free from defects, but built upon sober and regular foundations, instead of that mad system of innovation which threatened, and nearly accomplished the destruction of Europe.—When this became unattainable he gave up his hopes, but we had the satisfaction of knowing, that we had survived the violence of the revolutionary fever, that we had seen the extent of its principles abated.—We had seen Jacobinism deprived of its fascination; we had seen it stripped of the name and pretext of liberty; it had shewn itself to be capable only of destroying, not of building, and that it must necessarily end in a military despotism; he trusted this important lesson would not be thrown away upon the world.—There were times during the war in which government hoped to be able to drive France within her ancient limits, and even to make barriers against her further incursions; but in this they were disappointed; it became then necessary, with the change of circumstances, to change our objects, for he did not know a more fatal error than to look only at one object, and obstinately to pursue it, when the hope of accomplishing it no longer remained. If it became impossible for us to attain the full object of our wishes, wisdom and policy both required that we should endeavour to obtain that which was next best. In saying this, he was not sensible of inconsistency, either in his former language or conduct, in refusing to treat with the person who now holds the destinies of France, because, when he formerly declined treating with him, he then said, that if events took the turn they had since done, he had no objection to treat with him. He would now add, but very little more to what he had said.—He could not agree with those gentlemen who seemed to think that France had grown so much stronger in proportion to what we had, and these gloomy apprehensions seemed to him to be almost wholly without foundation. This country always was, and he trusted always would be, able to check the ambitious projects of France, and to give that degree of assistance to the rest of Europe which they had done upon this occasion, and he wished it had been done with more effect. But when the immense acquisitions which France had made were taken into consideration on the one hand, it was but fair on the other, to consider what she had lost in population, in commerce, in capital, and in habits of industry; the desolation produced by convulsions such as France had undergone, could not be repaired even by large acquisitions of territory. Comparing therefore what France has gained with what she has lost, this enormous increase of power was not quite so apparent as some gentlemen on the other side seemed to apprehend. When he took into consideration the immense wealth of this country, and the natural and legitimate growth of that wealth, so much superior to the produce of rapacity and plunder, he could not but entertain the hope, founded in justice and in nature, of its solidity. This hope was strengthened by collateral considerations, when he looked to the great increase of our maritime power, when he contemplated the additional naval triumphs we had obtained, when he looked to the brilliant victories of our armies obtained over the flower of the troops of France, troops which, in the opinion of many, were invincible—when he reflected upon these glorious achievements, though he could not but lament our disappointment in some objects, he had the satisfaction of thinking that we had added strength to our security, and lustre to our national character. Since the treaty which had taken place at Lisle, we had increased in wealth and commerce. But there were two important events which had given the greatest consolidation to our strength, he alluded to the destruction of the power of Tippoo Sultan in India, who had fallen a victim to his attachment to France and his perfidy to us. It had frequently been observed, that great dangers frequently produced in nations of a manly cast of mind, great and noble exertions. So when the most unparalleled danger threatened the sister kingdom, the feelings of a common cause between the people of both countries had enabled them to overcome prejudices, some of them perhaps laudable, and all of them deep-rooted, and led to that happy union, which adds more to the power and strength of the British Empire, than all the conquests of one and indivisible France! These were consolations which he wished to recall to the recollection of those who entertained gloomy apprehensions about the strength and resources of Great Britain. If any additional proofs were wanting to prove her ability, to protect her honour, and maintain her interest, let gentlemen look to the last campaign, and they would see Great Britain contending against a powerful confederacy in the North; they would see her fighting for those objects at once, in Egypt and in the Baltic, and they would see her successful in both. We had shewn, that we were ready to meet the threatened invasion at home, and could send troops to triumph over the French in the barren sands of Egypt, before a man could escape from Toulon to reinforce their blocked up army.—We had met the menaced invasion by attacking France on her own coasts; and we had seen those ships which were destined for the invasion of this country, moored and chained to their coasts, and finding protection only in their batteries. These were not only sources of justifiable pride, but grounds of old security. Whatever might be the future object of the Chief Consul of France, he knew not, but if it was to exercise a military despotism, he would venture to predict, that he would not select this country for the first object of his attack; and if we were true to ourselves, we had little to fear from that attack, let it come when it would. But though he did not entertain apprehensions, yet he could not concur with those who thought we ought to lay aside all caution; if such policy were adopted, there would indeed be grounds for most serious apprehensions; he hoped every measure would be adopted which prudence could suggest, to do away animosity between the two countries, and to avoid every ground of irritation by sincerity on our part. This, however, on the other hand was not to be done by paying abject court to France. We must depend for our security only upon ourselves; but if the views of France corresponded with our own, we had every prospect of enjoying a long peace. He saw some symptoms that they were, but upon this he had no certain knowledge; but he would never rely upon personal character for the security of his country. He was inclined to hope every thing that was good, but he was bound to act as if he feared otherwise. He concluded by giving assent to the motion.

MR. FOX began by saying, that he never gave his vote with more heart-felt pleasure than he should give it to night. He adverted shortly to the manner in which the mover and the ministers had spoken of the peace, and confessed, that if the word honourable had been introduced, he should not have declined assenting to the motion on that account.

What pressure upon France could have made her consent to better terms? The noble lord had said, with great accuracy, and it was that part of his speech which he admired the most, that with respect to the unsatisfactory state of the continent, nothing gave him much hope of mending it. It might be true that France could not hurt this country. Not hurt it! The invasion of Great Britain he had always treated as chimerical, but there were many other points which he should not now discuss. Yet was any man so fond of the union, so wildly satisfied with the measures that had been adopted, that he would say the danger arising from the French being in Ireland would not be greater, than would be the danger arising from the English being in France? The only question then was, whether by pressure of war, we could prevail upon France to cede Malta and the Cape? Could we prevail upon her by pressure upon her colonies? that had been already done. By pressure upon the territory of France? that was absurd. By pressure upon her finances? Here he could not help admiring ministers for not introducing into the discussion that jargon of the ruin of the French finances; of their being in the jaws and gulph of bankruptcy. They had too much good sense to do it. He came now to the question, whether the war should be continued, or whether these terms should be accepted? A noble lord, who sat on the same side with him, had talked of the peace, as a capitulation of our safety, but yet he discovered that that noble lord begged to be understood as not preferring another year of war to this complete surrender. These expressions, therefore, he could not help considering as little more than oratorical exaggeration. For his own part he had believed himself to be the last person who could bear the thought of another year of war; yet he found now that he was really warlike, compared with that noble lord. Though he could not, however, go so far as he did, yet, still, he could not contemplate another year of war, without dread and horror. He would ask gentlemen, what had been the state of the poor for two years? What had been seen in every parish? Each poor man forced to depend upon alms and charity. Charity did he call it? One of the worst parts of the present times was, that charity lost its nature; that the necessity was irresistible; the industrious and dissolute were forced to be relieved in the same manner. Should he be told that this was not connected with the war? Have not the events of this year, proved that connexion? There had been an abundant harvest, which he knew had produced a reduction in the price of grain, and also, but not in so great a degree, in the price of other provisions. But before the peace they had begun to rise again, probably because the fall had been too great. But as soon as peace came, the fall had been greater than it had been before.—Could any man doubt, under such circumstances, that it was better for the people to eat than that we should possess the Cape, or even Malta? He would now ask gentlemen, whether they ever remembered an event that had occasioned such general and unfeigned joy? But, perhaps, he should be told, that that joy was greater among the lower classes.—Be it so. It then proves, that plenty in their minds was connected with peace. Mr. Fox now alluded to the preliminaries as they related to France; he said that if the object of the war was to restore the ancient, accursed despotism of France, it would be an additional recommendation of the peace that the war had failed of attaining that object. He took a view of the consequences that would have been produced upon Europe, had the coalition for the restoration of the Bourbon family succeeded. The consequences would have been, a perpetual guarantee amongst all kings, against all people who might be oppressed by them in any part of the world. He entered next into an historical view of the effects that such a guarantee would have produced in the time of Charles the First, and at the period of the revolution; he expressed a difference of opinion with Lord Hawkesbury upon the earlier periods of the war, and upon the causes of it. He contended that such terms as had been obtained might have been obtained at a much earlier period; he took a view of the different negotiations that had been entered into with France, in each of which negotiations we might have obtained as good, if not better terms. When the last offer to treat was made by Buonaparté, in 1800, we were told to pause. We had paused from 1800 to Oct. 1801, and this pause had cost us 70 millions, five times as much as all the Duke of Marlborough's campaigns. Mr. Fox proceeded now to charge the old administration with being the cause of the aggrandisement of France. He expressed a belief that the present government of France would be less hostile to this country than the old, and he argued against the idea of our commerce being injured by the rivalry of the French. As to the union with Ireland, he did not wish now to enter into the merits of it; time would best shew whether it was likely to strengthen the connection between both countries. He had heard of a mixture of delicacy and firmness in the government of Ireland. He would be glad to know what delicacy there was in the burnings and massacres? The noble lord had been incautious in the selection of his words, he had spoken of indulgencies to be granted to the people in consequence of the peace. Was the substitution of common law for martial law, or the constitution of the Habeas Corpus to be considered as an indulgence? He for one should not receive these much wished for measures as indulgencies, but as rights. He concluded with saying, that he could not help lamenting that the peace had not been made earlier. A better peace might certainly have been had seven years since.

Mr. ADDINGTON observed, that after the able arguments that had been advanced in favour of the question, it was difficult to find any topics that had not before been alluded to. It had always appeared to him, as well as to many others, that the duty of negotiation commenced when all hopes of continental aid in checking the power of France were at an end. His predecessors had been of this opinion, and had twice sought a negotiation, though their efforts had been unsuccessful. As soon, therefore, as His Majesty had been graciously pleased to deliver the authority of the country into the hands of the present ministers, they had thought it necessary to follow the same example.—They had commenced a negotiation, and their efforts had been crowned with success. A comparison had been made between the terms which were proposed at Lisle, and those which had now been agreed upon; but it should be recollected, that since the negotiation at Lisle, the national debt of this country had increased no less than an hundred and fifty millions. At that negotiation it was proposed to restore to France and her allies all that had been taken from them, a measure that must have been more dangerous to us at that time than it could be at present, because Tippoo Sultan was then in force, and in connexion with France. In the Mediterranean, we did not then stipulate for the establishment of the republic of the Seven Islands, which now form a barrier to Turkey on the Eastern side. In the West Indies we were in possession of Cape Nicola Mole and Jeremie, in addition to our other conquests; them we agreed to give up, keeping only the Cape and Trinidad. Upon the whole, he was decidedly of opinion, that the terms now obtained, were more favourable for the country than those proposed at Lisle. He then entered into an examination of the present articles, which he contended were calculated very much to effect the security of our Eastern and Western possessions. To those who wished to continue the war for the purpose of reducing the power of France, he wished to state, that another campaign could not be made at a less expense than forty millions, and a perpetual annuity (except for the operation of the sinking fund) of two millions per annum, in addition to their other burthens. Even certain success would not have been worth such a price ! ! ! ! ! He perfectly concurred with his noble friend in thinking that we ought to watch with care any tendency to increase the colonial system of this country. He was by no means satisfied of the wisdom of those whose object seemed to be to prevent France from becoming a commercial power; he wished to see France possessed of commerce, he wished to see her possessed of interests which would make her conscious of our maritime power. He wished to see her possessed of interests which, in the case of an unfortunate rupture, we might have the means of attacking. A right hon. friend of his used to say, that in this contest we had gained all which we had not lost, but in concluding this treaty we had acted with the greatest honour and good faith to our allies; we had preserved all our ancient dominions, and had made important acquisitions both in the East and in the West. Independent of all this, an arrangement had been made with the powers of the north, by which our rights had been fully recognized and secured; and finally, that great and most beneficial measure, the union with Ireland, had been carried into effect.... We had closed the contest with consolidated power AND WITH AUGMENTED MEANS, which he was convinced would make the power of this country equal to that of France. He was ready, however, to acknowledge, that it depended upon the wisdom of government and of that House, whether this peace should be a curse or a blessing. On the part of the King's present ministers, he could only say, that the peace which had been made honestly, should be kept faithfully. No encouragement should be given to any person, whatever their character might be, to subvert the present government of France. It would require the utmost caution to accomplish all the objects which they had in view, they must adopt a conduct of caution, of prudence, and of jealousy. And he was bound in candour and fairness to state, that it would be necessary to provide new means of security, such as were never before known in time of peace. If he were asked whether this was founded upon a suspicion of the sincerity of the enemy, he would answer, No; but he could not look upon the Map of Europe, without being convinced that such was the conduct which their duty prescribed to them. The system to be adopted must be one plainly directed to the security of the country; not calculated to promote patronage or to excite jealousies. He flattered himself that when the subject came to be investigated, it would not be found difficult to adopt a system of defence which would be found fully adequate to the security of the country. He could not help expressing, upon this occasion, his sense of the danger to which this country would be exposed if proper measures were not adapted for its security. There were many other points necessary to be provided for, but which it was unnecessary to enter into at present; nor would he now have troubled the House with his sentiments, but for the imputation which had been thrown out against him for keeping an improper silence.

The address was carried without a division.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

SIR EDMUND HARTOP brought up the address*.

MR. HENRY LASCELLES said, that having constantly given his vote for the continuance of the war, he would briefly state his reasons why he voted in favour of the peace.

MR. WINDHAM, † Sir, In the present stage of this business, and in a house so little numerous, I am not disposed to take up the subject in the way in which I should have wished to consider it, had I been able with tolerable satisfaction to myself, to deliver my sentiments in the debate of last night. Something, however, I wish to say, founded in a great measure on what then took place.—All that I heard, and all that I saw, on that occasion, tends only to confirm more and more the deep despair in which I am plunged, in contemplating the probable consequences of the present treaty.—Notwithstanding some lofty talk which we heard of dignity and firmness, and which I shall be glad to see realized, and a happy quotation, expressive of the same sentiments, from my honourable friend not now present (Mr. Pitt), the real amount of what was said, seems to be little more than this:—that France has, to be sure, the power of destroying us, but that we hope she will not have the inclination;—that we are under the paw of the lion, but that he may happen not to be hungry, and, instead of making a meal of us, may turn round in his den, and go to sleep.—This is not stated in so many words: but it will be difficult to shew, that it is not the fair result of the arguments.—That I should have lived to see the day, when such arguments could be used in a British House of Commons!—that I should have lived to see a House of Commons, where such arguments could be heard with patience, and even with complacency!—The substance of the statement is this. We make peace, not from any necessity actually existing, (my honourable friends, with great propriety, reject that supposition)†, but because we foresee a period, at no great distance, when such a necessity must arise; and we think it right, that provision for such a case should be made in time.—We treat, or, to take at once the more appropriate term, we capitulate, while we have yet some ammunition left. General Menou could do no more. General Menou could do no more in one sense; but in another he did, I fear a great deal more:—a point to which I must say a word hereafter;—he did not abandon to their fate those whom he had invited to follow his fortunes, and to look up to him as their protector. Both, however, capitulated; and upon the plain and ordinary grounds of such a proceeding, namely, that their means of resistance must soon come to an end, and that they had no such hopes of any fortunate turn in their favour, as to justify a continuance of their resistance in the mean time. The conduct of both in the circumstances supposed, was perfectly rational: but let us recollect, that those who stand in such circumstances, be they generals, or be they nations, are, to all intents and purposes conquered! I know not what other definition we want of being conquered, than that a country can say to us, “we can hold out, and you cannot; “make peace, or we will ruin you.” and that you, in consequence, make peace, upon terms which must render a renewal of hostilities, under any provocation, more certainly fatal than a continuation of that war, which you already declare yourselves unable to bear.—If such be the fact, we may amuse ourselves with talking what language we please; but we are a conquered people. Buonaparté is as much our master, as he is of Spain or Prussia, or any other of those countries, which, though still permitted to call themselves independent, are, as every body knows, as completely in his power, as if the name of department was already written upon their foreheads.—There are but two questions,—Is the relation between the countries such, that France can ruin us by continuing the war? and will that relation in substance remain the same, or rather will it not be rendered infinitely worse, by peace, upon the terms now proposed?—If both these questions are answered in the affirmative, the whole is decided, and we live henceforward by sufferance from France.—Sir, before we endeavour to estimate our prospects in this new and honourable state of existence, I wish to consider for a moment, what the reasonings are, that have determined our choice, as to the particular mode of it; and why we think that ruin by war must be so much more speedy and certain, than ruin by peace. And here I will take pretty much the statement given by the honourable gentlemen who argue on the other side.—I agree, that the question is not, whether this peace be good or bad, honourable or dishonourable, adequate or inadequate; whether it places us in a situation better or worse, than we had reason to expect, or than we were in before the war. All these are parts of the question, and many of them very material parts; but the question itself is, whether the peace now proposed, such as it is, be better, or not, than a continuation of hostilities?—Whether, according to a familiar mode of speech, we may not go farther and fare worse?—Whether, to take the same form in a manner somewhat more developed and correct, the chances of faring better, compared with the chances of faring worse, and including the certainty of the intermediate evils, do not render it advisable upon the whole, that we should rest contented where we are.—This I take to be the statement of the question, on the present, and on all similar occasions: nor do I know of any addition necessary to be made, except to observe, that in estimating the terms of peace in the manner here proposed, you are not merely to consider the physical force, or pecuniary value, of the objects concerned, but also the effect which peace, made in such and such circumstances, is likely to have on the character and estimation of the country; a species of possession, which, though neither tangible nor visible, is as much a part of national strength, and has as real a value, as any thing that can be turned into pounds and shillings, that can be sold by the score or hundred, or weighed out in avoirdupoise. Accordingly a statesman, acting for a great country, may very well be in the situation of saying,—I would make peace at this time, if nothing more were in question, than the value of the objects now offered me, compared with those which I may hope to obtain: but when I consider what the effect is, which peace, made in the present circumstances, will have upon the estimation of the country; what the weakness is which it will betray; what the suspicions it will excite; what the distrust and alienation it will produce, in the minds of all the surrounding nations; how it will lower us in their eyes; how it will teach them universally to fly from connexion with a country, which neither protects its friends, nor seems any longer capable of protecting itself, in order to turn to those, who, while their vengeance is terrible, will not suffer a hair of the head to be touched, of any who will put themselves under their protection:—when I consider these consequences, not less real, or permanent, or extensive, than those which present themselves in the shape of territorial strength or commercial resources, I must reject these terms, which otherwise I should feel disposed to accept, and say, that, putting character into the scale, the inclination of the balance is decidedly the other way.—Sir, there is in all this nothing new or refined, or more than will be admitted by every one in words; though there seems so little disposition to adhere to it in fact.—If we refer to the practice of only our own time, what was the case of the Falkland Islands and Nootka? Was it the value of these objects, that we were going to war for? The one was a barren rock, an object of competition for nothing but seals and seagulls; the other a point of land in a wilderness, where some obscure, though spirited, adventurers had hoped that they might in time establish a trade with the savages for furs. Were these, objects to involve nations in wars? If there was a question of their doing so, it was because considerations of a far different kind were attached to them,—considerations of national honour and dignity; between which and the objects themselves, there may often be no more proportion, than between the picture of a great master, and the canvas on which it is painted.—If I wished for authorities upon such a subject, I need go no further than to the honourable gentleman, [Mr. Fox,] who has recurred to a sentiment, produced by him formerly with something of paradoxical exaggeration, (though true in the main), namely, that wars for points of honour, are really the only rational and prudential wars in which a country can engage. Much of the same sort is the sentiment of another popular teacher, JUNIUS, who, upon the subject of these very Falkland Islands, says, in terms which it may be worth while to quote, not for the merit of the language, nor the authority of the writer,—though neither of them without their value,—but to show, what were once the feelings of Englishmen, and what the topics chosen by a writer, whose object it was to recommend himself to the people: “To depart, “in the minutest article, from the nicety, and “strictness of punctilio, is as dangerous to national honour, as it is to female virtue. The “woman who admits of one familiarity, seldom “knows where to stop, or what to refuse; and “when the counsels of a great country give way “in a single instance, when they are once inclined to submission, every step accelerates the “rapidity of their descent!”—We are not therefore, according to the present fashion, to fall to calculating, and to ask ourselves, what is the value at market of such and such an object, and how much it will cost us to obtain it. If these objects alone were at stake, I should admit the principle in its full force; and should be among the first to declare, that no object of mere pecuniary value could ever be worth obtaining at the price of a war: but when particular points of honour are at stake, as at Nootka or the Falkland Islands (without inquiring, whether in those cases the point of honour was either well chosen, or rightly estimated); and still more, where general impression, where universal estimation, where the conception to be formed of the feelings, temper, power, policy, and views of a great nation are in question, there to talk of calculating the loss or profit of possessions to which these considerations may be attached by their price at market, or the value of their fee-simple, is like the idea of Dr. Swift, when he is comparing the grants to the Duke of Marlborough, with the rewards of a Roman conqueror, and estimates the crown of laurel at two-pence.—The first question for a great country to ask itself,—the first in point of order, and the first in consequence,—is this: is the part which I am about to act consonant to that high estimation which I have hitherto maintained among the nations of the world? Will my reputation suffer?—whether that reputation relate to the supposed extent of its means, to the vigour and wisdom of its counsels, or to the uprightness of its intentions. If, in any of these ways, the country is to sustain a loss of character; if the effect of what is proposed be to render it less respected, less looked up to, less trusted, less feared; if its firmness in times of trial, its fidelity to its engagements, its steady adherence to its purposes through all fortunes, are to be called in question; it must be a strong necessity indeed, stronger than any which I believe to exist in the present instance, that ought to induce it even to listen to counsels liable to be attended with any of these consequences. It must be a weighty danger, that, in the scales of a great country, can be allowed to balance the loss of any part of its dignity. What then shall we say of a country, which, abandoning from the outset every con-

* The answer to be given to this question, in the case of the present treaty, will be best ascertained perhaps by recurring to what happened when the terms of the treaty were first declared. It was some time before any body could be found to believe them. The first reporters, when they stated that every thing was given up, except Ceylon and Trinidad; that Demerary, Cochin, the Cape, Malta, all were gone; were treated as persons who were joking, or who were themselves the dupes of some idle joke put about by the opposition. Nobody could believe that the terms of the treaty were in reality such as that description represented them.

On the continent, where the speculations are apt to be more refined; after some time given to disbelief, the difficulty was solved by the supposition of secret articles. ‘Some great advantages were to be secured to Great-Britain of another kind;’ ‘Buonaparté was to abdicate;’ ‘Louis XVIIIth was to be restored;’ &c. &c. It never entered the thought of any one, that the state of things was finally to prove, what it appeared in the first instance; and that from mere impatience of contest, from sheer impotence of mind, Great-Britain had thus suddenly stopped in her career, dropped down as in a fit, and abandoning all her means of defence, was rolling herself in the dust at the feet of her adversary, regardless of what in future was to become of her, and looking to nothing but such temporary respite, as, ‘the satiate fury’ of the foe, or some feeling still more degrading to her, might happen to yield.

sideration of this sort, will not wait till it becomes insecure by ceasing to be respectable, but becomes unrespectable by ceasing to be secure? Which drops at once at the feet of its rival? Which begins by a complete surrender of its security; and suffers fame, character, dignity, and every thing else, to go along with it?—Whether such is the situation of this country, we shall judge better by taking a short view of the terms of the proposed peace. The description of these is simple and easy:—France gives nothing, and, excepting Trinidad and Ceylon, England gives every thing. If it were of any consequence to state what in diplomatick language was the basis of this treaty, we must say, that it had no one basis; but that it was the status quo, on the part of England, with the two exceptions in its favour, of Ceylon and Trinidad; and the uti possidetis, with the addition of all the other English conquests, on the part of France. But what may be the technical description of the treaty, is, comparatively, of little importance. It is the result that is material, and the extent of power and territory, now, by whatever means, actually remaining in the hands of France. The enumeration of this, liable indeed in part to be disputed, but upon the whole sufficiently correct, may be made as follows:—In Europe.—France possesses the whole of the Continent*, with the exception of Russia and Austria. If it be said, that parts of Germany, and the Northern courts of Denmark and Sweden are not fairly described as being immediately under the controul of France, we must balance this consideration by remarking, the influence which France possesses in these governments, and the commanding position which she occupies with respect to Austria, by the possession of Switzerland and Mantua, and those countries which have been considered always, and twice in the course of the present war, have proved to be the direct inlet into the heart of her dominions. In Asia, Pondicherry, Mahé, Cochin, Negapatam, the Spice Islands. In Africa, the Cape of Good Hope, Goree, Senegal. —In the sea that is enclosed by these three continents, which connects them all, and furnishes to us in many respects our best and surest communication with them,—the Mediterranean,—every port and post except Gibraltar, from one end of it to the other*, including the impregnable and invaluable port of Malta; so as to exclude us from a sea, which it had ever before been the anxious policy of Great-Britain to keep in her hands,—and to render it now, truly and properly, what it was once idly called, the Sea of France.—In the West-Indies, St. Domingo†, both the French and Spa-

* Among the posts and ports included in this description, we must not omit to particularize the Island of Elba, with its port, Porto Ferrajo. This little island, small in extent, but not small in consequence, and rendered nobly conspicuous at the close of the day, by the last parting rays of British glory, which fell upon it, was supposed by the provisions of the treaty of Luneville to have been left indirectly only in the power of France; inasmuch as it was expressly stipulated, that it was to form part of the territories of the new king of Etruria,—a king made by France; in the wantonness of her malice, and as a mockery of the ancient sovereigns of Europe. The possession of the Island, however, in this way was not thought sufficient; and therefore, that nothing might be wanting to mark that perfect contempt of good faith which has never failed to be manifested by the Republick in all her transactions with other countries, Elba was to be obtained by a secret treaty with the King of Spain.—the chief of the house of which the King of Etruria was a member. The consequence was, that when Austria in the treaty of Luneville, and England in the late preliminary treaty, thought that they had left this island, such as it had always been before, part and parcel of the dutchy of Tuscany, they found it, to their great surprize, rising up against them, as a separate possession in the hands of France, ready to be employed for the more easy subjugation of Naples, and for whatever other purposes France might have to prosecute in that quarter of the world.—It is not easy to conceive an instance of more contemptuous imposition on one side, nor of more forlorn and pitiable acquiescence on the other.

† Great doubt seems to be entertained at this moment, whether France will or will not finally obtain possession of St. Domingo; and great exultation to be felt in consequence by those, who, a few months ago, upon the ground that the conquest of St. Domingo, by France, was necessary for the security of our own islands, had consented to so extraordinary a measure as the sending out an immense armament, from the enemy's ports, in the interval between the preliminary and the definitive treaties. The probability is, that France will succeed, so far at least as to keep possession of part of the island; but should she not, then all the terrors affected to be felt at the establishment of a black empire, will return with ten-fold force;

* This position will not be thought to have become less commanding by the completion of an event, which, lost as this country is to all feeling of its situation, does seem to have produced some slight sensation, namely, the extinction of the Cisalpine Republick, and the reproduction of it under the new form and title of the Italian. Those who before doubted, to what degree Buonaparte was master of Europe, may find here wherewithal to settle their opinion. It is not the mere assumption of so much new territory, or of so much new dominion at least, over a territory already dependant; nor the new danger arising from thence to Austria; (either of them circumstances, that in former times, would have set the Continent in a flame,) but what the state must be of the powers of Europe, whoever they are, when they can sit quiet spectators of this proceeding, without daring to stir a step to prevent it. The assumption of this territory, though it be only a change in the form of the dominion exercised over it, must by no means be considered as of little importance. As has been well observed, (vide Cobbett's Register, Vol. I. page 114.) the use to be made of a country, in any state of independence, however nominal, is by no means the same, as when that country is placed at once in the hands of the governing power. France is mistress, it is true, of Spain and Prussia, and of Holland, Switzerland, Genoa, Tuscany, and all the South of Italy: but not to the same degree of the two former countries, as she is of the others; nor of the others, in the same manner as she is of the new Italian Republick. There may be a difference of several weeks.

nish parts, Martinico, St. Lucie, Guadaloupe, Tobago, Curaco.—In North America, St. Pierre and Miquelon, with a right to the fisheries in the fullest extent to which they were ever claimed; Louisiana, (so it is supposed,) * a word dreadful for the blacks will remain masters,—and masters after having tried their powers in a regular contest with European troops,—not to mention the hostility which they may well be suspected to conceive against us, who after various treaties and negotiations, the nature of which may require hereafter a little examination, finally lent our assistance to the sending out a force, intended for the purpose of bringing them back to slavery. Should the other event happen, and France obtain possession of St. Domingo, it may then well be a question, how long we shall remain in possession of Jamaica. So little can ordinary men enter into that profound scheme of policy, which would give to your enemy at a peace, or even before peace was concluded, what you had yourself been attempting to acquire during the war, at the expense of more than ten thousand men, and probably of twice as many millions of money.

* What is here supposed is now found to be the fact. By a secret treaty settled with Spain, on the 21st March, 1801, but not to be declared till after peace with England, or till ministers should be found, who previously to peace would suffer France to do what she pleased, Spain cedes to France the possession of Louisiana, and with it, as is supposed, that of the two Floridas. It is impossible to pretend that this event was one which could not have been foreseen. It was foreseen by the treaty of Utrecht; it was foreseen by the fears of every reflecting American; it was pointed out to the people of America, nearly six years ago, not only as an event likely to happen, but as likely to happen in the very mode which we have now seen. (Vide Cobbett's Register, Vol. I. page 199.) Putting foresight out of the question, the fact must have been known, had the ministers here either dared to question France, or instead of allowing France to negotiate for her allies, insisted on treating directly with those powers themselves.

Dreadful is their responsibility, by whom these precautions have been neglected, and by whom these things have finally been suffered to happen. But the crime or madness of those who have caused these evils, is less to us than the evils themselves. France has hitherto reckoned her progress by states and kingdoms: she may now count by continents: she has established herself in the new world. By the possession of these countries, placed as they are, and combined with those which before belonged to her, she will hold, as by a sort of middle handle, the two great divisions of this quarter of the globe, and will brandish these continents like the blades of that tremendous instrument, which did such signal service in the patriot hands of Lord Edward Fitzgerald.

The consequences of this acquisition in one of the two hemispheres (North America) are well detailed, in different parts of the work above referred to. (See p. 44, 199, 253, and 265.) France planted now in the same continent with the United States, cutting them off from some of their richest districts, extending her settlements behind them, gradually but not slowly, till the mouths of the Mississippi shall be united with the sources of the St. Lawrence, will soon make them feel the want of that security which they have hitherto derived from an intervening ocean: and against a new and unconsolidated mass of states will finally effect that, which it required only ten years to accomplish against the old and well-compacted governments of Europe. In the mean-while we may employ ourselves in considering, what is likely to be her controul over the conduct of America as respecting this country; what the danger to Canada, and to that portion of our trade, which is carried on with those countries; what the effect of a French establishment in Louisiana and the Floridas, joined to what France will have in St. Domingo, Martinique, and Guadaloupe, upon the whole of our West-Indian interests and possessions.

to be pronounced, to all who consider the consequences with which that cession is pregnant, whe-

But it is on the other side, and towards the South, that the scene is most awful; where we behold the whole wealth of the new world lying exposed in goodly prospect, and France, with no other point to settle than the moment when it may suit her convenience to take possession of it. Buonaparté, established in Louisiana, has as ready an access to the treasures of the Spanish mines, as any banker has to his strong box. Thanks to those who have given him the key of them. The wealth of Spain will from henceforward, directly and immediately, and with no necessity for any intermediate process, be the wealth of France: and let no man flatter himself with the hope, that it will become in her hands, what it was in those of its former possessors, the means of enfeebling strength, and relaxing industry and exertion. In succeeding to the riches of Spain, there is no ground to hope, that France will succeed to her weakness or folly. She will better profit by the example of her predecessors, and will keep her wealth in a due and perfect subordination to the higher and dearer interests of her ambition. Her mines will be only the storehouse of her power. She will see, in these dark repositories, nothing but a magazine of future wars; which, like winds from the cave of Æolus, will rush forth to sweep the earth, and level whatever may yet be found to oppose the final accomplishment of her wishes.

Africa, et vastos volvunt ad litora fluctus.*

An open boat in the Bay of Biscay, with all the storms of heaven raging for its destruction, does not present an image of more unequal contest, than Great-Britain struggling with a power, which combines against her the old world and the new; which, to the force of nearly the whole continent of Europe, to something in Asia, to much in Africa, and more in the West-Indies, adds the naval resources of the continent of North America, and the wealth of the Spanish mines.

All these latter dangers, be it remembered, are created solely and exclusively by the peace. While war continued, these resources could never have gone to the enemy; they might, at any moment when necessity had been pressing, or hope in Europe had become extinct, have been secured to ourselves. The fear of this was probably the cause which preserved so long to Spain and Portugal the nominal independence which they have ther as it acts northward, by its effects upon the United States, or southward, as opening a direct passage into the Spanish settlements in America.—In South America,—Surinam, Demerary, Berbice, Essequibo, taken by us and now ceded;—Guiana, and by the effect of the treaty, fraudulently signed by France with Portugal, just before the signature of these preliminaries, a tract of country extending to the river Amazon, and giving to France the command of the entrance into that river. Whether, by any secret article, the evils of this cession will prove to have been done away, time will discover.* In fact, (be that as it may,) France may be said to possess the whole of the Spanish and Portuguese settlements upon that continent. For who shall say, that she has not the command of those settlements, when she has the command of the countries to which they belong;—cum custodit ipsos custodes? She has, in truth, whatever part of the continent of South America she chooses to occupy; and as far as relates to the Spanish part, without even the necessity, a necessity that probably would not cost her much, of infringing any part of the present treaty.

Such is the grand and comprehensive circle to which the New Roman Empire may be soon expected to spread, now that peace has removed all obstacles, and opened to her a safe and easy passage into the three remaining quarters of the globe. Such is the power, which we are required to contemplate without dismay! under the shade of whose greatness we are invited to lie down with perfect tranquillity and composure! I should be glad to know, what our ancestors would have thought and felt in this situation? what those weak and deluded men, so inferior to the politicians of the present day †, the Marlboroughs, the enjoyed. But these advantages (we shall be told) could only be obtained by war; and war is ruin.—Not exactly indeed to every country; because to France it has proved the means of empire and greatness; and even in Great-Britain, up to the period of the ninth year of war, the progress of ruin did not seem to be very alarming. We shall know, before long, what the efficacy is of that provision, which grave and sober men have made for the happiness and safety of their country, in peace.

* There is no chance that the evils of the peace in this respect will be done away, whatever may become of the particular cession here alluded to. Between the boundary settled by the treaty of Madrid and the boundary now contended for, in whatever treaty this latter is to be found, the difference is so small as hardly to be worth disputing. Either will give to France the command of the river Amazon. In this view the French may possibly concede the point: unless indeed the assurances given by our ministers, that they meant to do so, may be a reason with them for maintaining it.

† There have always been, in the House of Commons, some half-dozen or dozen sensible men, who having found out, that Great-Britain was an island, have been of opinion that all continental connexions are injurious, and calculated only to fill the pockets of those, who, in return for English gunieas, had nothing to give but the valour and military talents of their subjects. As the progress of reason is slow, this party had remained for a century or more in a very obscure minority, opposed by all who for their wisdom or talents, or

Godolphins, the Somers, the King Williams, all those who viewed with such apprehension the power of Louis XIV.; what they would say to a peace, which not only confirms to France the possession of nearly the whole of Europe, but extends her empire over every other part of the globe. Is there a man of them, who would not turn in his coffin, could he be sensible to a twentieth part of that which is passing, as perfect matter of course, in the politics of the present moment?—But to all these mighty dangers we have it seems one great security to oppose; not that degrading and bastard security to which I have before adverted, and to which, I fear, I must again recur,—that France is lassata if not satiata; that having run down her prey, she will be content to spare it, and be willing for awhile to leave us unmolested;—but a rational, sober, well-founded security, applicable to the supposition that she may not be wanting in the will to hurt us, but will happily not possess the power. This great security, we are told, is our wealth. We are, it seems, so immensely rich, our prosperity stands on so sure and wide a basis, we have such a pyramid of gold, so beautifully constructed, and so firmly put together, that we may safely let in all the world to do their worst against it; they can never overturn it, and might spend ages in endeavouring to take it to pieces. We seem to consider our commercial prosperity, like those articles of property, timber, marble, and others of that sort, which, however valuable, may be safely left ungarded, being too weighty and bulky to be carried away.—Sir, the first circumstance that strikes one in this statement, is, that odd inconsistency, by which a country that makes peace on account of its poverty, is to rest its whole hope of security in that peace, upon its wealth. If our wealth will protect us, it is a great pity that this discovery was not made long ago; it would have saved us many years of painful struggle; have kept in our hands a great additional portion of these very means of protection, and have lessened considerably the dangers against which such protection is wanted. But wealth, I fear, abstracted from certain means of using it, carries with it no powers of protection, either for itself or others. Riches are strength, in the same manner only as they are food. They may be the means of procuring both. But we shall fall into as great a folly, as in the fable of Midas, if we suppose that when we supposed knowledge of public affairs, had figured at any time in the history of the country. But oppressed as the party had long been, they have lived to see the day, when their opinions are at length triumphant; and when the ministers of the country, with the full approbation of Parliament and of the nation, are settling a treaty of peace upon a formal recognition of their principle, and declare in substance, that Great Britain has no longer any concern or interest in the affairs and situation of the Continent. It is only unfortunate, that time has not yet been given to evince the truth of this principle by experience. When it shall be seen that the renunciation of foreign connexions, and retreat into our insular resources shall have produced no harm, but that, on the contrary, the power and prosperity of Great Britain shall have risen higher than before, then will this doctrine have received its full and final confirmation.

have laid down our arms, and surrendered our fortresses, our wealth, alone, can afford us any protection. I cannot, therefore, for my own part, understand what is meant by this, unless it be, that by superiority of capital, and priority of market, of which I allow the effects to be immense, we might, if things were left to themselves, in a fair competition, in a fair race, still keep a-head of our competitors, in spite of all the multiplied advantages which France will now possess. This might be so; though it is by no means clear that it would. But the competition will not be left to its natural course.* This game will not be fairly played. Buonaparté is a player, who, if the game is going against him, will be apt to pick a quarrel, and ask us, if we can draw our swords.—And here, perhaps, it is time to remark the singular fallacy, which has run through all the reasonings of gentlemen on the other side; that, namely, of supposing that in discussing the present question, the peace, such as it is, is the state which is to be contrasted with the continuance of the war.—They forget, or choose that we should forget, that this peace may, at any moment, at the mere pleasure of the enemy, be converted into a new war; differing only from the other, by the ground which we in the mean-while shall have lost, and the numerous advantages which the enemy will have acquired. There is not the least reason why this treaty, if the enemy should so please, should be any thing more than a mere piece of legerdemain, by which they shall have got possession of Malta, have established themselves in all their new colonies, have, perhaps re-entered Egypt, have received back twenty or thirty thousand seamen, and have otherwise put themselves into a situation to re-commence the war, with new and decisive advantages. If they do not immediately take this course, it will be, simply, because they will hope to succeed as well without it; or, because they choose to defer it till a more convenient opportunity: the means will, at every moment, be in their power.—Two suppositions are, therefore, always to be made, and two comparisons to be instituted, when we talk of the merits of this peace; 1st. That the enemy will choose to adhere to it; or, 2dly, that they will break it: and the two comparisons to be formed in consequence are, 1st, The comparison between a continuation of the war and a state of peace, such as peace will be under the present treaty; and 2dly, a comparison of the war, so continued, with such a war as France may revive at any moment after the present treaty shall have taken effect.—What the condition and feelings of the country would be, in this latter case, namely, that of a renewed war, I need hardly point out. The dread in fact of what they would be, will operate so strongly, that the case will never happen. The country will never bear to put itself in a situation, in which the sense of its own folly will press upon it in a way so impossible to be endured. At all events, with its present feelings and opinions, the country never can go to war again, let France do what she will: for,

* See Etat de la France, by Hautrive, a work published at Paris, in 1800, immediately under the direction of the French government, and universally understood to be intended as a sort of manifesto of their sentiments. See also the various regulations introduced for the prohibition of our manufactures, even in the interval between the preliminary and definitive treaties.

if we are of opinion, that war, continued at present, must be ruin in the course of a few years, what do we suppose it must be, when, to replace us where we now are, we must begin by the recovery of that list of places which the present treaty has given up? France, therefore, will be under no necessity of going to war with us; and nothing but her own intemperance and insolence, and an opinion of our endurance and weakness, beyond even what they may be found to deserve, can force upon us that extremity. She has much surer and safer means of going to work; means, at the same time, sufficiently quick in their operation to satisfy any ordinary ambition:—she has nothing to do but to trust to the progress of her own power in peace, quickened, as often as she shall see occasion, by a smart threat of war. I cannot conceive the object which a judicious application of these two means is not calculated to obtain. A peace, such as France has now made, mixed with proper proportions of a seasonable menace of war, is a specific, for the undoing of a rival country, which seems to me impossible to fail.—Let us try it in detail.—Suppose France, by an arrangement with that independent power, Spain, similar to the arrangement which, in violation of the treaty of Utrecht, produced the surrender of Louisiana, and of the Spanish half of St. Domingo,* should obtain the cession (which would be in violation of no treaty) of all the Spanish settlements in America: would you consider that as an occasion of war? Suppose Portugal, the integrity of whose possessions is in some sense or other guaranteed to her, but who is not prevented, I presume, by that guaranty, from parting with any of them that she pleases, should choose, in kindness to France, to make over to her any of those settlements which she, Portugal, still retains,—would that, again, be a cause of war? By these two ways, without the infraction of any treaty, without any act which could be construed to be an aggression, much less which we should be inclined to treat as such, might France render herself completely mistress of the continent of South America. Is there any commercial claim, then, that France could set up, any commercial regulation which she could introduce, either in her own name, or that of her allies, of a nature the most injurious and fatal to our commerce, which we should make a case of resistance, and think of magnitude enough to involve the nation in another war?—The augmentation of her marine, to which professedly she means to direct all her efforts, and the increase of her establishments to any amount that she pleases; these are objects which it would be perfectly ridiculous to talk of, or to suppose that we should make the subject even of the most friendly remonstrance. Indeed, according to the modern doctrines of not interfering in the internal concerns of another country, I do not understand upon what pretence the armament of a state can ever become a subject of representation, since nothing surely is so completely an internal concern, as what any nation does with its own military or naval forces, upon its own soil, or in its own harbours. But setting aside these smaller objects, suppose France was to re-invade Egypt; was, without waiting even for the form of a surrender from the Order, to take forcible possession of Malta; was to land a body of troops in Greece, and either that way, or by succours to Paswan Oglow, was to overthrow the government of the Porte; would you be able, on any of these occasions, to satisfy those by whose opinions it is now the fashion to guide the counsels of states, that an interest existed sufficiently strong to call for the interference of this country, to prevent the mischief, much less to redress and vindicate it when done? Why, Sir, we know that in the present state of opinions and feelings, and upon the principles on which the present peace has been made, not only no one, but hardly all of these put together, would drag the country into a renewal of hostilities, though, as is evident, its very existence might depend upon it. The consequence is, that France is our mistress; that there is nothing she can ask, which she must not have; (she has only to threaten war, and her work is done;)—that all the objects of interest and ambition which France can have in view, lie open before her, to be taken possession of whenever she pleases, and without a struggle: her establishments will accumulate round us, till we shall be lost and buried in them; her power will grow over us, till, like the figures in some of Ovid's Metamorphoses, we shall find all our faculties of life and motion gradually failing and deserting us:

* A few weeks before the above discourse was delivered, this would have been a mistake: for the treaty of Utrecht equally provide against the cession of any of these settlements, as against the cession of St. Domingo: but it is one of the distinguishing characters of the late preliminaries,—and a most alarming one it is,—that contrary to the almost uniform practice, they revived no former treaties; so that the treaty of Utrecht, as respecting this country and France, may be now considered as abrogated.

— *Torpor gravis alligat artus;

If, in this last extremity, we should make any desperate effort and plunges, that might threaten to become troublesome, and give us a chance of extricating ourselves, she will call in the aid of her arms, and with one blow put an end at once to our sufferings and our existence.—Sir, are these idle dreams, the phantoms of my own disordered imagination? or are they real and serious dangers, the existence of which no man of common sense, let his opinions of the peace be what they may, will attempt to deny? The utmost that any man will pretend to say, is, that he hopes, (and so do I) that the evils apprehended will not happen; and that, great as the risk may be, he thinks it preferable to those risks, which would attend a continuation of the war. None but the most weak or inconsiderate, if they are not disaffected, or absorbed and lost in the sense of some immediate personal interest, will feel, when they shall well understand the subject, that there is any cause of joy or rejoicing. Here it is then, that I must advert again to that topic of consolation, (miserable indeed must our state be, when such are our topics of consolation,) to which, in order to make out a case not perfectly hopeless, we are willing to have recourse and which, more I believe than any reliance upon our wealth, does really support us, in the situation to which we are reduced. This is the idea, that from some cause or other, from some combination of passions and events,—such as no philosophy can explain, and no history probably furnish an example of,—the progress of the Revolution will stop where it is: and that Buonaparté, like another Pyrrhus,—or rather like that adviser of Pyrrhus, whose advice was not taken,—instead of proceeding to the conquest of new worlds, will be willing to sit down contented in the enjoyment of those which he has already.—Sir, the great objection to this hope, to say nothing of its baseness, is its utter extravagance. On what possible ground do we believe this? Is it in the general nature of ambition? Is it in the nature of French ambition? Is it in the nature of French revolutionary ambition? Does it happen commonly to those, whether nations or individuals, who are seized with the spirit of aggrandizement and acquisition, that they are inclined rather to count what they possess, than to look forward to what yet remains to be acquired? If we examine the French Revolution, and trace it correctly to its causes, we shall find that the scheme of universal empire was, from the beginning, that which was looked to as the real consummation of its labours; the object first in view, though last to be accomplished; the primum mobile that originally set it in motion, and has since guided and governed all its movements.—The authors of the Revolution wished to destroy morality and religion. They wished those things as ends: but they wished them also, as means, in a higher and more extensive design. They wished for a double empire; an empire of opinion and an empire of political power: and they used the one of these, as a means of effecting the other. What reason have we to suppose, that they have renounced those designs, just when they seem to touch the moment of their highest and fullest accomplishment? When there is but one country, that remains between France and the empire of the world, then is the moment, when we choose to suppose that all opposition may be withdrawn, and that the ambition of France will stop of its own accord.—It is impossible not to see in these feeble and sickly imaginations, that fatal temper of mind, which leads men to look for help and comfort from any source rather than from their own exertions. We are become of a sudden great hoppers. We hope the French will have no inclination to hurt us:—we hope, now Peace is come, and the pressure of War, as it is called, taken off, that the French Empire will become a prey to dissensions, and finally fall to pieces;—we hope, that the danger to have been apprehended from the example of the Revolution, is now worn out; and that Buonaparté, being now monarch himself, will join with us in the support of monarchical principles, and become a sort of collateral security for the British constitution. One has heard to be sure, that magni animi est seipare; but the maxim, to have any truth in it, must be confined, I apprehend, to those hopes which are to be prosecuted through the medium of men's own exertions, and not be extended to those, which are to be independent of their exertions, or rather, as in the present instance, are meant to stand in lieu of them.—Of this description are all those expectations which I have just enumerated; one of which is, that the French will fall into dissensions.—Why, Sir, they have had nothing else but dissensions from the beginning. But of what avail have such dissensions been to the safety of other countries? One of their first dissensions was a war of three years, called the war of La Vendée; in which, according to some of their calculations, the Republic lost, between the two sides, to the number of 600,000 souls. This was surely pretty well, in the way of dissensions. Yet when did this interrupt for a moment, even if it might in some degree have relaxed, the operations of their armies on the frontiers, and the prosecution of their plans for the overthrow of other countries? As for changes of government, they have been in a continued course of them. Since the beginning of the Revolution, the government has been overturned at least half a dozen times. They have turned over in the air, as in sport, like tumbler pigeons;—but have they ever in consequence ceased their flight? The internal state of the country has been in the most violent commotion. The ship has been in mutiny;—there has been fighting in the waist and on the fore-castle:—but in the midst of the confusion somebody has always been found to tend the helm, and to trim the sails; the vessel has held her course. —For one, therefore, I have no great confidence in the effect of these internal commotions; which every day become less and less likely, in proportion as the power of the present government becomes more confirmed, and as the people of France become more and more bound together by the common feeling of national glory, and by the desire of consolidating the empire which they have seen established. Such commotions may undoubtedly happen, and may of a sudden, when it is least expected, bring about some change favourable to the world. But it is curious to hear these chances gravely brought forward, as the best foundation of our hopes, and by those too, who a few weeks ago, while the war continued, would never hear of them, as entering at all into calculation. It seems, that the chapter of accidents, as it is called, which could do nothing for us in war, may do every thing for us in time of peace. Whereas I should have thought just the contrary; that chances, such as are here intended, were not only more likely to happen in war, but, what is a little material, might then be better improved and turned to account. While war subsists, while armies are ready to act, while confederacies are in force, while intelligences are going on, while assistance may be lawfully and avowedly given, every chance of this sort may, if properly improved, lead to consequences the most decisive. In peace, all that fortune can do for us, falls dead and still-born. Nobody is ready, nobody is authorized to move a step, or stretch forth a hand, to rear and foster those chances, however promising, which time and accident may bring forth. It is not an answer to say, that such never have been improved. In regulating plans of future conduct, we must consider not what men have done, but what they may and ought to do. The only rational idea that I could ever form of resistance to that power, which unresisted must subdue the world, was, that it must be the joint effect of an internal and an external war, directed to the same end, and mutually aiding and supporting each other. All the powers of Europe could not subdue France, if France was united; or force upon it a government, even were such an attempt warrantable, really in opposition to the wishes of the people. On the other hand, no internal efforts, unassisted by force from without, seemed capable of rescuing the country from the yoke imposed upon it, so long as the several factions that governed in succession, could find means of securing to themselves the support of the armies. We are now required to believe, that what has hitherto failed to be performed by both these powers together, is to be effected by one alone: and that with respect to any hope of a change of government in France, the war that has been carrying on for nine years has proved only an impediment!—Such is the state of our hopes and opinions on that side.

But we have another hope, founded on rather a contrary supposition, namely, that Buonaparté, now that he is a King himself—and a King he is so far as power can make one,—will no longer be an encourager of those absurd and mischievous doctrines, which, however they may have helped him to the throne, will be as little pleasing to him, now that he is fairly seated there, as to any the most legitimate Monarch. Sir, I agree, that Buonaparté, like other demagogues and friends of the people, have deluded and gulled the people sufficiently to make them answer his purpose, will be ready enough to teach them a different lesson, and to forbid the use of that language towards himself, which he had before instructed them in, as perfectly proper towards others. Never was there any one, to be sure, who used less management in that respect, or who left all the admirers of the French Revolution, within and without,—all the admirers of it, I mean, as a system of liberty,—in a more whimsical and laughable situation. Every opinion for which they have been contending, is now completely trodden down, and trampled upon, or held out in France to the greatest possible contempt and derision. The Honourable Gentlemen on the Opposition Benches have really great reason to complain of having been so completely left in the lurch. There is not even a decent retreat provided for them.—But though such is the treatment, which the principles of “the Rights of Man,” and of the “Holy Duty of Insurrection,” meet with in France, and on the part of him who should be their natural protector, it is by no means the same, with respect to the encouragement which he may choose to give them in other countries. Though they use none of these goods in France for home consumption, they have always a large assortment by them ready for foreign markets. Their Jacobin Orators are not to be looked for in the clubs at Paris, but in the clubs of London. There, they may talk of cashiering Kings, with other language of that sort: but should any orator more flippant than the rest choose to hold forth in that strain, in the city where the Great Consul resides, in the metropolis of liberty, he would soon put him to silence, in the way that we see adopted in the sign of the Silent Woman. Buonaparté, being invested, in virtue of the Rights of Man, with despotic power, can afford to sanction the preaching of those doctrines in other countries, of which he will not suffer the least whisper in his own. While he is at the head of an absolute Monarchy in France, he may be the promoter and champion of Jacobin insurrection every where else. The abject as well as wicked nature of Jacobinism in this country, which, while it would rebel against the lawful authority of its own government, is willing to enslave itself to France, finds no difficulty of allowing to him these two opposite characters: and I know no reason why we should suppose him disinclined to accept them.—I must confess, therefore, that I see, as little hope for us on this side, as I do on the other. In fact, if I could believe, in spite of all probability, that there was any remission of that purpose, which has never yet ceased for an instant,—the purpose of destroying this country,—such belief, however produced, must be instantly done away by a view of the conduct of France, in the settlement of this very treaty. There is not a line of it, that does not either directly point to the destruction of this country, or, by a course a little circuitous, but not less certain, equally tend to the same object. What can France want with any of the possessions which she has compelled us to surrender, but with a view of rivalling our power, or of subverting it, or of removing out of our hands the means of controuling her further projects of ambition?—Of the first sort are all her stipulations for settlements in South America and the West-Indies: of the second, her demand of the Cape and Cochin; and of the last, that most marked and disgraceful condition on our part, the surrender of Malta. What upon earth could France have to do with Malta, but either as a means of humbling us in the eyes of all the world, by the surrender of it, or of depriving us of a port in the Mediterranean, that might stand in the way of designs which she is meditating against the countries bordering upon that sea? The miserable pretexts which are formed to palliate this surrender, and the attempt to cover it, in part, by the show of delivering that fortress to the Order, though much the greater part of the Order are now living in the dominions of Buonaparté, and many of them actually serving in his armies, are wholly insufficient, either to conceal our shame, or to disguise the purpose of the French in making this demand. But the circumstances of the negotiation, not less than the treaty resulting from it, shew, in another way, the folly of those hopes, which are founded upon the supposed intentions or characters of the persons with whom it is made. It does not augur very favourably for the intentions of a party in any transaction, that there appear in every stage of it the clearest proofs of duplicity and fraud.—What do we think of the artifice, which signs a treaty with us, guaranteeing the integrity of Portugal; but previously to that, at a period so late, as to make it sure that the knowledge of the transaction shall not reach this country in time, signs another treaty, totally altering the nature of that guaranty? What shall we think of the candour and fairness, which in a treaty with us, proposes, as a joint stipulation, the evacuation of Egypt, at a time when the proposers knew, though we did not, that every soldier of theirs in Egypt was actually a prisoner to our troops? Where was their good faith to the Turks, when, in the same circumstances, they knowing the fact and the Turks not, they took credit from the Turks for this very evacuation? Why, Sir, it is a fraud upon a level with any of those practised at a lottery-office. They insure the ticket, at the moment when they know it to be drawn. And are these the people, to whose generosity and forbearance, to whose good intentions towards this country, and above all, to whose good faith, we are to deliver over, bound hand and foot, the interests of the British Empire, to be destroyed or saved, as they, in their good pleasure, shall think fit?—I say nothing here on a topick, however closely connected with the present subject, the character of the First Consul himself*—a character hitherto as much marked by frauds of the most disgraceful kind, as by every other species of guilt; but pass on to the question, which meets us at every turn, and seems to stop the progress of all argument, the great question—"What are we to do? The danger is great, but how are we to avoid it? War cannot be eternal, and what prospect have we of reaching a period, when it may be terminated in circumstances upon the whole more favourable than the present?"*—Sir, the word, eternal, which in any use of it is sufficiently awful, will undoubtedly not be least so, when associated with the idea of war. But I must beg leave to remind the House of a circumstance, of which they and the country seem never to have been at all aware, that the question of eternal War, is one, which it is not left for us to decide. It is a question which must be asked of our enemies: and is not less proper to be asked, if we could hope that they would answer us at the present moment, than it was before the signature of the preliminaries. The war depends neither upon conventions to be entered into between the two governments, nor upon acts of hostility which may be committed between the two people, by land or on the high seas; but on the existence or non-existence of that fixed, rooted, determined purpose, which France has hitherto had, and which we have no reason whatever to think she has relinquished—of accomplishing the final overthrow of this country. While that purpose exists, and shall be acted upon, we are at war, call our state by what name you please: and the only question is, whether France cannot work as effectually to her purpose in peace; and if peace is made in a certain way, infinitely more effectual than she can in what is professedly and declaredly war. I would really wish to ask, whether gentlemen have never heard of a people called the Romans, a set of republicans who conquered the world in the old time; and whom the modern Romans take as their model in every respect, but in none more than in what relates to the overthrow of this country? Among the nations that fell under the Roman yoke, there were but few whom they were able to fetch down at a blow, — to reduce in the course of a single war. All their greater antagonists, particularly the state whose fate is chosen as a prototype of our own, were not reduced till after repeated attacks, till after several successive and alternate processes of war and peace: a victorious war preparing the way for an advantageous peace; and an advantageous peace again laying the foundation of a successful war. This was at least the conduct of a great people; a people not to be put aside from their purposes by every transient blast of fortune. They had vowed the destruction of Carthage;

* The manner, in which people seem to have posed themselves with this question, has been the ruin of the country. They never seem to have got the length of discovering, that if France was bent upon their destruction, they were and must be, in an eternal war, unless either France should change her purpose, or they would submit to be destroyed. With all their fears and complainings, they have never been sensible to above half their danger. They seem always to have supposed, that like the contests in use among our common people, (till the wisdom of magistrates extinguished those remains of rustick chivalry,) they could terminate this war at any time, by only declaring that they had enough.

and they never rested from their design, till they had seen it finally accomplished. The emulators of their fortune in the present day, are, in no less a degree, the emulators of their virtues; at least of those qualities, whatever they may be, that give to man a command over his fellows. When I look at the conduct of the French Revolutionary rulers, as compared with that of their opponents; when I see the grandeur of their designs; the wisdom of their plans; the steadiness of their execution; their boldness in acting; their constancy in enduring; their contempt of all small obstacles and temporary embarrassments; their inflexible determination to perform such and such things; and the powers which they have displayed, in acting up to that determination; when I contrast these with the narrow views, the paltry interests, the occasional expedients, the desultory wavering conduct, the want of all right of feeling and just conception, that characterize so generally the governments and nations opposed to them, I confess I sink down in despondency, and am fain to admit, that if they shall have conquered the world, it will be by qualities by which they deserve to conquer it. Never were there persons, who could shew a fairer title to the inheritance which they claim. The great division of mankind made by a celebrated philosopher of old, into those who were formed to govern, and those who were born only to obey, was never more strongly exemplified than by the French nation, and those who have sunk, or are sinking, under their yoke. Let us not suppose, therefore, that while these qualities, combined with these purposes, shall continue to exist, they will ever cease, by night or by day, in peace or in war, to work their natural effect,—to gravitate towards their proper centre; or that the bold, the proud, the dignified, the determined, those who will great things, and will stake their existence upon the accomplishment of what they have willed, shall not finally prevail over those, who act upon the very opposite feelings; who will “never push their resistance beyond their convenience;” who ask for nothing but ease and safety; who look only to starve off the evil for the present day, and will take no heed of what may befall them on the morrow. We are therefore, in effect, at war at this moment: and the only question is, whether the war, that will henceforward proceed under the name of peace, is likely to prove less operative and fatal, than that which has hitherto appeared in its natural and ordinary shape. That such is our state, is confessed by the authors themselves of the present treaty, in the measures which they feel it necessary to recommend to the House. When did we ever hear before of a military establishment necessary to be kept up in time of peace? The fact is, that we know that we are not at peace; not such as is fit to be so called, nor that in which we might hope to sit down, for some time at least, in confidence and security, in the free and undisturbed enjoyment of the blessings which we possess. We are in that state, in which the majority, I believe, of those who hear me, are in their hearts more desirous that we should be, than, in our present prostrate and defenceless situation, they may think it prudent to avow—in a state of armed truce; and then the only questions will be, at what price we purchase this truce; what our condition will be while it lasts; and in what state it is likely to leave us, should it terminate otherwise than as we are willing to suppose.—This brings us at once to the point. If we are to come at last only to an armed truce, would it not have been a shorter and better course, to turn our war into an armed truce, into which in fact it had pretty much turned itself, rather than to take the round about way which has been now adopted, of making peace by the sacrifice of all the means of future war, in order afterwards to form an armed truce out of that peace? Let us state the account, and consider the loss and profit on either side.—The evils of war are, generally speaking, to be comprized under three heads: the loss of lives and the consequent affliction brought upon friends and families; the loss of money, meaning, by that, money expended in a way not to be beneficial to the country that raises it; and the loss of money in another sense, that is to say, money not got; by which I mean the interruption given to national industry, and the diminution of the productions thence arising, either by the number of hands withdrawn from useful labour, (which is probably however but little material), or by the embarrassments and restraints which in a state of war impede and clog the operations of commerce. I do not mean, that there are not in war, evils which may be said not to be included properly under any of the above heads; among which may be numbered, the distress arising from sudden changes of property, even when the persons who lose, and those who acquire, are equally parts of the same community. This, however, is an evil that will be more felt at the beginning, than in the later periods of a war; and will in fact be likewise felt, though in a less degree, by a transition even from war to peace. The enumeration, now made, however, may be sufficiently correct for the present purpose. And, with this in our hands, let us consider, in what so very violent a degree, the present armed truce, or peace, if you choose to call it so, differs from what might have been our state, in the case so much dreaded and deprecated, of a continuation of the war.—To take the last first,—the loss of national wealth by the interruption given to commerce and industry; such is the singular nature of this war, such the unexampled consequences with which it has been attended, that it becomes a question, and one in itself of the most anxious and critical importance, on which side of the account the consequences of peace in this respect are to be placed: whether, instead of balancing the dangers of peace, if such there are, by accessions which it will bring to our wealth and commerce, we are not rather called upon to prove some great advantages which peace will give us in respect of security, in order to balance the diminution likely to be produced by it in our commercial opulence. That our commerce will suffer at the long run, admits, I fear, of no doubt. If my apprehensions are just, it is in the diminution of our manufactures and commerce, that the approaches of our ruin will first be felt: but is any one prepared to say that this may not happen in the first instance? We have at present, subject to the inconveniences which war produces, nothing less than the commerce of the whole world. There is no part of the world to which our goods do not pass freely in our own ships; while not a single merchant ship, with the enemy's flag on board, does at this moment swim the ocean. Is this a state of things to be lightly hazarded? Does the hope of bettering this condition, even in the minds of those most sanguine, so much outweigh the fear of injuring it, that these opposite chances can upon the whole be stated otherwise than as destroying each other: and that of consequence, in the comparison of war and peace, the prospect of increased industry and commerce, which in general tells so much in favour of peace, must not here be struck out of the account? On this head the question between peace and war stands, to say the least of it, evenly balanced.—The next of these heads, the first, indeed, in point of consequence, but the next in the order in which it is here convenient to consider them, is the loss of lives, and the effect which war is likely to have on private and individual happiness. No man can pretend to say, that war can continue upon any footing, however restricted the circle of hostilities, without the lives of men being liable to be sacrificed; and no such sacrifice can be justified, or reconciled to the feelings of any one, but by that which must justify every such sacrifice, however great the extent—the safety and essential interests of the state. But if ever there was a war in which such sacrifices seemed likely to be few, not as an effect of any choice of ours, but by the necessary course of events, it was that which we should have had to carry on in future with the Republic of France.—The great and destructive operations of war, the conflict of fleets or armies, or the consumption of men in unwholesome climates and distant expeditions, had ceased of themselves. I know not what expeditions we should have had to prosecute, unless new cases should have arisen, similar to that of the ever-memorable one of Egypt; where, the same motives existing, we should be sorry indeed not to have the means of acting upon them. But in general, our fleets would have remained quietly at their stations, and our armies have lived at home: the whole question reduces itself to a mere question of expense; and that again pretty much to a mere question of establishment.—The great heads of war expenditure, the army extraordinaries, would, in most parts, have ceased; and in the rest, have been greatly reduced. The chief question will be, not between an ordinary peace establishment and a war, such as, from circumstances, ours has hitherto been, involving expeditions to all parts of the globe; but between a peace establishment, such as that which is now declared to be necessary, and a war, which had become, and was likely to continue, merely defensive; in which we should have had nothing to do, but to maintain a competent force, with little prospect of being obliged to make use of it. The advocates for the present peace must find themselves always in an awkward dilemma, between economy and safety. We make peace in order to save our money: if we reduce our establishments, what becomes of our security? if we keep up our establishments, what becomes of our savings? Whatever you give to one object, is unavoidably taken from the other. The savings of the present peace, therefore, can be looked for only between the narrow limits of a high peace and a low war establishment; or, to state the case more correctly, between a high peace establishment and a war, reduced in the manner that I have described. I wish that a correct estimate were formed of the difference, in point of expense, between these two states; recollecting always that among the expenses of peace are to be counted the provisions necessary against the new dangers brought by the peace itself; the new dangers for example, with which Jamaica, and all our West-India islands are threatened by the establishment of the French in Saint-Domingo, and other parts in that quarter of the world: the new dangers to which our empire in the East is exposed, by the re-entry of the French into the peninsula of India, and the cession to them, for such in effect it is, of the Cape and Cochín: in general, by the free passage now given to their ships and armies into every part of the world, and the establishment of them every where in the neighbourhood of our most valuable possessions.—Against all these dangers war provided, as it were, by its own single act. The existence of our fleets upon the ocean, with an Admiralty order “to burn, sink, and destroy,” shut up at once, as under lock and key, all those attempts, which are now let loose, and require as many separate defences as there are parts liable to be attacked. A fleet cruising before Brest, therefore, was not to be considered as so much clear expense, to be charged to the account of the war; without deducting the expense of additional troops and additional ships, which the absence of the fleet might require to be kept, for instance, in the West-Indies.

With respect to home defence. Considering the little reliance to be placed upon the government in France, now subsisting; the still greater uncertainty with respect to any future government (such as may arise at any moment); and the increased defence necessary on land, in proportion to the diminution of our force by sea; I know not, how we can remain secure with a military establishment much less considerable, than that which we should have had to maintain here in the case of war.—So much for the expenses of peace.—On the other hand, we must consider, what the reductions are that might be made to the expense of war, beyond those, which the very scheme and shape of the war itself would unavoidably produce.—The expenses of our army, as at present established, are excessive: but what should hinder us from adopting some of those expedients, by which a country not more considerable than Prussia, under the regulations introduced by a former great monarch, is made capable of maintaining a military establishment superior to that of Great-Britain?—The chief of those expedients, and that which we could best imitate, is, the putting at all times the half of the army upon the footing of militia, to be exercised only for a month or two, and to be at home for the remainder of the year. Other expedients might be suggested, if this were the proper occasion for discussing them.—It is true, as may be observed, that such a reduction of expense, if it can be at all effected, may be applied not less in time of peace than in time of war; and in a comparison, therefore, between the two, must be counted on both sides. But that circumstance, as is plain, does not do away the effect of what is here stated. If both sides are reduced, and reduced at all proportionably, the absolute difference, which is what we are here considering, will be reduced also; not to mention that, with a view to what will be the effect of the measure in other ways, such a reduction may be better applied to a large establishment, than it can to a small one. If an army of 80,000 men, for instance, may, for the moment, be reduced to half, because the remaining 40,000 will still be a sufficient force, it is not to be concluded, that a proportionate reduction might be made in an army of only half that number, when the remainder, left on an emergency for the defence of the country, would be no more than twenty thousand. Consider, therefore, when the reductions capable of being made, or certain of themselves to happen, in a state of war, such as war might be expected to be if continued from the present time, and when the new and extraordinary expenses incident to this peace, shall have been fairly calculated, to what the difference between the two states will amount; and taking then this difference at its utmost, compare the money so saved, with all the evils and dangers which peace, as now proposed, will give rise to: Or, if the modern fashion is to prevail, and money alone to be considered, compare the value of the sinking fund created by this saving, with the difference, in point of mere expense, of the circumstances in which we shall be placed at the commencement of any future war, should France chuse to put us under this necessity. By the result of these comparisons, must the question be decided.—Should it so happen, (and who shall say, that it will not?) that our commerce, instead of increasing, or remaining where it is, should fall off; that our manufactures should decline; that, from these and other causes,—such as a great emigration, and considerable transfer of commercial property;—and above all from the great loss of territorial revenue, the income of the state should be lessened, to a degree equal only to this proposed saving, then we shall have incurred all the dreadful difference to be found in our situation in case of the renewal of war, and all the no less serious dangers during the continuance of peace, absolutely for nothing. —I select this only as the case which may be considered as the most probable. In argument, to be sure, having already agreed to take at par, our prospects with respect to the increase or decrease of our commerce and manufactures, I am not at liberty to insist on this case, or upon the still more fatal one of a greater and more extensive decrease, without allowing those who argue on the other side, to avail themselves of the supposition, that the sources of national wealth may possibly be in a great degree augmented.—At all events, however, and whatever be the extent of these expected savings, and the improvement to be made in consequence in our finances, we are to estimate the evils and dangers which are to be placed in the opposite scale, the chief of which I have endeavoured to point out, though in a very hasty and summary manner, in the observations, with which I have already troubled the House. They may be classed, generally, under three heads:—The ascendancy, which it is feared, France may in time acquire, even in those sources of greatness, which we seem inclined to consider as a substitute for all others, our manufactures and commerce; supposing, as I am here doing, that peace continues without interruption, and even without any great advantage being taken, of the threat of a renewal of hostilities. Secondly, the effect to be produced, in a peace so constituted, by the continued use of this menace,—an engine of which it is difficult to calculate the force, applied, as it may be, to every point on which the interests of the countries are opposed, and for the accomplishment of every object, which France may wish to attain. Thirdly and lastly, war itself; begun of course at such moment, as France shall judge most advantageous to her, and when by a due improvement of the preceding period of peace, Great Britain shall have been placed in a situation to be least capable of resisting its effects. On these points, having spoken to each already, as far as the occasion seems to admit, though far short of what the subject demands, I shall detain the House no longer, but leave to every gentleman to form his own judgment on the extent and reality of these dangers, and finally to settle the comparison between these (with others connected with them) and the continuance of the war, such as war from this time might be expected to prove. The only head of danger, to which I wish now to speak, is one of a quite different nature; but so serious, so certain, so imminent, so directly produced by the peace itself, that I must not omit to say a few words upon it. This is, the danger now first commencing; and which may be conveyed in a single word, but that, I fear, a word of great import—Intercourse. From this moment the whole of the principles and morals of France rush into this country without let or hindrance, with nothing to limit their extent, or to controul their influence. While the war continued, not only the communication was little, or nothing, but, whatever contagion might be brought in by that communication, found the country less in a state to receive it. The very heat and irritation of the war was a preservative against the infection. But now that this infection is to come upon us in the soft hour of peace; that it is to mix with our food; that we are to take it into our arms; that it is to be diffused in the very air we breath; what hope, can we suppose, remains to us of escaping its effects?—This, I used formerly to be taught, before the weight of taxes had lessened our apprehensions of French fraternity, was one of the consequences most to be dreaded in peace, in whatever form it should come, short of the restoration of some government, not founded on jacobinical principles. But somehow or another, the very idea of this danger seems long since to have vanished from our minds. We are now to make peace in the very spirit of peace, and to throw ourselves without reserve into the very arms of France. With respect, indeed, to one part of the danger, the principles of France,—meaning by that the political principles.—we are told, that all danger of that sort is at an end; that in this country, as every where else, the folly of the revolutionary principles is so thoroughly understood, that none can now be found to support them. Jacobinism is, as it were, extinct: or, should it still exist, we shall have, as our best ally against it, Buonaparté himself.—Sir, I have already stated what my confidence is in that ally. I know that neither he personally, nor any other of the free governments that have subsisted in France, have ever suffered these doctrines of jacobinism to be used against themselves. But I must again ask, on what grounds we suppose, that France has renounced the use of them, with respect to other countries? We have heard less, indeed, of late, of her principles, because we have heard, and felt, more of her arms. For the same reason, we may possibly hear little of them in future. But do they therefore cease to exist? During the whole course of the revolution, France has sometimes employed one of these means, and sometimes the other. Sometimes the arms have opened a way for the principles, at others the principles have prepared the object, as an easy conquest to the arms:—in the flight of this chain-shot, sometimes one end has gone foremost, and sometimes the other, and at times they may have struck their object at once: but the two parts alike exist, and are inseparably linked together.—Nothing, therefore, can in my mind, be more idle than this hope of the extinction of jacobinism, either as an instrument to be used by France, should her occasions require it, or as a principle ever to be eradicated out of any community, in which it has taken once root. However true it may be, that the example of France ought to serve as the strongest antidote to its poison, and that it does so, in fact, in the minds of many; yet it is equally true, that, in another view, and to many other persons, it operates in a directly contrary way,—not as a warning, but as an incitement. What I am now speaking of, is,—however, not the danger of the political principles of France, but the still surer and more dreadful danger, of its morals. What are we to think of a country, that having struck out of men's minds, as far as it has the power to do so, all sense of religion, and all belief of a future life, has struck out of its system of civil polity, the institution of marriage? That has formally, professedly, and by law, established the connexion of the sexes, upon the footing of an unrestrained concubinage? That has turned the whole country into one universal brothel? That leaves to every man to take, and to get rid of, a wife, (the fact, I believe, continues to be so,) and a wife, in like manner to get rid of her husband, upon less notice than you can, in this country, of a ready-furnished lodging?—What are we to think of uniting with a country, in which such things have happened, and where for generations the effects must continue, whatever formal and superficial changes prudence and policy may find it expedient to introduce in the things themselves.—Do we suppose it possible, that, with an intercourse subsisting, such as we know, will take place between Great-Britain and France, the morals of this country should continue what they have been? Do we suppose that when this Syrus in Tiberim defluxit Orontes, when that 'revolutionary stream,' the Seine, charged with all the colluvies of Paris,—with all the filth and blood of that polluted city,—shall have turned its current into the Thames, that the waters of our fair 'domestick flood' can remain pure and wholesome, as before? Do we suppose these things can happen? Or is it, that we are indifferent, whether they happen or not: and that the morals of the country are no longer any object of our concern?—Sir, I fear, the very scenes that we shall witness, even in the course of the present winter, will give us a sufficient foretaste of what we may expect hereafter; and show, how little the morals of the country will be protected by those who should be their natural guardians, the higher and fashionable orders of society. In what crowds shall we see flocking to the hotel of a regicide ambassador, however deep in all the guilt and horror of his time, those, whose doors have hitherto been shut inflexibly against every Frenchman; whom no feeling for honourable distress, no respect for suffering loyalty, no sympathy with fallen grandeur, no desire of useful example,—and in some instances, I fear, no gratitude for former services or civilities, have ever been able to excite to show the least mark of kindness or attention to an emigrant of any description; though in that class are to be numbered men, who in every circumstance of birth, of fortune, of rank, of talents, of acquirements of every species, are fully their equals; and whom the virtue that has made them emigrants, has, so far forth rendered their superiors! A suite of richly furnished apartments, and a ball and supper, is a trial, I fear, too hard for the virtue of London.—It is to this side, that I look with greatest apprehension. The plague with which we are threatened, will not begin, like that of Homer, with inferior animals, among dogs and mules, but in the fairest and choicest part of the creation, with those, whose fineness of texture makes them weak; whose susceptibility most exposes them to contagion; whose natures, being most excellent, are, for that very reason, capable of becoming most depraved; who, being formed to promote the happiness of the world, may, when "strained from that fair use," prove its bane and destruction; retaining, as they will still do, much of that empire which nature intended for them, over the minds and faculties of the other half of the species*. "The woman tempted me, and I did eat," will be to be said, I fear, of this second fall of man, as it was of the first. Sir, we heard much last year of the necessity of new laws to check the growing progress of vice and immorality. I suppose we hardly mean to persist in any such projects. It will be too childish to be busying ourselves in stopping every little crevice and aperture, through which vice may ooze in, when we are going to open at once the flood gates, and admit the whole tide of French practices and principles, till the morals of the two countries shall have settled at their common level.—I must beg here, not to be told, that of this kind of argument the only result is, that we should never make peace with France at all, until the monarchy should be restored. The argument implies no such thing. That no kind of peace with France will be safe, till then, I am not in the least disposed to deny : but the nature of human affairs does not admit of our getting always what we may think most admirable. We must take up often with what is far short of our ideas, either of advantage or safety. The question at present is, whether in either of those views, we ought to take up with the present peace : and among the evils incident to it, and immediately resulting from it, I state one, which, in conjunction with others, is to be weighed against its advantages ; namely, the havoc likely to be made by it in our principles and morals. If any one should be of opinion, that this consideration is of so much weight, that war, almost upon any terms, is preferable to peace with a state, founded upon a declared Atheism, and filled with all the abominations and pollutions certain to result from such an origin, it is not my business to dispute with him : but that is not the way in which the argument is applied here ; nor is it indeed applied in any way, otherwise than as a consideration, making part of the case, and to which every body is to allow what weight he shall think proper. The misfortune of the country has been, that it has never seen, and felt, fully, the extent of its danger. The country,—speaking of it in general, and not with a view to particular places, or classes of people, upon whom the pressure of the war has born with peculiar severity,—has been so rich, so prosperous, so happy ; men have enjoyed here in so superior a degree, and with such perfect freedom from molestation, all the blessings and comforts of life, that they have never been able to persuade themselves, that any real harm could befall them. Even those, who have clamoured most loudly about the dangers of the country, have given at times, the most exaggerated representations of them, have really, and when their opinions come to be examined, never described this danger as any thing truly alarming. For their danger has always been a provisional and hypothetical danger, such as we should be liable to, if we did not conform to such and such conditions : but as these conditions were always in our power, and are now, as we see, actually resorted to, our real and absolute danger was, in fact, none at all. “ You will be ruined if you continue the “ war ; but, make peace. and you are safe : ” and unquestionably, as there can hardly have been a period, when a peace, such as the present, was not in our power,—if such a peace can give us safety, there never was a period, when we could properly be said to have been in danger. We had a port always under our lee ; so that if it came to overblow, or the ship laboured too much, we had nothing to do, but to put up our helm, and run at once into a place of safety. But my ideas of the danger have always been of a far different sort. To me it has ever seemed, that the danger was not conditional but absolute : that it was a question whether we could be saved upon any other terms ; whether we could weather this shoal upon either tack.

The port appeared to me to be an enemy's port ; where, though we might escape the dangers of the sea, we should fall into the hands of the savages, who would never suffer us to see again our native land, but keep us in a state of thralldom, far more to be dreaded than the utmost fury of the waves.—I have never pretended to say, that there were not dangers in war, as unquestionably there are great evils ; I have said only that there were evils and dangers, not less real and certain, in peace, particularly in a peace, made on such terms as the present. For terms of peace, in spite of what we here talked, have something to do with rendering our situation more or less secure, even in those respects in which they are supposed to operate least. In general, though terms, however advantageous, would not secure us against the mischiefs of French fraternity, and the infusions of French principles and morals, yet they would make a little difference. I apprehend, as to the effect which Peace would produce in the feelings of Europe ; as to the air of success and triumph which it would give to the enemy, and of defeat and humiliation, which it would impress upon us ; as to the consequences resulting from thence, even with respect to the propagation of French principles, but certainly as to the confirmation of French power ; and, above all, as to the situation in which we should stand, should France choose to force us again into a war. The port of Malta, strong as it is, would not, literally, serve as a bulwark to stop the incursions of Jacobinism : figuratively, it would not be without its effect in that way : yet there would be some difference, I conceive, at the beginning of a war, whether we were in possession of Malta or not ; and in the mean-while, the knowledge of that difference, in the minds of the enemy, and of ourselves, would be quickly felt, in any discussions which might take place between us, in time of peace.

The dangers of peace, therefore, are augmented a hundred-fold by terms at once so degrading and injurious, as those to which we have submitted : on any terms on which it could have been concluded, it would have had its dangers, and dreadful ones too ; France remaining a revolutionary government, and being, as it is, in possession of Europe. Whether that evil must not ultimately have been submitted to ; whether the hopes of change, either from coalitions without, or commotions within, might not have become so small, and the evils of war, however mitigated, so great, that we must have made up our minds, after taking the best securities against those dangers that we could, finally to have acquiesced in them, is a separate question, which I will not now discuss. But the time in my opinion was not come when such unqualified acquiescence on our part was requisite ; when we were to cease to enquire what these securities were ; or when we ought to have taken up with such securities, if securities they can be called, as are offered by the present treaty. The great misfortune has been, that this question of peace has never yet been fully and fairly before the country. We have been taken up with the war ; that was the side of the alternative next to us ; —and have never yet, till it was too late, had our attention fairly directed, or, I must say, fairly summoned, to the dreadful picture on the other side. If we had, we should never have heard, except among the ignorant and disaffected, of joy and exultation through the land, at a peace such as the present.—Here, Sir, I have nearly closed this subject. One only topic remains, a most important one indeed, but which I should have been induced, perhaps, on the present occasion, to pass over in silence, if in one part of it I did not feel myself called upon, by something of a more than ordinary duty—When a great military monarch of our time* was at the lowest ebb of his fortunes, and had sustained a defeat, that seemed to extinguish all his remaining hopes, the terms of his letter, written from the field of battle, were—“We have lost every thing, but our honour.” Would to God, that the same consolation, in circumstances liable to become in time not less disastrous, remained to Great-Britain ! I should feel a far less painful load of depression upon my mind, than weighs upon it at this moment. But is our honour saved in this transaction ? Is it in a better plight than those two other objects of our consideration, which I have before touched upon, our dignity and our security ? I fear not. I fear that we have contrived to combine in this proceeding, all that is at once ruinous and disgraceful ; all that is calculated to undo us in reputation as well as in fortune, and to deprive us of those resources, which high fame and unsullied character may create, “even under the ribs of death,” when all ordinary means of relief and safety seem to be at an end. I am speaking here, not of the general discredit that attaches to this precipitate retreat and flight out of the cause of Europe, and of all mankind ; but of the situation in which we stand with respect to those allies, to whom we were bound by distinct and specific engagements. I must be very slow to admit that construction which considers as a breach of treaty anything done by a contracting power, under a clear bonâ fide necessity, such as the other party itself does not pretend to dispute. If an absolute conquest of one of the parties to an alliance does not absolve the other from the obligation which it has contracted, so neither can a timely submission, made in order to avert such conquest, when the remaining party itself shall not be able to describe that submission as injurious either to her own interest, or to that of the common cause. If we were not in a state to say to Sardinia, that it was better for us that she should continue her resistance, rather than accept the terms offered her ; then, I say, we are not in a state to consider her submission as a forfeiture of the claims which she had upon us. We have left Sardinia, however, without an attempt to relieve her, without even a helping hand stretched out to support or to cheer her, under that ruin which she has brought upon herself, with no fault on her part, while adhering faithfully to her treaty with us, I must call that adherence faithful, which has continued as long as we ourselves could say, that it was of any use.—The case of Sardinia is, with no great variation, the case of Holland also. Both powers were our allies ; both are ruined, while adhering to that alliance ; both are left to their fate. But Sardinia and Holland are two only of our allies ; and placed in circumstances of peculiar difficulty. There were others, it may be said, more capable of being assisted, for whose security and protection every thing has been done, that the most scrupulous fidelity could require. Naples, Portugal, and Turkey, will attest to the end of time, the good faith of Great-Britain ; and shew to the world that she is not a power, who ever seeks her own safety by abandoning those with whom she has embarked in a common cause. Sir, if I were forced to make a comparison between the instances, in which we plainly and openly desert our allies, and those in which we affect to protect them, I should say, without hesitation, that those of the former class were the least disgraceful of the two ; because our protection is in fact nothing else but a desertion, with the addition of that ridicule which attaches upon things, that endeavour to pass for the reverse of what they really are.—The protection which we yield to these unfortunate powers, is much of the same sort with that which Don Quixote gives to the poor boy, whom he releases from the tree ; when he retires with perfect complacency and satisfaction, assuring him, that he has nothing more to fear, as his master is bound by the most solemn promise not to attempt to exercise against him any further severity. We know, Sir, what respect was paid to this promise, as soon as the knight was out of sight ; and it is not difficult to foretell what respect will be paid by Buonaparté, (without waiting even, I am afraid, till my Honourable Friends shall be out of sight), to this solemn stipulation and pledge, by which we have provided so effectually for the security of the dominions of our good and faithful allies.—The ridicule of this provision, which in any case would be sufficiently strong, has, undoubtedly, in the case of Turkey, something of a higher and livelier relish ; Turkey being the power, in whose instance, and with respect to precisely the same party, the total insufficiency and nullity of such engagements has been so strikingly manifested, and is still kept so fresh in our memories, by the very operations with which the war has closed.—So much as to our conduct towards those powers, with whom we stood in the relation of allies, according to the usual diplomatick forms ; and whom the common policy of Europe had been accustomed to consider under these and similar relations.

But there was another body of allies, not ranked indeed among the European powers, nor possessing much, perhaps, of a corporate capacity, but who, as men, acting either separately or together, were equally capable of becoming objects of good faith, and in fact had so become, though by means different, in point of form, from those which engaged the faith of the country, in any of the instances above alluded to:—These persons were, the royalists of France, wheresoever dispersed, but particularly that vast body of them which so long maintained a contest against the republick, in the West; where they formed the mass of the inhabitants of four or five great provinces, far exceeding, both in extent and population, the kingdom of Ireland.* I mention these particulars of their force and numbers, not because they are material to the present purpose, but because they serve to obviate that delusion of the understanding, by which things, small in bulk, and filling but little space in the imagination, are apt to lose their hold on our interests and affections. The mention of them may, moreover, not be unnecessary in this House, where, I fear, from various causes, all that relates to the royalists is a perfect terra incognita, as little known or considered, as the affairs of a people in another hemisphere. The royalists were, however, a great, numerous, and substantive body, capable of maintaining against the republic a war, confessed by the republicans themselves to have been more formidable and bloody, than most of those in which they had been engaged; and of terminating that war by a peace, which showed sufficiently what the war had been, and what the fears were, which the republick entertained, of its possible final success. But let the numbers and powers of the royalists have been what they might; had their affairs been still less considered; had they been more disowned, discountenanced, and betrayed, than in many instances they were; had more such garrisons as those of Mentz and Valenciennes been suffered to be sent against them;† had they been less the real, primary defenders and representatives of that cause, which the allies professed to support; still there were our formal proclamations, issued at various periods, not expressly engaging indeed to make stipulations for them in case of a peace, but calling generally for their exertions, and promising succour and protection, to all those who should declare themselves in favour of the ancient order of things, and of their hereditary and rightful monarch. What I am to ask, is, have we acted up to the spirit, or even the letter, of our own proclamations? or to the spirit of that relation, in which the nature of the war itself, independent of any proclamations, placed us with respect to these people? I am, compelled to say, (I say it with great reluctance, as well as with great grief,) I fear we have done no such thing. I fear, that a stain is left upon our annals, far deeper than that, which, in former times, many were so laudably anxious to wash away, in respect to the conduct of this country towards the Catalans. The Catalans were not invited by any declarations more specific than those which we have made to the royalists: their claim upon us was in some respects more doubtful. Yet, so far were they from being passed over in silence in the terms of the peace; so far were they from being abandoned to their fate, left to the merciless persecution of their enemies, that a stipulation was made for a full and complete amnesty for them; and, far more than that, a provision, that they should be put upon the same footing, and enjoy the same privileges, with that province which was in fact the most favoured under the Spanish monarchy. Yet, because more was not done; because they were not placed in the situation of enjoying all that they asked;—much of it, perhaps, having more of an imaginary than a real value;—because in a part, where their claim was more disputable, perfect and entire satisfaction was not given them; did a large and respectable majority of this House think it necessary to institute a solemn inquiry,—the intended foundation of proceedings still more solemn,—in order to purge themselves and the country, as far as depended on them, from the shame of what they deemed a breach of the national faith. —By what purgations, by what ablutions, shall we cleanse ourselves from this far deeper and fouler blot, of having left to perish under the knives of their enemies, without even an effort to save them, every man of those whom we have affected, as it must now appear, to call our friends and allies; with whom we were bound, by interests of far higher import than those of a disputed succession; who were the assertors with us of the common morality of the world; who were the true depositories of that sacred cause, the very priests of that holy faith; with whom we had joined, as it were, in a solemn sacrament; and who, on all these grounds, but chiefly for the sin of having held communion with us, are now, as might be expected, doomed by the fanatics of rebellion, to be the objects of never-ceasing hostility, to be pursued as offenders, whose crimes can only be expiated by their destruction? —I agree with what has been said by my Honourable Friend [Chancellor of the Exchequer], that peace once made, all communication with this, or any other class of people, hostile to the French government, must completely cease. Whatever the government is, or whatever its conduct may be with respect to us, if we think fit to make peace with it, that peace must be religiously kept. I am not for curing one breach of faith, by another. But was nothing to be done, in the final settlement of that peace; and still more during the time which has elapsed since the first commencement of the negotiations? I wish a satisfactory answer could be given to those inquiries. I wish it were true, that, for months past, numbers had not been perishing throughout the royalist provinces, the victims of their loyalty and honour;—(men hunted down, like wild beasts, for acts, which that government may call crimes, but which we, I hope, have not yet learned so to characterize;)—simply for want of such means, as might have enabled them to effect their escape, and, after the loss of every thing but what their own minds must bestow, to have sought an asylum in some foreign land.—Sir, I would gladly draw a veil over these facts. But our shame is too flagrant and glaring, to be concealed: the cry of this blood is too loud to be stifled. I beg to wash my hands of it. The share which I have happened to have in the affairs of his illustrious and unfortunate people; the interest which I have always taken in their cause; make me doubly anxious to vindicate myself from any participation in the guilt of having thus abandoned them. I wish I could vindicate, in like manner, the government and the country. Among all our shames, it is that of the most fatal nature, and of which, possibly, we shall longest rue the effects.*—Sir, I have done. I have stated, as I thought it my duty to do, what my apprehensions are, as to the nature and consequences of the present peace. If the evils, which I impute to it, are not to be found there, if the dangers which I apprehend should not come to pass, no one will more rejoice in my error than myself: those who differ from me will have nothing to complain of; I shall have alarmed myself; I shall not, probably, even have to reproach myself with having succeeded in alarming them. But if any there should be, (there are none I am sure in this House,) who should say, that my fears are not imaginary; that they think of this peace as I do; that they apprehend it will ruin the country; but that they hope the country may last long enough to serve their turn; that being traders, they think the trade of the country may be lost; that, being manufacturers, they believe its manufactures may decline; but that for this they care but little, provided the peace in the mean time shall prove advantageous to them;—to all such, if any there can be, there could be but one answer,—that they are a disgrace to their country and to their species; and that he must be as bad as they, who, upon such terms, could seek to merit their good opinion, or could solicit their favour. I trust, however, that no such men are to be found; but that all who rejoice in the present peace, do it under a persuasion, that the good which they may hope to derive from it, individually, is not to be obtained by the sacrifice of the final welfare and safety of their country.

MR. WILBERFORCE began by observing,

that himself and his friends had much reason to complain of the Hon. Gentleman (Mr. Windham); not but what he gave that Hon. Gentleman every credit for sincerity, but he still thought himself and his friends had a considerable ground of complaint. That Hon. Gentleman had publicly declared, that he considered the peace as the death-warrant of the country. When it was known that peace was concluded, a general joy ensued; he (Mr. Wilberforce) equally rejoiced, entertaining a confidence in his Majesty's ministers, that the terms would be consistent with the dignity and honour of the country. When those terms were published, he found that confidence not misplaced, and the general joy still continued. But he wished particularly to observe, that the administration of which that Hon. Gentleman was a member, had twice treated with the enemy. He and his friends had supported that administration; and, placing a confidence in the honour of that Hon. Gentleman, had supposed those overtures for peace had been made in the true spirit of sincerity. Surely, then, they had reason to complain, when the same arguments which the Hon. Gentleman had adduced, *would operate against the treaty at Lisle, and against any peace whatever with the enemy. He was ready to acknowledge, that he too saw danger arising from the peace; but if he was sure that the war would be renewed even in three months, he would still give his consent to the peace. For by making the peace, we should shew to all Europe that we were guided by dignity and moderation, by magnanimity and good faith, and should gain the confidence and esteem of the Continent. Was it possible the Hon. Gentleman could suppose that England could conquer France by arms? We were never engaged in a continental war without being aided by a powerful confederacy. But whatever might be the dangers arising from the peace, he did not see how those dangers could be lessened by keeping our conquests in the West-Indies or elsewhere. He always considered the war to be undertaken against a Jacobin government, who, it was presumed, held the people in subjection, and prevented them from declaring their real sentiments, but he never placed confidence in ministers, under the idea that the war was to be carried on for the purpose of enthroning a King at Paris, and maintaining him in his power by force of arms. Was there any chance of success, or of making any impression upon France by means of continuing the war? He thought not, and if that was not the case, it was the duty of the country to make peace, more particularly when the government of France promised stability, was supported by the people, and capable of giving a pledge of confidence to surrounding nations. The Hon. Gentleman had objected to the terms of the treaty; but in his opinion, they were wise and just. England had been stigmatized by the states of Europe as endeavouring to monopolize the commerce of the world; and surely it was wise in her to give a proof of moderation in opposition to the charge, and to shew to those states that she could be moderate even in the midst of success. When the future historian came to delineate the situation of this country, deserted by all her allies, and visited by Providence with the dreadful calamity of scarcity, yet maintaining, single-handed, a contest against France, and finally concluding a peace, in which she not only gave up no part of her territory, but acquired additional guards and securities for her possessions, how high an opinion must be formed of the energies and the resources of Great Britain? There was one article of the treaty on which he wished to make an observation; he alluded to the 5th article, which related to the guarantee of the dominions of the Ottoman Porte. This article had been construed to mean, that England and France should unitedly defend the territories of the Porte against all attacks. To this he must object, as it would bind England to do that which must depend upon a thousand circumstances, and might eventually become highly inexpedient and improper. He only wished that England should be left an option to act according to circumstances. He would only trouble the House further with an observation relative to the acquisition of the island of Trinidad, as it involved an object, the abolition of which he had much at heart, namely, the slave-trade, which his not bringing forward sooner was to be ascribed to his fear of injuring the measure by precipitancy. The island of Trinidad would, according to the best information, require one million of slaves to cultivate it, and the employment of 140,000,000. or 150,000,000. of capital. He trusted it would not be made the means of supporting the slave-trade, but rather to assist its abolition. He concluded by exhorting the superior classes of society to set the example of morality and virtue in their conduct, that others might not be led to imitate those manners which had already become too prevalent, and the increase of which he feared.

Dr. LAURENCE took a very wide view of the important subject before the House, the result of which was a strong condemnation of the preliminaries. He began by expressing his marked disapprobation of the vague manner in which they were drawn up. As we never by any treaty made such sacrifices, so never by any treaty was there left such room for alteration. He once thought he might have done some service by pointing out these omissions and inaccuracies, but the errors of Ministers were now irremediable. Marquis Cornwallis was sent to Amiens, bound hand and foot. The French had been told that we were so eager for peace, or rather that peace was so necessary to us, that there were no sacrifices which we would not make to obtain it. The treaty of Utrecht had been quoted a little unfortunately, he thought, on this occasion, the Ministers who concluded it having been impeached. He could, however, have been contented to see it brought to point a moral, or adorn a tale, had not all its principles, which had procured us near a century of prosperity, been now completely abolished. He expressed unbounded indignation at the language used by some Gentlemen, ascribing to Ministers moderation and magnanimity, inasmuch as in the hour of success they had consented to terms, perhaps rather lower than they had a right to demand. Necessity was the only plea they could urge, and when they abandoned that, they laid themselves open to the most serious charge of misconduct. The Learned Doctor then went into a long history of the war, and explained the views of the different parties since its commencement. Afterwards he went on to draw a very alarming picture of the acquisitions of France, and of the deplorable situation in which we are left by the peace. The subjects of quarrel, he said, were immense, and we had no security but the Chief Consul might employ some one of them as soon as he had stripped us of our conquests. We could never begin a new war in such favourable circumstances as those in which we ended the present. He could hope little from our commerce. When a philosopher was shewn by an eastern monarch his immense treasures, he replied, that the possessors of iron would soon get possession of it. The embassy of the Marquis Cornwallis might illustrate this still better. He and his suite appeared in the utmost magnificence of dress and equipage, while they were received on the road by not the most superbly clothed, but the most military looking corps in France. It was a well-known fact, that those troops who escorted him from stage to stage were all picked grenadiers. In as far as concerned our allies, the treaty was disgraceful in the extreme. After going over our different allies, he lamented in a manner peculiarly bitter the hard fate of the Prince of Orange. Who would have expected, he asked, that almost on the anniversary of the landing of King William to free us from slavery, his representative should be betrayed by us, and ruined, for no other reason than because he had adhered to our cause with unshaken constancy? For a lesson of fidelity to their allies, he desired Ministers to look to the French. Never once had they been driven from any city or country without expressly stipulating for the protection and safety of those who had befriended them. Cooped up in Alexandria, Menou had refused to capitulate unless the English undertook for the security, in their persons and property, of Copts and Egyptians, Mahomettans and Christians, Jacobites and Jacobins. (By Jacobites, he said, he meant a religious sect known by that name.) Henceforth it would come to pass, that when the smaller states were obliged to choose a power.

ful ally, they would look to France. There they might expect protection, but from us only ingratitude and dereliction. He concluded by saying, that he was far from wishing to carry on the war for ever, but he did wish to see it carried on till we could have peace. That state did not deserve the name which required us to remain in arms and to submit to an abridgment of our liberties.—Dr. Laurence condemned, in very severe terms, the declaration of Mr. Wilberforce, who had expressed his approbation of the peace, even though it should last but three months.

Mr. WILBERFORCE, in explanation, said, that he had not said three months, but six months!!!!

Mr. ELIOT said, that his mind was filled with the most gloomy and desponding apprehensions. He looked upon the peace as absolute and unqualified ruin. All the objects for which the war had been undertaken were at once given up, and we were now surrounded by accumulated danger. The treaty abrogated the public law of Europe, and went to abolish the title of sovereigns to their crowns. We allowed ourselves to be second to France, a situation in which we could not long exist, to such a degree were we envied by the rest of Europe. He saw no improvement in the dispositions of the Chief Consul. Did he now shew less audacity of enterprise or malignity of intrigue? Was his amendment to be discerned in the late transactions in Holland or Switzerland, or in the tragi-comedy acted at Florence? He continued to dictate new constitutions to his vassal republics; and, to bring monarchy into contempt, set up a Prince of the House of Bourbon, after cruelly and wantonly dethroning the hereditary prince. The Hon. Gentlemen at down with observing, that he considered the treaty as a wasteful and unnecessary sacrifice of our honour and our interests, to procure a delusive and short-lived tranquillity.

The SECRETARY at WAR said, that the first thing he should take notice of, was the danger to which this country was said to be exposed by the peace now before the House. That danger arose from the geographical situation of France, and its relative condition with respect to this country. The geographical situation of France was certainly matter of just apprehension to this country; but the question to be considered as arising out of that apprehension was, whether there was any reasonable hope, by a continuation of the war, of reducing the power of France? If there was any hope of our being able to do so by another campaign, or by a number of campaigns, or that by them we could obtain security against the power of France, he should have thought it prudent to try the effect of such campaigns: but however well we might be convinced of the danger to us from the situation of France, if it was not in the power of this country to affect that power in any material degree by a continuation of the war, then the continuation would be useless. As long as we were able to have the alliance of the great powers of the continent to act cordially for the purpose of reducing the power of France, he had always been of opinion, it was for the interest of this country to act in co-operation with that confederacy, to make a common cause against the power of France. That confederacy, however, could not now be formed. It was impossible for any one to regret it more than he did; but what could we do if the coalition could not be formed? The last campaign had been as brilliant on our part as any that had ever taken place (the particulars of which he recited), but still he did not see what we were to gain by continuing the war. Indeed he did not see that we could do better than to adopt the course held out yesterday by his Noble Friend (Lord Hawkesbury), who had forcibly and happily conveyed his meaning by saying we should adopt a system of mixed conciliation and firmness; a policy without which he apprehended this country could not long preserve its present prosperity.

Mr. HOBHOUSE said, that, with regard to the preliminaries, he would be glad if those Gentlemen who had spoken of them as loose and vague, would shew in what part of them they had discovered such defect. For his own part he could see none such, and he totally denied any such principle apparent in that article by which France and England mutually agreed not to invade any part of the Turkish territory, or could bind either power to guarantee the Turkish territories, either against internal commotions, or attacks from other powers. He was fully satisfied with the explanation already given to the treaty, so far as regarded the integrity of the Portuguese territory; and that his Majesty's Ministers, though it might have been indecorous towards France to have made any stipulations in favour of the French loyalists, whom the French government would esteem as rebels, part of a preliminary treaty, yet he was convinced, in the negotiation of the definitive articles, they would not fail to urge, on the part of these unfortunate persons, the best terms attainable. He felt no such gloomy apprehensions from the peace as those Gentlemen who disapproved it, seemed to express: on the contrary, he saw in it every reason to rejoice, that his Majesty's Ministers, from the liberality, candour, and moderation they had manifested in the attainment of an object so truly desirable, were entitled to the highest praise. It was, he hoped, a presage of the candour, liberality, and moderation, which would mark their future measures, and on that ground they should have his confidence and support.

Mr. BAKER said, that the great question for the House to decide was, whether the terms of the peace were adequate to our situation, considering it with relation to the situation of France; and upon the best consideration he was able to give the subject, he was inclined to think they were.

Mr. DAWSON said, that he felt himself fully justified in giving his decided approbation to a measure which he thought calculated to produce the most beneficial effects to the United Kingdom, and especially to that part of it to which he had the honour more particularly to belong. If he were asked whether he thought this peace was likely to be secure, he had no hesitation in answering that question in the affirmative. With regard to the terms, he had such an opinion of the present Administration, that he was convinced they were as good as could be obtained.

Mr. W. WYNNE said, he could not look upon the peace with the same sentiments of satisfaction as many Gentlemen had done, because he thought it was one big with danger to the country.

COLONEL WOOD said, no man felt more than he did the danger which threatened this country from the overgrown power of France; but under all the circumstances of the times, he approved of the peace. He then proceeded to investigate the terms, which he considered, if not such as could be wished, yet such as afforded great additional security to the possessions of this country in the East and in the West Indies.

Mr. ELLISON observed, that though he had from principle supported the war, as deeming it aggressive on the part of France, he was friendly in the highest degree to the peace achieved by his Majesty's present Ministers, who, he thought, had acted wisely, and particularly on the present occasion. He repelled the idea, that the country was in a state of humiliation; on the contrary, he thought her recent conduct peculiarly glorious to her.—She was true to her allies, and had adequately asserted her own honour and interests. He thanked Ministers for what they had done: his best support and influence was at their service. The peace, he trusted, would unite every heart and hand in the country in support of its Government, and render Britain in effect as impregnable as Malta itself; and he trusted the blessings of peace would be commensurate to the wishes of a patriotic Minister.

Mr. NICHOLLS was confident that the peace would prove safe with respect to this country in every point of view.—The principles of France were much altered from what they had been. He expressed his conviction of the sincerity of the French government.—Much seemed to be apprehended from France becoming a commercial nation; that her character in that respect would alter; he wished it might. He had rather see her attention turned to commerce and to her colonies, than her power employed in dangerous, hostile, or destructive projects. In this view, he wished she might regain the entire possession of St. Domingo, and he wished it with a view to the safety of our own West India islands, and of Jamaica in particular; for in the present situation of St. Domingo, that invaluable island could not be safe. He was induced to commend the moderation displayed by Bonaparte, particularly with respect to Austria, which he thought was highly honourable to him. If riches were the object of the French, they who were an enlightened and wise people well knew that they were not to be acquired by the means of plunder and pillage.

Mr. BABINGTON made some general remarks upon the preliminaries, as well as some observations upon what had fallen in the course of the debate. He observed that he entertained a political jealousy with respect to guarantees in general, though he was aware circumstances might arise which may render those measures expedient, and concluded by observing, that Russia and Austria were the natural allies of this country, as forming the most efficacious reciprocal checks upon France*.

Mr. R. THORNTON spoke highly in approbation of the peace, for which he thought Ministers deserved the thanks and gratitude of the country: it was the more acceptable, as unexpected by the great body of the people; and he had reason to think Ministers had obtained the most favourable terms that possibly could be got.^{*} He likewise commended the secrecy with which the negotiations were conducted. France, he observed, might be increased in bulk; but she was not proportionally so, in real strength and muscle. Peace was desirable at almost any rate; and that treaty which terminated the American war, though at first so strongly reprobated, he thought favourable to this country.

Mr. OGLE observed, that with respect to that part of the United Kingdom to which he had the honour to belong, not a man of loyalty in that country who did not receive the tidings of the peace with joy and satisfaction, and on the contrary, not a rebel or a disaffected individual who did not receive it with disapprobation and regret.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said, that, by what had fallen from the Right Hon. Gentleman who spoke last, he understood, and that too from an authority which he had no reason to doubt, that those Hon. Gentlemen who so highly disapprove of the peace, were countenanced in that disapprobation by the feelings and opinions of the disaffected, and so far as their feeling was hurt at the peace, their feelings, unexpectedly no doubt by them, were in unison with those of the United Irish. The Right Hon. Gentleman (Mr. Windham) seemed to think that peace could not be sincerely made on both sides, or firmly established with France, until not only the government and political principles of France were changed, but even until the morals and manners of her people were radically reformed. With respect to these measures, he should observe, that an answer to them all was comprised in a question asked by that Right Hon. Gentleman himself:—“Are we never to be at peace?” He would answer—“Yes;” and at the same time would say, that he hoped and trusted, that upon the principles cited from his Right Hon. Friend, the Government or the Parliament of Great Britain would never be influenced to act. He had necessarily the highest respect for the character of his Right Hon. Friend.—He well knew the uprightness and firmness of his principles, and the ardour and sincerity of his patriotism. His regret at differing from him in points of such incalculable importance, was therefore the more considerable. His Right Hon. Friend had seemed to start at the bare idea of an end to our resources. With respect to these, he certainly could not say they were inexhaustible, yet, God be thanked, the national resources were far from being in that situation which some Gentlemen in the course of debate seemed to consider them; and he would observe, that it was, as much as any other, in the contemplation of their being farther removed from such a state, that he rejoiced that the Sovereign had yielded to the advice of his confidential servants, in consenting to those preliminaries of peace which had so decidedly met the cordial approbation of Parliament. With respect to what had been said, in a comparative view, in regard to the negotiations at Lisle, he displayed much acuteness of remark, and contended that, in the way of argument, those who defended the preliminaries had a right to put the case as they had done, and that the House, which approved of the negotiations at Lisle, could not, in consistency or justice, refuse their approbation in this instance. It had been said, that the continental power of France was not abridged, and that Britain was confessedly unable to contest that power. It was never meant to say, that the power of Great Britain was not such, that, if properly used, it may, with every desirable effect, be placed in the scale opposite to that of France; in this idea, he did not mean hostilely opposed, but in the way of comparison of their political power and influence. He must revolt at the idea, that because France had made considerable acquisitions, England could not raise its head—far from it; and in proof of which he had only to desire those who doubted, to look at the state of our armies and navy, and consider their achievements—to contemplate our national commerce, resources, and wealth, and, above all, our inestimable constitution. He should not omit, in a statement of this kind, the extent of our dominions and possessions, as well at home as abroad: added to this, let the national character of both countries be thrown into the scale of consideration, and then compare the whole with all that France possessed, and he had no hesitation in putting the question, let any wise and candid man put his hand upon his heart, and say on which side lay the advantage.

Mr. ELIOT, after speaking of the estimates, said, that he thought, that when the Noble Lord (Hawkesbury) put his signature to the preliminaries of peace, he put his hand to an instrument fraught with danger and humiliation to this country, to an instrument from which posterity would date the decline of this country. Parliament, however, had thought otherwise; and, as he had before stated, he submitted to their judgment. But he hoped he might be permitted to observe, that although the House had given the sanction of its approbation to those preliminary articles, it was not bound to adhere to the opinion it expressed on a former occasion, if all the circumstances upon which that opinion was given had been since that time completely changed. He was particularly anxious to guard the House against the doctrine, that, by agreeing to the preliminaries of peace, they had deprived themselves of the right of animadverting upon circumstances which had no connexion with them. One of the circumstances to which he alluded was, the extraordinary scene which had lately been played in Italy. Many people, he believed, were induced to approve of the preliminaries, from a hope that the government of France would in future act with a degree of moderation, and endeavour to consolidate the power she had acquired. They thought, that although the Cisalpine republic was in a considerable degree under the influence of France, yet that she might by degrees acquire a sort of independence, and form a kind of barrier between France and Italy. But subsequent events had completely undeceived those who entertained such hopes, and had shewn them, that they were ignorant of that furious lust of power which actuated the government of France. If that government had stopped in her career for a moment, it was only to take breath, that she might renew it with redoubled vigour. We had seen an immense force sail from the ports of France, Spain, and Holland, without, as he believed, any communication of the specific object of that expedition. We had seen the Chief Consul of France go to Lyons, and, without any communication to any of the powers of Europe, declare that there was not one person in all the states which composed the Cisalpine republic, fit to be intrusted with the government of that country, and that, therefore, he would take it upon himself. He was, he confessed, seriously alarmed at this mode of reasoning which the Chief Consul had adopted; because, if we submitted to this encroachment, it was impossible to say that he might not, at a future period, apply it to this country, and graciously condescend to take us under his protection. The Chief Consul then returned to Paris, after having made himself President of the Italian republic, annexed all that rich country to France, and converted it into cantonments for French troops. But this was not all; he had also acquired the whole of the island of Elbâ: that island was, by the treaty of Luneville, to be annexed to the Dutchy of Tuscany, and immediately after he stipulated for the possession of Porto Ferrajo. Another point to which he must call the attention of the House, was, that France had, by another treaty, acquired a very considerable territory on the banks of the Mississippi, and had acquired the means of supplying her West India islands independent of this country. He did not mean, now, to ask in what situation we stood with relation to the President of the Italian republic, whether it was a relation of peace or war; but he could not help entering his protest against that act of fraud, ambition, and insolence; for, upon this subject, he could use no other language. But he did hope the Noble Lord would explain to the Committee, and to the country, how it happened, that when we were discussing the preliminaries of peace, we thought we were giving Porto Ferrajo to Tuscany, when, in fact, we were giving it to France; and how it happened, that when we were giving back to France her West India possessions, we did not know that she had acquired possessions in that quarter, which would render her colonies much more advantageous to her. He did, however, believe that the Ministers were, at that time, themselves ignorant of these circumstances. If however, instead of treating with France in the name of her allies, we had treated with those allies conjointly with her, it was impossible but we must have known the relation in which she stood to other countries. If Ministers had not taken the necessary means to inform themselves upon this subject, they were guilty of negligence; if they did ask the question, and got no satisfactory answer, they were wrong in suffering the country to be treated with such indignity. He must now allude to another circumstance, which formed a lamentable supplement to what he had already stated, which was, that since the signing of the preliminaries, a very large portion of the French, Spanish, and Dutch navies, had sailed from their ports.

LORD HAWKESBURY said, that the Committee would not expect him, he was sure, to enter into a discussion upon all the points of the Hon. Gentleman's speech, being perfectly ready, as he before stated, to enter into the fullest investigation of the conduct of Ministers when the proper season arrived. The Hon. Gentleman had thought proper, in the course of his speech, to make a personal allusion to him, with respect to his having signed the preliminaries of peace. Upon that subject he could state with the greatest sincerity, that, whatever the result of that event might be, he should never regret the share he had had in that transaction, which he should always contend was creditable to this country, and gave to Europe the only chance for A LONG CONTINUANCE OF PEACE!!!! Gentlemen might talk of the bad consequences of a peace, but he begged they would also consider what might be the bad consequences of a war, and that, before they decided, they would balance the inconveniences of both together. The experiment of peace was, at least, as wise as the experiment of continuing the war.

MR. CORNWALLIS said, that with regard to the expedition, there were no reasons before the House to induce them to suppose that it had not a fair object, though perhaps it might not be proper for his Majesty's Ministers to state every thing within their knowledge upon the subject; but even supposing that the expedition had sailed with a hostile intention, which he really did not believe, still there was not the least ground for apprehension, because we had a force more than sufficient to resist any attack which they might be inclined to make, and our fleets would in that case be enabled to meet them in the open sea, instead of being employed for years in merely counting the French fleet in the harbour of Brest. If, therefore, he was a friend to the continuance of the war, which he really was not, the sailing of that fleet would be to him a matter rather of satisfaction than regret.

MR. WINDHAM said, that the more we relied upon the spirit of the government we treated with, the more deplorable must be our condition, if the fact was, that there was a determined spirit of hostility, and that the continued purpose and aim of that government was to destroy the greatness and prosperity of this country. There might be assurances of friendship and peace; but let the conduct of our adversary be examined, and it must be too evident to be disputed, that it was the settled purpose of France to subvert the greatness of this country. When a preliminary treaty was made, it had always been the practice that hostilities should cease; that both parties should stand still, and that neither should do any thing to the injury of the other. In the case of a truce relative to besieged towns, a stop was put to the effusion of human blood, and the operations on each side were suspended: the besiegers were not allowed to make new works, nor the besieged to repair the old ones. The case was exactly similar with respect to a treaty between two countries. It was to be observed, however, that there were two orders of circumstances which affected treaties; the one, those events which happened subsequent to the conclusion of the treaty; the other, those which happened previous to that period, but which were not known till afterwards. These latter circumstances might not be known to either party; but if any circumstance, calculated to affect the articles of that treaty, was known to one party, and concealed at the time of making the treaty from the other, it was undoubtedly a fraud, and must set aside that treaty. The treaty might be affected in this way from the nature of the articles themselves: if any particular island or country was ceded, the article containing that cession was definite and certain; but there were other articles of a more indefinite nature. Thus, for instance, the article which guaranteed those territories and dominions which constituted the integrity of Portugal.—If it was found that at the period of making the preliminary treaty, another treaty had been concluded which altered the integrity of Portugal that was meant to be guaranteed, and which treaty was not communicated to this country at the time of concluding the preliminary treaty, then surely the House must think, that a preliminary treaty, thus concluded, could not be acted upon without dishonour. His Hon. Friend had done no more than his duty, in calling the attention of the House to the situation of the country: what had been done ought to be stated fairly; what was to be done, was another question: and whether it was proper or not to take any measure upon this subject, he was not disposed to say, but the House ought to have the whole situation of the country before it. Whether any step was to be taken, could not now be considered; but if the House would not consider the subject—if they would not decide upon those steps which ought to be taken—if they would view the subject with an apathy which seemed to him fatally to prevail—if they would co-operate with, and sanction measures without a requisite discussion—if they would go on with a kind of blindness which he could only compare to the judicial blindness mentioned in Holy Writ, then the existence of the country could only be estimated by months. Let them look at the state of Europe—there were only two powers remaining, Austria and Russia; all the rest were swallowed up by the power of France, and he clearly saw that this country would only be left to be the last devoured. It was evidently the purpose of France to aim at universal empire—it was evidently their intention to destroy the commerce of this country. He would not take up the time of the Committee further upon the subject now: circumstances were continually arising out of it to give occasion to new discussions, and he thought his Hon. Friend had very fairly brought the subject before the House.

LORD CASTLEREAGH said, we were well acquainted with the operation of an European force in St. Domingo, and must be aware that 30,000 men, which was the extent of the force sent out by France, was not disproportionate to the object that was to be attained, if that force was to be met by an hostile opposition; and even if it was not, still, when the extent of St. Domingo was considered, and the number of garrisons which would be required, the force which was sent out was not of disproportionate magnitude. It appeared to him, that it could not have been the policy of this country to have objected to the sailing of the expedition from France. This must be apparent, if we looked to the state of the French colonies, as it must be equally the policy of this country as of France, that those colonies should be subjected to their former government. But it had been said, why suffer so many ships of the line to go out? if 30,000 men were necessary, these ships were not. This, if any event did take place, as had been predicted by some Gentlemen, would be undoubtedly for the advantage of this country, as it would be then easily found at a distance from its own ports. He did not see that the occasion called for the discussion of those abstract questions which had been raised, and which might tend to embarrass the operations of his Majesty's Ministers, and to commit the House with respect to the definitive treaty. He also thought that a delicacy ought to be observed in commenting upon those treaties which affected other powers. It was not proper that observations should go abroad upon such treaties, until the decision of those states was known, upon the subject in which their own security and safety might be involved, and how far they considered themselves to be affected by those treaties.

Dr. LAURENCE said, that neither his Hon. Friend nor himself objected to the delay in the negotiation; he thought it a favourable symptom on the part of his Majesty's Ministers, as it tended to prove that every thing was not abandoned, but that something yet remained as a matter of discussion: so far he approved of the delay, and wished it might be still longer, as additional security to this country might result from it. The Noble Lord had alluded to other treaties, but it should be recollected that this was wholly different from former treaties: in those, some basis was established as to the rights of other countries, as well as this; but in the present, no basis whatever was established; all former treaties were passed by, and no foundation whatever was laid for the present. His Hon. Friend had therefore, with a proper degree of jealousy, called the attention of the House to this subject, when those supplies were brought forward which were interwoven with it, and which it was impossible to vote as a matter of course. The Noble Lord (Hawkesbury) had said, he should be ready to give every requisite explanation at the proper time; there was no doubt of that, as at that time the Noble Lord must be ready. The Noble Lord (Castlereagh) had drawn a consolation from the French expedition to the West Indies, which his mind could not acknowledge; he could not see that any security was to be derived to us from any effect that could arise from the operations of that force. The Noble Lord had observed, however, that in case of any event happening, their fleet would easily be found: if this was to be a consolation, why was the French fleet blockaded in Brest in the course of the war, instead of being suffered to sail? It was now found to be an advantage that they should sail; but at the period alluded to, not even a small detachment was suffered to sail from Brest harbour; how much blame then was due to those Ministers who refused to permit any part of that fleet to quit its port, when the sailing of the whole must have been advantageous to this country? It seemed now, however, to be forgotten, that this fleet might do considerable mischief in the West Indies before we could operate against them; at any rate, the consolation was a very poor one, and not much deserving the attention of the House. He did not wish to go much at length into the discussion of the treaty by which Louisiana was ceded to France, only so far as it added to the power of that country: look at the colossus with one foot upon Amazonia and the other upon the Mississippi; look at it again, and see it ready to stretch out its hand to seize the West India islands. If they looked nearer home, the isle of Elba presented itself an instance of fraud on the part of France which ought to have set aside the treaty. Another instance was to be found in the circumstance of the Italian republic; this had hitherto been called the Cisalpine republic, which was in fact only another name for Cisalpine Gaul: but now that the First Consul of France was declared its President, it had assumed the name of the Italian republic, pointing, by its title, to the dominion of all Italy. With this republic it seemed to be a matter of uncertainty whether we were at peace or war: no stipulation had been made respecting it, nor was it included in the treaty, though one of the allies of France. This republic formed an instance of the never-ceasing ambition of France, a subject to which the attention of the Committee ought not to be called in vain. He trusted his Majesty's Ministers would exercise every care for the interests and honour of this country; the old system of Europe was broken to pieces, and new relations and new ties must be formed. They could not proceed too cautiously in so important a negotiation, and they ought to give that information to Parliament which would enable that House to form a deliberate judgment of what ought to be done to ensure the welfare of the country. They ought to request the advice of that deliberative body to whom were intrusted the interests of the nation, and who must decide eventually how far the termination of this negotiation was calculated to promote those interests. If, however, his Majesty's Ministers would not bring the subject before that House for its mature deliberation, he thought that even a longer delay ought to be allowed them for the deliberate discussion of so important a subject.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL said:—"It seems to me that the manner in which this debate has been conducted leads to no useful conclusion; nor has it been held up by Gentlemen on the other side, to any sound parliamentary purpose, as the Hon. Gentleman, and those who are with him, seem to think. They say, that the Administration of this country have detected fraud on the part of the persons with whom they are negotiating, and that such conduct on the other side puts an end to the engagement on our part. That may be the sense these Gentlemen entertain of the transactions of the negotiation between this country and France; but this I know, if it be, they have a manly duty to discharge. The Hon. Gentleman who spoke last, from the particular turn of his expression, has a manly duty to discharge, and that duty ought to find a manly spirit to perform it, by moving an address to his Majesty, to recall from Amiens the Minister who has so humiliated his country, as by this negotiation he thinks it has been humiliated. He ought to make some specific motion on the subject, that we may know what to do, instead of thus beating the air in vain. I think this mode of taking up this important subject, by piecemeal, very improper, and may be attended with serious inconveniences, and therefore deprecate this sort of proceeding. Why these irregular discontents in this House, these loud complaints, without propositions to remove them, these expectorations instead of clear expressions of discontent? Why not come forward in a manly manner to the House, and afford the House an opportunity of manifesting its patriotic feeling upon the subject, by rejecting the motion, as I apprehend it would, and setting the matter at rest? Indeed I do hope that this vicious practice of speaking upon a subject without intending to propose a practical conclusion, upon a subject so delicate as that of a pending negotiation, will be discontinued; it may increase to an enormous size of inconvenience by indulgence. I will not go over, at great length, the terms of various treaties between various nations: nor will I unfold every map, nor dust every document published on state affairs for centuries, nor trouble the House with crude observations upon them; I will be content with saying, the House has no reason to believe that Ministers will put up with any national indignity."

HOUSE OF COMMONS*, MARCH 5TH, 1802.

DR. LAURENCE said, that it was a notorious fact, that the plan of the French government, when the sword of arms was over, was to carry on a war of custom-house duties with us, and, if possible, to ruin our trade. This certainly called for the most serious attention of the Government of this country. This appeared by a pamphlet† published by a person of considerable consequence in the French government, for he was Under Secretary of State to Talleyrand. This book completely developed the plan of the French government to ruin our commerce. [Dr. Laurence then read a variety of extracts from the pamphlet in support of his assertion.] The principles laid down in this book, were not the mere opinions of the moment, but such as France had uniformly acted upon; and as a proof of this, he referred to the different treaties which France had made with other countries, in which this system had been invariably adhered to. All these circumstances ought to make us extremely watchful over our commercial interests. He therefore hoped that some plan of commercial intercourse between this country and France would be established before the definitive treaty was signed, because he was sure that after the treaty, we should not succeed in establishing one. If that object was secured before the definitive treaty was signed, the conspiracy which had been formed against our commerce would be unavailing; if it was not, the most serious consequences might be apprehended.

HOUSE OF LORDS, APRIL 12TH, 1802.

EARL CARLISLE rose to call the attention of the House to a matter in which the national honour, as well as our essential interests, are seriously involved, by the duplicity practised on the part of France, in signing the treaty of peace at Amiens. The 18th article of that treaty states, that the House of Orange, having sustained some losses of private property in the late republic of the United Provinces, now the Batavian republic, in consequence of the change in its constitution, a suitable compensation shall be made for the said losses. This treaty was signed on the 27th ult. and this country thought, no doubt, she was obtaining something for a family to which we are bound by various ties. But two hours before the signing took place, the Dutch minister retired to a corner of the room, and said to the French minister, The indemnifications of the House of Orange are not to come from the Batavian republic. The French minister, in fact, made a separate convention* with the Dutch minister to this effect; he made it without the knowledge of Marquis Cornwallis, who heard nothing of the circumstances till he arrived in this country. Here, then, we find France binding herself to England to do one thing, while she is at the same moment privately engaging herself to Holland that it shall not be done. His Lordship dwelt with force on the perfidy of France on this occasion, on the little reliance we can place on her faith, on the manner in which we have been duped, and the sacrifice made of the House of Orange, which was possessed of private property in Holland of the annual value of 100,000*l.* Since the House of Orange was shut out from obtaining indemnifications in Holland, where could it obtain them? Was England to give them? France certainly could not. Could they be obtained in Germany? This was not probable. Was the Prince of Orange to look for indemnification in Hanover? He would be a bold minister who would propose such a measure in the British cabinet. The House of Orange was left as much unprovided for as if it had not been at all noticed in the definitive treaty. Perhaps it would have been better had it not been noticed, as the act of exclusion would not then have been made. When it was objected to the preliminaries, that they stipulated nothing for our ally, it was answered in another place (by Lord Hawkesbury), that the passing over his claims then was to favour them elsewhere; but that the most particular instructions should be given to Marquis Cornwallis to take care of them in the definitive treaty. Such was the result, however. This country was duped. France, when she bound herself to indemnify the Prince of Orange, had previously engaged that he should not be indemnified in the only quarter where indemnity could be properly obtained, in Holland. His Lordship, after pressing this subject, took notice of the vague manner in which the definitive treaty was drawn up, and particularly the omission of confirming ancient treaties. This omission gave to France and Holland great advantages, which passed unnoticed, as they did not appear on the face of the definitive treaty. All the advantages which this country had obtained after a spirited struggle in 1787, by the convention then concluded by a Noble Lord opposite to him (Auckland); all these advantages were now lost. When the definitive treaty was officially published by the Dutch, there accompanied the publication certain observations†, understood to come from the Government (these remarks have been inserted in the Dutch and French papers as officially published by the Government). From these we learn, that the Prince of Orange not only is excluded from any indemnity in Holland, where his property rests, but that the custom of compelling the Dutch to do homage to our flag at sea, an honour to maintain which our ancestors bled, is given up. The privileges obtained in 1787, of trading to the Spice Islands, and other privileges highly advantageous to our commerce in the East Indies, are relinquished by the non-renewal of former treaties. This was the most alarming deficiency of the definitive treaty. All the commercial regulations, to establish which this country had so often struggled, and under which our commerce had so greatly flourished, ceased to exist, the grounds of new disputes were left, the seeds of future wars were laid, particularly with regard to our intercourse with the Dutch in the East Indies. Indeed, most of the treaties which had nourished our commerce were destroyed by the present peace; the Methuen treaty, which contributed so greatly to our prosperity, no longer existed; our right to cut logwood was lost, and various other privileges equally important.

LORD PELHAM did not feel that Ministers were bound to make any reply, as the Noble Earl had made no motion, and only communicated what he deemed important information, with the view, he supposed, of directing the attention of the House to the consideration of certain subjects previous to the discussion on the definitive treaty. The Noble Earl's object was therefore answered, as the House and his Majesty's Ministers had heard him, and Lord Pelham saw nothing that required a reply from Ministers at this time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, APRIL 29TH, 1802.

LORD HAWKESBURY brought up a copy of the definitive treaty of peace, ratified between his Majesty and the French republic, his Catholic Majesty, and the Batavian republic, and moved, "That these papers be laid upon the table."

Mr. WINDHAM said, that the Noble Lord had anticipated part of what he was going to say upon this subject; and he understood the course stated, and the grounds for it, to be such as mentioned by the Noble Lord; but he must observe, however, the Noble Lord had not said any thing which changed his mind as to the course he should pursue, but which happened to accord with the ideas of the Noble Lord, as he had expressed himself to-night. He should like to have an early day to mention this matter again; he should propose Monday next, not for the purpose of discussing the subject, but for the House then to fix a day, and that he should wish not to be an early day, to discuss the whole matter. He did not wish to enter on a debate on Monday, but he meant it as a motion, merely to explain the grounds on which the House should fix some future day for the discussion. The question was then put and carried.

Mr. WINDHAM rose, and spoke nearly as follows:—"I do not rise to solicit the House to come now to any final decision upon the merits of the definitive treaty of peace which has been laid on the table, but simply to move a day for taking it into consideration. As one of the persons who have the misfortune to differ from his Majesty's Ministers, I do not conceive there can be any objection to this proposal. His Majesty's Ministers think that no discussion is necessary upon the definitive treaty, the preliminaries having met with the approbation of the House, and consequently they have declined to introduce any motion respecting it. Whether this be an invariable custom, or one that would be 'more honoured in the breach than the observance,' I shall not stay to inquire. If there be precedents that do not render any such proceeding necessary, they must be founded upon the presumption, that, by its approbation of the preliminary treaty, the House has sanctioned the definitive. Now I think it is quite the contrary in the present case. I think that the question is completely open, and that there may be perfectly good grounds for giving a different judgment upon the definitive treaty from that which the preliminaries have received. At the same time, however, that Ministers have declared that they see no necessity for farther discussion, they have also expressed a wish, that, if any such be to take place, it may be a full, complete, and not a partial discussion. If by this they mean that the subject should be taken up upon all its grounds, with all the circumstances of the early disclosure on their part, of all the necessary papers and information, and with a full view of the subject in all its points, bearings, and relations, in that wish I heartily concur. If, on the contrary, by deprecating a partial discussion, it be meant that the whole discussion should take place on the same day; if it be meant to crowd all the points of this comprehensive business into a single sitting, and without full information to assist the judgment in its inquiry into the merits of each, I cannot agree; because it cannot be done with justice to a question of so great magnitude. In the circumstances under which I now present myself, I am, mutatis mutandis, like a counsel in an opening speech, in which I am to touch on a variety of papers and matters, the complete knowledge of which can only be disclosed in the proofs produced in the progress of the trial: but whether Ministers will give all these accounts and papers, is what will make all the difference possible in the final discussion. This is a subject upon which I have already expressed my sentiments; and sorry should I be to have it supposed, that, if we were met to pass a final judgment upon it, I should touch so slightly as I mean to do upon many points of moment, and express so feebly the deep anxiety and apprehensions which I entertain of the treaty, as of the grave digging for our greatness, and an abyss opening at our feet to swallow us up. The best order in which to consider this subject, will, I think, be under the four following heads: I shall first take the circumstances which did exist, but were not known in this country previous to the preliminaries; secondly, those points which took place in the interval between the preliminaries and the definitive treaty; thirdly, the variation of certain points in the definitive from their state in the preliminaries; and, fourthly, those points in the definitive which do not exist in any shape in the preliminaries, yet may not be considered as a departure from them. As to the first class, namely, the circumstances which did exist, but were not known before the preliminaries, there are three principal ones: first, the cession of the Isle of Elba; secondly, the limit of French Guiana; and, thirdly, the cession of Louisiana. The cession of Elba has been already mentioned, and when the necessary papers shall be laid before the House, it will be the proper time to enter into it fully. I shall now touch on the manner of the cession only, leaving it to the House to judge the value of the acquisition to the French as an excellent station, an important harbour, and an impregnable fortress. The argument by which our assent is sought to be obtained for this advantage given the French, is the immensity of objects of equal, if not greater value, which destroys its single importance: that is, we are told, why continue the war for the sake of the Isle of Elba, when so many points of greater value have been surrendered? Without dwelling, then, on its value, I shall consider the manner, which is in my mind more important than the thing itself. There is in it such tricking, such chicanery, as requires constant explanation; and the more it is examined, the more odious is the light in which it appears. The House will recollect that by the treaty of Munich, by which a transfer was made of the Dutchy of Tuscany, it was expressly stipulated that Porto Ferrajo should remain as it was before, attached to the Dukedom of Tuscany. Now, what do the French? They have recourse to that sort of algebraic calculation by which an algebraist would proceed to exterminate a quantity that he wished to get rid of; they transfer it to another person—they leave it with the Duke of Tuscany: but, as if they were playing a game of chess, they remove the Duke and put a King in his place. They take a King of the House of Spain, and having placed him in the Duke's stead, they negotiate with the court of Spain, that it shall not remain with Tuscany, but be transferred to France. This was not known at the time when the preliminaries were signed. It comes out then that the real state of Porto Ferrajo was artfully concealed; that instead of being a station in the hands of the Duke of Tuscany, or against the French, it was to be transferred to France to facilitate her attack upon Naples, or any other ally we might have in that quarter in a future war. Now, surely nobody will say that these circumstances, if the thing stood single, are not such as put the case upon a new footing, and leave it a res integra open to discussion. Now, Sir, passing over this, we shall proceed to the next point, which is much the same in manner, but greater in magnitude: I mean the boundary assigned to French Guiana. I shall consider it as the former, not so much with regard to its importance, as the consequences attending it, which I contend were a gross breach of good faith. When the preliminaries were signed, we were given to understand by them, that the dominions of Portugal were to be maintained in their integrity. Therefore, when the treaty of Madrid came out which violated them, there was a general outcry and alarm. We were told it would be given up. As for myself, I could not understand that the French would have made this excursion into the Portuguese territory, purely for the purpose of giving it up again. It seems, however, they did so, as his Majesty's Ministers take credit for making them give it up and take another. A few leagues of wilderness in one place or another, are no great object. The question is, the command which it gives them of the Amazons, and that they have as much by the one as by the other. Either boundary is equally a breach of faith: they should have gone to the treaty of Utrecht; for, to impose a new boundary upon us is equally a fraud as if they had retained the former. As to the treaty of Badajos, which has been referred to on this subject, there is no such paper before the House, and, therefore, I leave it out of my consideration. What I complain of is the fraudulent exchange. It has been said of a peace, that it was only a change of war; the French mode of plain dealing may be perhaps a substitution of one fraud for another. The next point in this rising climax of frauds is the acquisition of Louisiana. Into this subject I am not now disposed to enter minutely. By this acquisition, the French are established in a space as unbounded as the view it opens, whether north or south. What a present have we made in it to the Americans? We have placed a serpent in their bosom, by which they will be ultimately devoured. We have put them in that state in which they must become willing slaves, under the dominion of France. We all know something of human nature. We know that men detest the instrument less than the cause, and turn their resentment upon those whom they can make to feel it most. They will not, of course, hesitate between us and the French, and thus we shall eventually forfeit the friendship of America by the aggrandizement of the French in that quarter. As to the wealth which this establishment opens to them, it has no limits but their will. On the continent of South America there is no power that can resist them. There are the sources of the wealth of the world; but if Gentlemen do not feel the consequence of their passing into the hands of the French, it would be in vain for me to impress them with an idea of their importance. I have now got through the three principal points, which, though not known in this country, existed at the time of the preliminary treaty. There is not one of them that does not call for the revision of the preliminaries, and cancels the obligation. Now, Sir, under the next head of things, namely, those that happened in the interval between the preliminaries and the definitive treaty, the catalogue is not numerous; but what it wants in number, it makes up in magnitude. It consists of the Italian republic; and next, though not so great, or bearing so directly upon the present question, the naval and military force sent out from France, and now established in the West Indies. The first is the question of a new kingdom (for whether kingdom or presidency, differs but little in the language of the present day) in the heart of Italy. I say, that if such a situation of things had happened without the act or interference of either party, it was competent to a minister to say, Here comes a change upon which we did not calculate, therefore it is quite a new case. I say farther, that the history of Europe furnishes us with precedents to shew that such a change would have been the cause of a war; but what will be said when it appears that this was done during the interval of the preliminaries, and by one of the contracting parties?—(Hear! hear!) It is not that this is not felt as a good cause of war; but the fact is, Europe is so altered, that no interested power dare to question it. What must Austria think, when the Cisalpine republic, which she might have originally regarded as a barrier against France, is now a barrier to France, for her destruction? We know what Austria feels; but she feels her danger too much to enter upon any steps for redress. The second point bears less upon the present question; but it is of extreme importance, and may hereafter prove a measure of serious inquiry. The way in which I look at it is the establishment of the French power in the West Indies earlier than it would otherwise have taken place, and which, if it had not taken place so early, would not perhaps have ever been established at all. This is of the more importance, when we consider how much expectation has been formed of the chances and events which time might produce in the uncertain and unprecedented state of things which the world has so long presented. We do not know what effect delay might have had, or what advantages it might not have given us. We are therefore in a situation in which we should not otherwise have been; for, whatever may be said of the policy of the measure on our part, nobody will contend that by it we were not giving before the conclusion of peace, a helping hand to that which during the war we had expended so many millions of money, and sacrificed so many lives, to destroy. The third head is that which relates to those points on which the definitive is a departure from the preliminaries. Under this head I shall notice, first, the article respecting prisoners. We all know that there was a large debt due to us by France on this account; and we heard of islands that were to be mortgaged for its payment. The result is, that there is no such mortgage, and that the debt is as bad as can be, while we were not able, I suppose, to compel better terms. It became therefore necessary to exercise our diplomatic skill, to discover some plausible way of getting rid of the demand; in the execution of which, I wish, however, our plenipotentiaries had devised some mode that would have reflected less ridicule and disgrace upon the country. The expedient against the payment for the French prisoners is, the French are to set off the demands which they have for the maintenance of the prisoners belonging to our allies in their hands; that is, the expense of clothing and supporting the Russian prisoners. We all remember what a parade was made of the attention paid to the Russian prisoners, and that it was represented by the French government as a compliment paid to the Emperor Paul; so that we are made to pay for that very clothing and maintenance which were the lure to decay that sovereign from our alliance. The next point of the same class, though without much preference to order, is the cession of Malta. By the preliminaries this island was not to belong to France or England, but to be restored to the Order, under the protection of a third power, generally supposed to be Russia. It was originally conceived that Malta was not to be given up; but that would not now be a proper matter for discussion. We shall take it simply upon the condition of the preliminaries. Instead, however, of providing for Malta in the spirit of the preliminaries, a covered way has been devised, by which England is completely ousted, and France put into possession. That such, at least, will be the result, I have no doubt. The first consideration that occurs is, how the Order is to be supported. We know the internal revenue of Malta does not exceed 30,000*l.* a sum not more than equal to the support of the Grand Master, the various charitable institutions, and the supply of grain. These three objects absorb all the revenue of every description which the island affords; so that for guards, garrison, and the defence of the place, there will be no provision at all.

Of the revenues that formerly belonged to the Order, those in France, Bavaria, and different parts of Germany, have been confiscated, and those which lay in Spain are on the eve of being so, making, in the whole, at least four fifths of its ancient revenue, and reducing its revenue merely to that produced by the island, to the amount of about 30,000*l.* as I have already stated. Thus situated, the Order must soon fail for want of support. I shall not dwell upon the disgraceful mode of modelling it upon the French regular or noble-democratic form. It is not of this I complain, but of putting it under the protection of powers under the influence of France; for what is the Neapolitan garrison in fact but a French garrison? But, supposing it is now under the influence of France, how is that influence provided against by the article which removes the hands of the Neapolitan government? The plan is, that we shall evacuate the island in three months. This stipulation is peremptory. Then comes another clause, enjoining that it shall be delivered up, generally, but not attaching to the former clause and saving to the Order. Next comes another clause, still more material, which says, that the neutrality of the Order is proclaimed. What is meant by this it is difficult to understand, and may be variously interpreted. It may be neutrality to say, that ships of war to any number belonging to the neutral nations may come in, or that they shall be all alike excluded. A third way may also be conceived; I mean the admission of an equal number of ships of all nations. Now see the effect of this neutrality in the event of a future war. In such a war France would have for her allies certainly more maritime powers than England; she would at least have Spain and Holland, while we should probably not have one. Supposing, then, the number of vessels of each power admissible at Malta to be six, France would have there eighteen ships for our six, and so in the same proportion, whatever should be the number. Had this stipulation been in the preliminaries, surely it would have been canvassed and set right in the definitive treaty. The next point is the Cape of Good Hope. France has been always mistress of a happy knack of expression, and I do not find that the revolution has changed her style. She has stipulated that it shall be delivered over in full sovereignty to Holland. Now there is nothing to bind Holland from making it over to France, and putting a French garrison in it the moment she shall receive it. When, then, we consider the word sovereignty was used in the case of Tuscany and the Isle of Elba, we cannot suppose that it was intended to be otiosus, a mere idle term in the definitive treaty. On the contrary, this industrious use of it affords a lively persuasion that the same will be the result with regard to the Cape. I shall now pass on to things occurring in the definitive, and which make no part whatever of the preliminaries. The first is one of a gigantic nature, the total absence of all previous treaties. It is the first instance of the kind: it opens to a world of conjecture. It is argued that we shall gain as much as we shall lose by it; but how this is to happen I am at a loss to comprehend. It may be supposed that the renewal of these treaties would have embroiled us with the continent. But I do not know what these obligations are, that would have outweighed the benefits of the treaties; because these treaties were not made for France, but against her, and for the protection of the other powers. The non-revival of these treaties leaves us, however, with respect to other countries, just in the same situation in which we stood before; so that by this diplomatic analysis, France only is relieved. But, as was said at Lisle, Why get rid of the treaties all in a lump? We were not in the situation of a man with his hand limited to a minute. Surely seven months would have afforded time to make a selection of what should remain, and what should be cancelled. There are other points of this class that touch us more nearly. There is one particular part of the empire for which we feel a lively interest, an interest that must be increased in proportion to the loss of so many other acquisitions, and to which we must cling as the last wreck of our empire: I mean our East India possessions. The treaties of 1783 and 1787, the two great epochs of our rights in that quarter, are given up. We are left without the advantages, whatever they may be, of these compacts, and our right placed upon its original foundation. Now, let that right be ever so good, for I do not dispute its validity, it is material to consider what rights, or rather claims, the French exercised before 1783. Our present state is, therefore, that state of litigation in which we were previous to the treaty of that year. By that treaty we put a guard upon our right; yet such was the force with which the French preferred their claims, that a ship was sunk in the Ganges, and we were on the point of hostilities when the convention of 1787 took place. We are now in that situation in which an attorney might say to his client, You have a good right of action, go to law; but if I had a security in my hands, confirming my right and removing my adversary's, I should not be well advised were I to break off the seal and throw it in the fire, that I might afterwards go to trial where the arbitrator is the sword, and the court a field of battle. We are now left to our right of action, and, perhaps, the first news from India will be the notice for going to trial. The French were never backward in asserting their claims; and that they should be less forward now, I have no reason to suppose. There are other rights of minor importance abandoned, rights which, taken singly, are of great magnitude, but which sink into nothing in the neighbourhood of the towering heights that surround them. As to the importance of the privilege of cutting logwood in the Bay of Honduras;

we read of nothing but quarrels between France and Spain about it. We do not pretend to a right of sovereignty in that quarter. We hold the right by convention, and France will, no doubt, reassert her pretensions. What these pretensions are, does not appear; but this state of ignorance and uncertainty shews the necessity for calling for papers, and giving the most mature consideration to the subject. The gum trade is another, which we exercised by convention; and I shall not forget the right claimed by the Dutch to trade in the eastern seas. We know the jealousy of Holland in that particular; we know the credit our Minister took for the settlement of 1784, on that point; but how this right is to be exercised in future; what precautions have been taken for its security; and whether they are to come from above or from below, does not appear. Among the other points that come next, without contravening the preliminaries, is the House of Orange. When we talk of all the territories and acquisitions which we have surrendered, we are told of those wonder-working things, credit and capital. I wish we could transfer the word credit from the 'Change to credit of another kind, to a high sense of honour, to national spirit and immunity from insults; but of all these qualities that made us great, we are now divesting ourselves, as if they were functi officio, and their sole object was to procure us money. France may have ill-treated other powers under her protection; but she has shewn that she will not suffer another to abuse them. The dog, though beaten by his master, will fly forward in his defence; and we do know that powers, though crouching under France, will be bold and vigorous in her cause, that they will fight like Janissaries in the pay of their master. One of them, we are aware, has not waited for the wax to be cold upon the treaty, before it has evinced this temper and disposition. That power which never spares an enemy, and gives protection to those under it, will make all powers to range upon its side. In the case of France, there is no instance of the contrary. Even in the evacuation of Alexandria, she acted upon that principle. I wish I could say the same for this country, with respect to the House of Orange. In our abandonment of that Prince, no provision has been made for the loss of his private property, or his stadtholderian authority. It might have been expected that some indemnification would have been secured for the sacrifice of his patrimony and power; but we have not only done nothing, but the manner in which he has been treated forms the most ridiculous feature of the treaty. The very day we were stipulating a provision, on that very day, and in that very room, and at the very table at Amiens, did the French and Dutch plenipotentiaries sign a defeasance. Our stipulation stated generally, that he was to have an indemnity, but the stipulation of the Dutch Minister Schimmelpenninck states, that it shall not be in Holland, the only place in which it could with reason and justice be obtained, and, indeed, the only place where we intended it should be obtained. So much for the good faith of France, in the case of the Prince of Orange. See now the King of Sardinia. We could be under no fear of reviving treaties with him; his kingdom was gone, unless, indeed, we might fear to see him come like the ghost that drew Priam's curtains in the night. It seems as if all sense of national honour were lost; but though the feeling may be lost to us, it is not so with the by-standers. These things are of consequence, and are founded in reason. I want to know what value France sets upon subjecting us to indignity; I want to know what she and other nations think of our submitting to it? The sentiments of Holland I do know, from a curious paper which she lately published. If these sacrifices were made by us from magnanimity, it would be another thing, but they are known to be made against our will. If I wanted a voucher for all this, I find one in a French paper received this day, and which, if translated, I should have read as part of my speech. In it the writer talks of Malta as of a place that, by the terms of the treaty, must eventually belong to France, and reasons upon several other points in the same disadvantageous line for England. Now, the necessary information upon all these points, is only to be had from papers, of which there are none upon the table: without such papers the real case cannot be known. We cannot know, without them, whether the cordial drop of peace, which we take into our stomachs, may not be something of a deleterious quality that may destroy us. Let us then consider, while we have time, and at least examine the cup in which it has been administered. I should wish, therefore, to fix to-morrow fortnight for the consideration of the subject, as not too distant for a business requiring so much previous information. I move, therefore, That the House shall take into consideration the definitive treaty of peace concluded between his Majesty, the French and Batavian republics, and the King of Spain, on the 18th instant."

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said, that his Right Hon. Friend had said that Porto Ferrajo was surrendered to the French, but this was an act that was not done by his Majesty's Ministers; the surrender of the Grand Duchy of Tuscany was a concession made by a sovereign power, fully competent to make such a concession. His Right Hon. Friend had laid some stress on the French territory in Guiana. He referred in this case to a conversation which took place in that House upon the subject of the treaty of Madrid and of the treaty of Badajos; it was then stated that the French territory in this part of the globe was to be limited by the treaty of Badajos; and not by that of Madrid; and it was made a subject of discontent by some Gentlemen in that House on that account; and a good deal of stress was laid upon the difference between the two, that of Madrid being much more favourable to Portugal than that of Badajos; and in fact the Portuguese government expressed, in terms the most explicit, that they should think themselves too fortunate, if we could be instrumental in procuring for them the terms specified, and having the boundaries fixed as stipulated by the treaty of Madrid. His Right Hon. Friend had said, that the French insisted on the treaty of Badajos, for the mere purpose of making a merit of giving it up and abandoning that treaty. The fact was, that this country, anticipating the pressure likely to be felt by that country, before the knowledge of the signing the preliminary treaty, and the concessions likely to be made in consequence of that pressure, made an express stipulation that the limits of the French possessions in Guiana should be as agreed upon by the treaty of Madrid, but the European boundary should be fixed by the treaty of Badajos. His Right Hon. Friend laid great stress, and very justly, on the establishment on the part of France in Louisiana. He had also said, that the French power would now put into danger the whole of the continent of South America. He was ready to agree with his Right Hon. Friend, that the interests of Europe are materially connected with the interests of America, both North and South; but his Right Hon. Friend could not say, that if the French had not the extent of territory there which they now possess, they could not, if St. Domingo were tranquil, and affairs at rest with them in that quarter, by a large military force become formidable to either North or South America, provided the subjects of these states were disposed to offer to them no resistance, and had no inclination to maintain their independence, and provided Great Britain and the rest of the European states were to be indifferent spectators of the scene. Certainly this acquisition of Louisiana was very important to France, and would certainly be looked on with regret by those who wished their dominion limited; but that was no conclusive argument to the point stated by his Right Hon. Friend upon that subject, that this possession will give them the power he had stated over the whole of that part of the globe. Another point that had been stated by his Right Hon. Friend was, that new matter had arisen upon, and new circumstances had attended the state of parties since the time of signing the preliminaries. Upon this head of observation, his Right Hon. Friend had resorted to the state of the Italian republic, and the armament which had been sent to St. Domingo. With regard to the first, he could only say, it could not be otherwise than regarded with anxiety by those who thought the power of France too great, or who felt, as men must feel, for the independence of the rest of Europe; and by none more was that sentiment felt, than by those who had a pure affection for the interests of their country: but this brought the matter back again to the consideration of the preliminaries of peace, the principle of which Parliament had at least recognised. Did his Right Hon. Friend mean to say that the renewal of the war would have been a measure proper to have had recourse to, on account of the objects to which he adverted as having taken place between the signing the preliminaries and the conclusion of the definitive treaty? He believed not; and if his Right Hon. Friend thought otherwise, he was confident the good sense of the House and the feeling of the public would go in a contrary direction. His Right Hon. Friend had said, that some of the occurrences between the preliminaries and the definitive treaty were such as would, at any other time than the present, have roused all Europe. Be that as it might, the fact was, that all Europe sat still at these events. The different states of Europe did not appear to be alarmed, but they had sanctioned the very proceedings of which his Right Hon. Friend complained so much; upon which Mr. Addington said he made no comment, but it was a justification to his Majesty's Ministers for not making these points a plea for the rupture of the negotiation and the renewal of the war. His Right Hon. Friend had laid great stress to-night, and great stress had been laid within these few months, on the sailing of the armament for St. Domingo. Now, upon considering the whole of this matter, all the circumstances that belonged to it, looking at it in all its bearings, he should really like to ask every intelligent, unbiassed man in this country, the whole country together as it were, whether this armament and its sailing was really matter of regret to us? In considering this subject, the whole state of the West India islands would immediately come into view. He was unwilling to dwell upon this matter; but looking at the state of the West India islands, he was confident that, whether they were viewed in a national way, or upon the narrower field of individual interest, it would be manifest that the usurpation of the black government was the most formidable of all apprehensions for the safety of those possessions; and he was confident, that, had his Majesty's Ministers prevented the sailing of that armament which went to St. Domingo, it would hereafter be matter of sincere regret by the public, and of deep reproach to his Majesty's Ministers. The third point alluded to by his Right Hon. Friend, was that of the departure from the preliminaries, and on which his Right Hon. Friend had laid very considerable stress, and made use of it in support of his motion; but he should be glad if his Right Hon. Friend would shew him where the departure was to be found in the definitive treaty from the preliminaries. He had pressed much objection to the expense of paying for the troops of the Emperor of Russia. Now, he would ask any man of sober judgment, without the feeling which influenced that of his Right Hon. Friend, whether it was not proper that those troops, which were in the pay and service, and under the direction, control, and management of the British government, should not in this case be considered in the same situation as any of our own would be if prisoners of war in another country? With respect to Malta, his Right Hon. Friend had taken a very ample field. He spoke under correction, but he very much doubted whether the arrangement made respecting Malta was not an arrangement which was in contemplation by the late Administration; but he could conceive it very possible that his Right Hon. Friend might not have concurred in that measure while he was in administration. But without entering into the particulars of the statement of his Right Hon. Friend, he had the satisfaction to know that the Maltese themselves did not partake of the sentiments of his Right Hon. Friend; theirs were those of satisfaction and gratitude to Great Britain for the terms procured them. With regard to the Cape, he had conversed with many of those who certainly had the best means of being qualified to form a correct opinion upon the subject, and they thought that no disadvantage was likely to result to Great Britain from the change which was adopted in this respect. His Right Hon. Friend had said a great deal on the subject of the treaty, as to the omissions of it. He had said, it did not renew any of those commercial arrangements which it had always been customary to renew. Great pains had been taken upon that subject, to set off the supposed disadvantages to us of these omissions. Upon this, he could at present only say, that if the principle upon which the treaty was agreed to was erroneous, it was without any plea or excuse erroneous on the part of his Majesty's Ministers, for this omission was not an accidental one, it was advisedly so settled; his Majesty's Ministers were thoroughly convinced, that, under the present state of Europe, and all the circumstances of the case, they took a part which was adapted to the real interests of Europe in general, and to his Majesty's dominions in particular, by abstaining from the renewal of any treaties of commerce whatever. His Right Hon. Friend had closed his comments by a reference to an article of great importance, he meant the care of the Prince of Orange: he had said that Prince was not described in the treaty by his title of Prince of Orange. Now, he was not to inform his Right Hon. Friend, that such title had never been recognised by any government of France; he was sure this could not be contradicted, and he would repeat it, that such title had never been recognised by any government whatever of France; he meant, that the head of that illustrious House had never been recognised by any government of France since the Revolution, by which the head of that illustrious House had been placed on the throne of Great Britain. His Right Hon. Friend had said, that no effectual stipulation was made to that Prince for the loss of his property: this was an objection that might have been made to the preliminaries of peace, and most unquestionably it was a very important subject. Certainly the terms were not so favourable for that illustrious family as he could have wished; but certainly the treaty contained terms for adequate compensation; for it is said, that for losses suffered as well in private property, as by the change of constitution adopted in that country, an adequate compensation should be procured for the House of Nassau, for losses not only of a territorial nature, but of private property. The only objection he had to the motion of his Right Hon. Friend, applied merely to the day on which he proposed to bring it forward; and when this treaty was proposed to be taken into consideration, he was not at all surprised that his Right Hon. Friend, who disliked the whole of the peace, should like to see every part of it rejected; but the sense he had of his duty compelled him to do every thing in his power to prevent an interval taking place between this and the period of the discussion of the subject, and during which the people of this country would be kept in suspense, which, of itself, was a consideration of some importance: he did not know the use of delay in this case; did his Right Hon. Friend mean to prevent any of the provisions of the treaty being carried into effect? What then was the object of his Right Hon. Friend? If he had any specific object besides that of a general censure upon the treaty, let him state it. Did he mean to prevent restitution being made according to the provisions of the treaty? If he did, let him state it. But it was an object, in the prosecution of which, he believed his Right Hon. Friend would not be contented in that House. Wishing, however, that a full discussion should take place, he should propose, that, instead of to-morrow fortnight, Tuesday se'nnight be inserted; or, more formally, that instead of the 18th, the 11th of May be inserted in the motion. He concluded by moving this amendment.

Mr. THOMAS GRENVILLE rose, and expressed the utmost astonishment, that professing, as the Right Hon. Gentleman did, that the subject was one highly worthy of the consideration of the House, he should consider fourteen days as a period too long for obtaining that degree of information, without which that consideration could not be fairly or profitably conducted. It was impossible, in his opinion, to have given any degree of attention to the succinct statement of his Right Hon. Friend, without being convinced that so great and so important were the objects demanding consideration, that the period originally proposed was barely sufficient for that purpose, pre-occupied as the attention of the House would necessarily be by a variety of other business. Was it possible to reflect for a moment on that one feature of the treaty, of the total omission of the renewal of all former treaties, and still maintain that an interval of fourteen days was more than sufficient to prepare the House for the discussion of a point of such extensive importance to our commercial relations? If the treaty contained only this one point which demanded consideration, so many were the political and commercial interests which such a change went to produce, that the period mentioned by his Right Hon. Friend was perhaps inadequate to give an opportunity for the explanation which would be required. But this was merely one out of a long list which had been enumerated. If it was really the intention of his Majesty's Ministers to give a full, fair, manly discussion to the subject, he was quite unable to conceive why so important a discussion should be precipitated. The Right Hon. Gentleman on the other side had said that he was easily able to account for his Right Hon. Friend wishing for delay, feeling as he did on the peace; but the Right Hon. Gentleman's own conduct seemed to indicate something which shewed that he wished the discussion to be precipitated, from a dislike to any thing like a full discussion of the merits of the peace. He remembered an observation of an Hon. Friend of his on an occasion nearly similar to the present. When a motion for the production of such papers as might qualify the House to come to a fair decision was brought forward, the Minister had then pressed for a decision, and his Hon. Friend had taken occasion to remark that such conduct was similar to that of schoolboys, who were anxious to gulp any thing nauseous at one draught. The House had been asked by the Right Hon. Gentleman to suspend their judgment till information was procured; but how was such information to be procured in the time which he had specified? The information wanted was not surely to be obtained viva voce, but was to be the result of documents; and in the time which he had mentioned, these documents it was impossible to procure. He was, therefore, clearly for adhering to the time which his Right Hon. Friend had called for.

LORD HAWKESBURY said, his Right Hon. Friend had divided the subject into four heads, but in his opinion it might more properly be divided into two, viz. first, whether the alterations which had taken place, whether known or not, since the signing of the preliminary, ought to have induced his Majesty's Ministers to have refused to sign the definitive treaty of peace, on the same terms as the preliminaries. The second head was, the defects, whether of omission or commission, in the definitive treaty. As to the first of these heads, whether those events which were notorious, such as the First Consul of France having accepted the presidency of the Italian republic, the surrender of the Isle of Elba to France, and the cession of Louisiana by Spain; whether those circumstances ought or ought not to have induced his Majesty's Ministers to conclude the definitive treaty with France, was a question for future discussion. But it should be recollected, that they were not now known to us for the first time, they had been publicly known for many months; and therefore he was sure that there was no person at all interested in the welfare of his country, who had not fully considered this question (a very important one he admitted, and on which a difference of opinion might exist), and formed his opinion upon it. With regard to the second point, viz. the defects of the definitive treaty, he begged to observe, that the customs of France being different from ours upon these subjects, the definitive treaty had been for some time in point of fact known by the public; and therefore his Right Hon. Friend must have made up his mind with regard to the information which he wanted, and the papers which he should require upon this. Under these circumstances, considering that these objects must range themselves under the different heads which he had stated, viz. the alteration of circumstances since the preliminaries, which had been known for some months, and the stipulation of the definitive treaty which had been for some time before the public, he could not conceive any reason that could be stated, why the discussion should be delayed.

MR. PITT said, that he could not but rejoice that upon this point his Right Hon. Friend had not represented our rights as doubtful, though he had spoken of the claims of those who were lately our enemies.—He alluded to what his Right Hon. Friend had said about India, one of the great limbs of the power of this country, and one of the great sources of that wealth and commerce which had raised this country to her present exalted state, and had assisted in carrying us through that great and eventful contest which had just ended. When the question came under discussion, it would be found that there was not only no ground for solid, but no pretence even for contentious argument, or plausible cavil; and, therefore, after what he had heard stated, he could not but count the moments till the subject should be investigated, which he hoped required nothing but an impartial discussion to remove all uneasiness from the public mind, because it would prove that there existed a determination in peace to maintain those rights which we secured and strengthened by war. Upon these grounds, he hoped his Right Hon. Friend would excuse him for requesting him to state as soon as possible the precise nature of the information he required. His Right Hon. Friend had talked of the necessity of producing several treaties; but some of them could not in point of form be laid upon the table of the House; and with regard to others, it could not be supposed that it would be proper to lay before the House the treaties of Westphalia, Ryswick, Utrecht, &c. If Gentlemen had not looked at and considered all those treaties already, certainly neither a week nor a fortnight would be sufficient to prepare them for the discussion of this question. But in order to ascertain the state of Europe immediately previous to, during, and since the war, the only information that could be given, must be in the discussion of the question. With regard to the apprehensions which his Right Hon. Friend had expressed, that in consequence of the non-renewal of treaties, particularly that of 1787, the French would establish the pretensions which they had advanced previous to 1787, it would be necessary, in the first place, to ascertain what these pretensions were, and upon what ground they rested. If it should turn out that those pretensions, be they what they might, had no foundation whatsoever; then, undoubtedly, any inquiry into the subject would be useless. The first question was, whether we were of opinion, that, in point of fact, our late enemies had no such pretensions, and whether we knew enough of our own rights to say that those which we had maintained in war should not be conceded in peace? He knew enough of those pretensions to state that they arose out of two foundations, but principally out of the treaty of 1783, which was now done away. As far as they arose out of grants from the Great Mogul (of whom we were in fact the substitutes), these grants must be done away by war as well as treaties. The grants of former Moguls certainly could not be more binding upon us than our own treaties. Voluntary grants could not be more binding than positive treaties. It would be to be considered also, whether what his Right Hon. Friend had said about Honduras might not also be done away by general reasoning. He would not enter into the discussion of these points at present. He hoped, however, that his Right Hon. Friend would not delay longer than till to-morrow his motion for the papers, which he thought necessary for the discussion of this great and momentous question.

The amendment was then carried.

HOUSE OF LORDS, MAY 4TH, 1802.

The order of the day being read for summoning their Lordships for the consideration of Lord Grenville's intended motion relative to the definitive treaty,

LORD GRENVILLE said, that he understood that, though there never was a subject which more highly interested the welfare of the country, it was not the intention of Ministers to submit the treaty to the House by any specific motion; and he acknowledged there might be some excuse for such a proceeding, if the treaty was in fact no more than a detailed execution of the articles of the preliminaries, upon which they had come to an approving vote already. In order, therefore, to lay a ground for his motion, it would be proper for him to shew the variations between them, the alterations in some parts, the contradictions in others, and the omissions upon the whole. The first consideration which presented itself was, the regard had to national honour and national faith. This was a consideration, in his mind, of much more moment than any other which could arise on such a subject. Loss of territory may be regained, commerce may be revived, and industry encouraged and invigorated; but honour and faith, once forfeited, can never be repaired but imperfectly, and only by a long series of a conduct manifesting an adherence to a different system. Upon this principle he could not but condemn the manner in which the integrity of Portugal had been sported with: we should never forget, that, through the whole course of the war, that country had adhered to us with a firmness that shamed the fidelity of much more powerful nations; and he would undertake to assert, without the fear of contradiction, that whatever Portugal had lost in consequence of the war, was solely sacrificed to its attachment to the interests of this country. It was not by any general engagement and guarantee, but by a special and distinct treaty, that British faith was pledged to bring Portugal whole and unimpaired out of the war; instead of which, this peace left that integrity to depend on what was left to Portugal in Europe by the treaty of Badajos; and the territory which it lost, though of little value in itself, deeply affected the interests of Great Britain, as it left forever imprinted on the minds of the Portuguese people, that the guarantee and protection of England were not to be relied on. The treaty alluded to also put it out of the power of Portugal any longer to carry the commercial treaty into effect. He would not for the present speak of the value of that treaty to this country; but observe that it was such, in the opinion of Portugal, that, for its maintenance, that country at one period of the war put even its very existence to the hazard. If such was the care we took of them in Europe, still less did we protect their possessions in the Indies. By the treaty of Amiens, the boundaries of France in Guiana were circumscribed to the course of the river Arawari; but this gave the French an entire command of the river Amazons at its source, the command below of the whole Portuguese trade, and the command equally, in time of war, of our Indian navigation. The next object of attention, in regard to British faith, was, the condition of a family, with its adherents, to which we were bound by every tie of friendship and alliance, who are now wandering in foreign parts as exiles, and uncertain of being ever enabled to return to their native country: it must be evident that he alluded to the House of Orange. The interests of that illustrious family were entirely neglected in the preliminaries; and he believed, however desirous they might be of peace, the preliminaries would never have been approved of, if Ministers had not declared that the honour and good faith of this country required that a compensation should be made to the Prince of Orange, our ally (if that term might be applied to a Prince now left without any dominions). His Lordship then enumerated the various kinds of property which the House of Orange heretofore possessed in Holland. He denied that the House of Orange had been elevated by the republic of the United Provinces, which, on the other hand, was itself erected by that House, whose Princes held great possessions, not indeed in full sovereignty, nor much short of it, long before the republic started into existence. The dignities of the House of Orange, it was true, had not been formally recognised by the old government of France; but that was no reason why we should now consent to sink their title into the branch of the House of Nassau established in the republic of the United Provinces, and only stipulating that it should have a compensation, without providing in what it should consist, or when, or where, or by whom it was meant to be made. As to its adherents, they were not even alluded to, but seemed to be considered as unworthy of notice, while we saw France stipulating for the security of every Jacobin in all the nations of Europe, and claiming and obtaining from this country a traitor (Napper Tandy, we suppose), who appeared in hostile and rebellious arms in Ireland. All these were consequences of the improper instructions of those who were to conduct the negotiations at Amiens. France introduced the plenipotentiaries of its two allies into the congress, while those of Portugal and Naples were excluded, probably because they were interested in the result, but more probably because they were the friends and allies of England. By these means it happened, that while the Noble Lord (Cornwallis), whom he should never mention without the highest veneration and respect, was putting his signature to the peace, containing the condition of an indemnity to the House of Nassau, the French and Dutch ministers were, without his knowledge and consent, drawing up an agreement at the other end of the table, stipulating that the compensation should not be made at the expense of what was now called the Batavian republic: an act of perfidy and duplicity which he reprobated in the strongest language. Speaking of the stipulation for each country paying the debts of the prisoners taken on either side, he animadverted on the provision which included foreign troops taken while in the pay of each nation. Even in this article, so much a matter of form, all the advantage was on the side of France. A number of Russian troops had been taken at a time when they were at our disposal, which, in consequence of different political arrangements, were afterwards clothed, armed, and regimented at Brussels, for the purpose of being employed to attack this country. If any one doubted this fact, he had it in his power to prove it; and he thought nothing could be more humiliating in us than to be obliged to defray expenses incurred for such a purpose. The Cape of Good Hope, according to the preliminaries, was to have been declared a free port, and now reverts in full sovereignty to the Batavian republic. This, in time of war, would make it completely a French port, supposing even that the condition of its being open to the ships of war of the other contracting parties should be complied with. We know the French system in this kind of neutrality to be, that ships of war, in equal numbers from each country, should be admitted at the same time. Supposing then, that number to be two each; for two English men of war, the French, Spanish, and Batavian allies would have six; which would oblige us, at the expense of twenty-five or thirty ships of the line, either to keep up a great fleet in those seas, or send convoys with every trading fleet; and every regiment outward or homeward, must be escorted by a force equal to cope with the allies, and prevent them from attacking our possessions in Hindostan. This subject, however, of the Cape of Good Hope, was one of so much importance, that he should take a future opportunity of bringing it more specifically before the House. With regard to the island of Malta, which some considered as not inferior in consequence to the Cape, we were led from the preliminaries to believe that it would be placed under the protection of some power capable of preserving it from the ambitious views and pretensions of France: this power was probably meant to be Russia, whose weight and influence in Europe might probably have accomplished that end; and the more easily, as it had the means of supplying at all times a sufficient force for its defence. This the court of Russia perhaps would not consent to, and the definitive treaty placed it completely under the influence of France. The knights for the future would be wholly unable to maintain it. Their order was partly military and partly religious, and composed entirely of Maltese nobles, who would rather undergo any hardship than associate with that democratic langue which this treaty proposed, but most probably never could succeed in establishing. The revenues for their support were heretofore supplied from most of the other countries of Europe. These countries had their distinct langues, supported by benefices which could only be held by the knights, whose profession was honourable in their youth, and promised to reward them with considerable possessions when advanced to more mature years. At present almost all of these incentives were gone. The revenues were confiscated in France, on the left bank of the Rhine, and in Bavaria, which contained the richest possessions of the Order. Something indeed would remain in Naples, as long as Naples continued any way independent; and how long that might be, was matter of great uncertainty. Something was also left them in the Ecclesiastical States; but this, as well as the rest, was held by a very precarious tenure. The revenues of the island itself, partly territorial and partly commercial, were appropriated partly to maintain the splendour of the Grand Master, which could not be dispensed with; and partly to the support of religious establishments, to the expense of hospitals, and to furnishing a granary for the consumption of the island, which could not produce grain in any proportion to the number of the inhabitants: so that by applying it now to the maintenance of a new democratic langue and the defence of the works, this plunder of the alms-houses would be found wholly inadequate. A Neapolitan force was spoken of for that purpose; but the King of Naples had no interest in the preservation of the island, which could induce him to be at that expense. Besides, in time of war, he could never be in a condition to refuse yielding it to the French, in order to assist any project of theirs to intercept our East India trade, or to recover the possession of Egypt. It must, in future, be obedient to what we may call the King of Italy, who may at any time march from the new Italian republic, and, in forty-eight hours, seize upon the capital of the other sovereign. There could be no hesitation, therefore, when the alternative was between the safety of the Neapolitan metropolis and the defence of the island of Malta. It was not in the least probable that his Sicilian Majesty would embroil himself at all with the affairs of Malta while it remained within the grasp of the First Consul; and must dread the hostility of England, which would be formidable to him, though by no means so to France. Under these circumstances, he thought it imprudent in this country to give up the possession of that important island, at the moment France, by its late accessions, was so greatly extending its empire in the Mediterranean. The annexing of the new Italian republic to itself would at any other time have been thought a sufficient cause of war; and now the retention of Malta would, on our part, be still an inadequate equivalent. He illustrated this by the comments of a writer in the *Mercur de France, and published under the immediate inspection of the French government, and which, in explaining how the articles of the definitive treaty are advantageous to the republic, added, "that Malta must always be French, as long as it shall be Neapolitan." This paper he frequently recurred to in the course of his speech. He then adverted to the immense acquisition made by France in the ceded province of Louisiana, including Florida, which gave them an immense influence on the Northern United States, as well as on the South of America. It gave them the command of our West India navigation, and it brought them within three hundred miles of the city of Mexico; the march would be as easy as from Chester to London; and he had no scruple to affirm, that on the unfurling of the first standard for an expedition to Mexico, the whole of the West of America would immediately repair to it in arms—a circumstance which must ever put Spain in a state of entire dependance upon the French republic. His Lordship next proceeded to consider a stipulation in the treaty, for which, he said, there was no precedent upon record; namely, that which went to surrender the claims of British subjects upon the government of France, for losses sustained before the war, or at the commencement of the revolution. In these periods, property of English subjects in the French funds to a considerable amount was confiscated; which was done chiefly by means of that unprincipled manœuvre, by which the French financiers confiscated two thirds of the funded debt, in order to enable them to pay the remaining third.—He next adverted to the non-renewal of ancient treaties, which he would contend was a principle in the process of negotiation equally novel and injurious; and, in illustrating these positions, he again referred to the French official paper that he had already quoted, which said, "The old law is destroyed; a new public law commences:" which principle might be most destructively applied by France in her future projects of aggrandizement; and they might well say to us, that, abiding by the treaty of Amiens, which in effect ordained a new law of nations, we had no right or title to inquire; nor was that the worst, for, though these treaties were ineffectual on our part with respect to France, we were bound by the letter of them with regard to other nations, which must certainly lay the seeds of future quarrels and dissensions. Added to these important considerations, there were others, which were more of the nature of omissions than positive stipulations, but which were of equally injurious tendency. He first adverted to the point of the honour of our flag in the British seas not being asserted, and which would, in an inconceivable degree, go to abate the spirit of our seamen, on whose ardour and exertions our best hopes always depended; and this point was settled by formal stipulation in the treaty of 1763. Another point was, the omission with respect to the regulation of the gum trade, of the extent and importance of which he spoke shortly in detail. The logwood trade was the next topic which fell under the Noble Lord's observation, and on the great importance of this he also expatiated. He then observed upon what had fallen from a Noble Lord on a former evening, to the effect, that whatever claims should be demanded by France, would be founded on the arguments urged by him (Lord G.). Nothing, however, could be a greater misunderstanding. Never could any man possibly be less the advocate for France than he was; and if the cause were never pleaded but by him, it would be very feebly urged indeed. His opinion upon the effect of the omissions with respect to the navigation of the eastern seas, remained unaltered. In the treaty of 1783 it was stipulated that we should continue quietly to exercise our rights in that respect; and these were held of such high importance, that the treaty of 1787 was negotiated principally with the view of ascertaining these claims, and to avert a war, which was just about to be entered into, in consequence of the unfounded pretensions of France in that respect. He thought that a distinct explanation should take place even now with France upon this point, which may be effected in the course of five days, and before the cession of the Cape, Malta, &c. was carried into effect. He then touched upon the recent acquisitions made by France on the continent of North America, and adverted to the unfavourable and general effects they might have upon the interests of this country in that quarter, particularly with respect to our West India commerce in periods of war. From this topic he passed to the acquisitions of territory made by France on the continent of Europe, and the serious consequences with which these were fraught; and, drawing to a conclusion, he recalled to the recollection of the House some of the leading passages of the last speech of the illustrious King William, which ought, he said, ever to be impressed on their Lordships' minds, respecting the aggrandizement of France at that period, in consequence of a Prince of the House of Bourbon being placed on the throne of Spain, by which the French King would become master of the whole Spanish monarchy; in consequence of which, this country could never experience the blessings of real peace, but must continue to be exposed to all the expenses and inconveniences of war. This reasoning, his Lordship contended, applied most emphatically to the state of the two countries at the present period; and, after further expatiating upon these general points, and the vital importance of the subject in question, in the discussion of which, not only the dearest interests of the nation, but the character of the House was involved, his Lordship concluded by moving, "That this House do, on Friday se'nnight, take into consideration the definitive treaty of peace."

LORD PELHAM said, he could not pretend to follow the Noble Lord through the extended range of observations that he had made, but there were certain leading points to which he would give some answer. The Noble Lord had stated several important topics as variations in the definitive treaty from the preliminary treaty: but he could not admit that they were variations; and where they differed at all, it was in being more fully explained in the definitive treaty than they had stood in the preliminaries. As to what the Noble Lord had said of the breach of the public faith to the Queen of Portugal, he did not think that charge at all imputable to this country: as far as it was in the power of his Majesty's Ministers, they had stipulated for the integrity of her Most Faithful Majesty's territories and possessions as they were previous to the commencement of the war; and as to the exception relative to the limits of the French possessions in South America, that article was stipulated between Portugal and the French by a separate treaty, over which Great Britain had no control, not being a contracting party; but Ministers had obtained an explicit definition of those limits, which were determined by the fall of the river Arawari into the ocean below the North Cape near the Isle Neuve, and the Island of Penitence. With regard to the House of Orange, most undoubtedly it had been stated, when the preliminaries were under consideration, that there were hopes of obtaining for the Prince of Orange such a compensation as would be entirely satisfactory to that unfortunate and illustrious personage; but though they had not been able to succeed in that, they had prevailed so far as to induce the French to make a public acknowledgment that the House of Orange had suffered losses in what was now termed the Batavian republic, and to declare that an adequate compensation should be procured to the Prince for his losses. In respect to the Cape, which was another point to which the Noble Lord had called the attention of the House, they had procured a full explanation of the stipulation respecting it, which was to be found in the definitive treaty. His Lordship spoke to what Lord Grenville had said of what he had termed a new public law of Europe, which he had declared would be the law of the King of France; and said that such was the inevitable result of a peace, where a renewal of ancient treaties could not be attained. He denied that the construction put upon the condition relative to the Russian prisoners was the true construction; he could not, he said, admit that this country was to be at the expense of furnishing and clothing them. With regard to the island of Malta, it had been hoped that the Emperor of Russia would have accepted of being the guarantee of the island's independence, which he owned would have been more desirable than the present arrangement respecting the island; but if they could rely on the good faith of France, the danger the Noble Lord apprehended was not likely to arise. His Lordship said, having thus imperfectly answered the principal facts spoken to by the Noble Lord, he would detain the House no longer; but conclude with moving the amendment, of leaving out the words "Friday se'nnight," and inserting "Wednesday the 12th instant."

LORD THURLOW rose, not, he said, to go into the subject of the definitive treaty, but to observe that the Noble Lord opposite had not been regular in his proceeding that day. The Noble Lord had on a former occasion given notice, that he would on the present day move to fix a day for taking the definitive treaty into consideration. He ought, therefore, in strict order, to have confined himself to that, and that alone, without entering so largely into the subject in detail. He did not mean, his Lordship said, to deviate from the rule he had just laid down; but he must observe, that all subsisting treaties were at an end as soon as a war was commenced with those who are parties to them. It behoved those, therefore, who plunged the country into the war, not to have set the treaties loose by COMMENCING HOSTILITIES; but it by no means followed as a matter of course, that ancient treaties were necessarily to be revived and renewed in every treaty of peace; that must depend on the will of the contracting parties.

The EARL OF CARLISLE rose, not to detain the House, or deviate in the least from the rule laid down by the Noble and Learned Lord, but to confine himself strictly to the amendment, and the point of difference between Wednesday and Friday being the day agreed upon to take the treaty into consideration. His Lordship wondered at the assertions of the Noble Lord high in office, that the Noble Lord near him had advanced no argument to prove the necessity of taking the treaty into consideration; every sentence, or rather every period that he had uttered, was a strong argument in proof of that necessity; and, as to the Noble Secretary's assertion, that there were no variations between the definitive treaty and the preliminary treaty, nothing could be more unlike than the one was to the other.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said, that if by the omission of the mention of former treaties they were all to be considered as abrogated, and if the public law of Europe was thus altered, he had no difficulty in saying, that an address should be voted to his Majesty, praying that he would dismiss his present Ministers from his councils for ever. But he trusted that the fact was far otherwise, and that the conduct of Ministers deserved no such censure.

LORD AUCKLAND said, he had heard with the liveliest satisfaction what had fallen from the Noble Lord over-against him, with respect to our rights in India. It certainly had been imputed to him on the continent, and pretty generally believed in this country, that he had declared these rights to depend upon the treaties of 1783 and 1787. But he had now affirmed in the most decided and manly manner, these rights to be inherent in us as sovereigns of Bengal. Lord Auckland said, that he himself was in possession of information which he should take an early opportunity of laying before the House, and which would clearly prove that the French had not the shadow of a claim to disturb us in the quiet and exclusive enjoyment of our possessions and privileges in that quarter of the world.

The question was put, and the amendment, that the treaty be taken into consideration on Wednesday se'nnight, agreed to, and the Lords ordered to be summoned.

HOUSE OF LORDS, MAY 5TH, 1802.

The EARL OF CARLISLE said, that he was afraid that it had been too truly said, that the Prince of Orange, who had lost property to the value, as he understood, of above 100,000*l.* besides his public dignities, and great official income and emoluments, had been deserted by this country in the conclusion of the definitive treaty, and no security taken for an adequate compensation to be made him for the valuable property of which he had been plundered. His Lordship declared that the reason avowed for the confiscation of the Prince of Orange's property, was his steady adherence to his treaties of alliance with this country, and his faithful performance of every stipulation entered into with Great Britain. That being the case, his Lordship said, it was highly incumbent on this country not to lose a moment in endeavouring to set on foot some means of enforcing the due execution of the 18th article of the definitive treaty, that an adequate compensation shall be procured for the losses suffered by what is therein contemptuously denominated a branch of the House of Nassau. His Lordship commented at some length on the strange wording of that article of the treaty, and asked, what security could this country imagine that article held out for the compensation of the losses of the Prince of Orange, when it was coupled with the very alarming and extraordinary circumstance of the known fact, that two of the contracting parties, Holland and France, at the very moment after the Noble Marquis had affixed his name to the definitive treaty, retired to a corner under the same roof, and signed a convention, containing a declaration on the part of Holland, that she was not to be called on for any compensation to the House of Nassau, and a guarantee of that declaration on the part of France, both parties at the time solemnly executing that convention, as their explanation of the meaning of the 18th article of the definitive treaty? His Lordship read this convention to the House, and descanted upon it for a considerable time; and having urged many arguments to prove that the public faith of Great Britain was pledged to procure a full and adequate compensation to the Prince of Orange, our faithful ally, concluded with moving, That an humble address be presented to his Majesty, humbly to request his Majesty to give orders that a copy of the convention signed and executed at Amiens, communicated to his Majesty's Ministers, be laid on the table of that House.

LORD PELHAM rose to reply, and after a few introductory remarks, assured the Noble Earl that to present any such address as was moved could answer no purpose whatever, as no such communication as that referred to had ever been made to his Majesty's Ministers, nor was he apprized from any authority that such a convention had been entered into.

The EARL of CARLISLE expressed his surprise at the Noble Lord's reply, because, though he could not have procured a copy of the convention in question, yet surely the Noble Lord, as Secretary of State, could have ordered the proper person at Paris to have demanded a copy of it, and to have transmitted it to his Majesty's Ministers. His Lordship took notice of the singular expression made use of by the Noble Secretary of State, in the course of the preceding evening's debate, viz. that he owned he had been disappointed, in respect to procuring a better security for a full and adequate compensation to the Prince of Orange and his adherents, for their respective losses. Surely the Noble Lord, from the official authority he was clothed with, might have directed the Noble Negotiator on the part of Great Britain, to have insisted on a fuller and more explicit and satisfactory article than the 18th article that now stood in the definitive treaty; for he was persuaded that the Noble Marquis, if he had been aware that such a convention would have been entered into, as that immediately afterwards executed between Holland and France, would not have suffered the honour of the British character to have been stained, by a desertion of the interests of the Prince of Orange and his adherents, in direct violation of the good faith of this country, and its indispensable duty.

The MARQUIS CORNWALLIS immediately rose to defend his own conduct, and said, he could not conceive that there was any ground to suspect that the 18th article of the definitive treaty would not be solemnly fulfilled. Neither could he conceive that a separate agreement, entered into by two of the contracting parties to the definitive treaty by themselves, as it were in their closet, without the concurrence or consent of the other contracting parties, could possibly be liable to be considered as affecting the due execution of a treaty, for which the good faith of all the four contracting parties was pledged. With regard to his having deserted, or suffered the interests of the Prince of Orange and his adherents to be deserted, he disdained the imputation; he had deserted no interests that this country was bound in honour to maintain, and he had not the smallest doubt that a full and ample compensation would be procured for the Prince of Orange and his adherents.

The LORD CHANCELLOR contended strenuously that the pledged faith of nations was an ample security for the stipulation to procure a full compensation for the losses suffered by the House of Orange.

LORD AUCKLAND, in a speech of some length, acknowledged his regret that a more satisfactory article had not been obtained as a security for the compensation to be made to the Prince of Orange, than the 18th article of the definitive treaty; he disliked both the substance and the expression of that article; he wished to have seen the means of making the compensation, the amount of it, the fund from which it was to be taken, described explicitly in an article upon the subject. But he was aware that great allowance was to be made to a negotiator, and to whom great indulgence was to be shewn, because he knew from his own experience in diplomacy how much negotiators were obliged to concede in order to obtain a favourite object. He spoke highly of the claims of the Prince of Orange on this country, from what fell within his own knowledge during the four years he had spent in Holland as a Minister for this country, just previous to his leaving which the French army were within seven miles of the Hague. Dissatisfied, however, as he was with the definitive treaty, he derived some consolation from the Noble Marquis's declaration, that he had no doubt but that the 18th article would be solemnly fulfilled by the contracting parties.

The MARQUIS CORNWALLIS explained that he had said, if the faith of nations, publicly and solemnly pledged, was to be relied on.

LORD CARLISLE having charged Ministers with something like swindling, in having disposed of the territories of the Prince of Orange, delivered by him into our hands in trust to hold for him,—LORD HOBART denied that the Dutch colonies, which we had obtained, had been delivered into our hands by the Prince of Orange, or by his means; he had himself, his Lordship said, been the person to receive the answer sent by the governors of the Dutch colonies to the letters they had received in the Prince's name, and the answers to all those letters uniformly stated, that the governors could give no reply to the orders of the Prince of Orange, dated from Hampton Court. Lord Hobart mentioned the governors of Berbice, Demerary, Essequibo, and Ceylon, as having given these answers, and contended that we obtained those colonies by force of arms.—LORD GRENVILLE contended that one of those islands was put into our hands through the means and influence of the Prince of Orange.—LORD HOLLAND said, he agreed in part with what the Noble Lords below him (Lords Grenville, Spencer, and Carlisle) had stated, but he disagreed with them materially in some points. He did not so much quarrel with the 18th article in the treaty, nor think the terming of the Prince of Orange a branch of the House of Nassau, was worth fighting for. He did not believe France would at any time have allowed the Stadtholder (who was the servant, and not the sovereign, of the Dutch republic) the title of the Prince of Orange.—A conversation arose about the article of the project of 1797, concerning the claim to hold the Cape, Ceylon, and Cochin, in our hands, by the treaty then negotiating.—The LORD CHANCELLOR had, in some former speech, insinuated, that he believed the Ministers of that day would have consented to recede from a part of that claim.—LORD GRENVILLE denied this, and said he had the authority of the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, the late Secretary at War, and he had no doubt but he should have the testimony of two Noble Friends of them present, that it never was meant to recede in the smallest degree from the whole of that claim.—EARL SPENCER, and the EARL of ROSSLYN, both rose and vouched for the truth of this declaration by the Noble Lord.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, MAY 5TH, 1802.

Mr. ELIOT rose to move for certain papers connected with the definitive treaty. He said, he had no doubt the motions he had to propose would meet with the unanimous assent of the House. After the candid avowal of the Noble Lord, and the declaration of the Right Hon. Gentleman, he was convinced that Ministers would be eager to furnish the House with all the information necessary to a full and fair discussion of the merits of the definitive treaty. The first paper for which he should move was, the treaty of Badajos. There were two treaties concluded at Badajos, one between Portugal and France, which never was ratified, and another between Portugal and Spain, which was ratified, and which was the document he alluded to. By that the important town of Olivenza was ceded to Spain, and the integrity of Portugal was most materially violated. This paper was alluded to in the seventh article of the definitive treaty; therefore no objection could possibly be made to producing it. His second motion should be for copies of any conventions or armistices concluded between Portugal and Spain during the year 1801, and communicated to the British Government. It was to be feared that these contained many commercial stipulations highly detrimental to this country; and one of them was the basis of the treaty by which a great part of Portuguese America was ceded. The Hon. Gentleman now entered into a consideration of the fatal effects of this session. He said this district had always been reckoned of the utmost importance by Portugal, not on account of its fertility, not on account of its population, not on account of its trade, though all these were considerable, but because it was the only security for the valuable but vulnerable possession of Brazil. This was forcibly illustrated by the treaty of Utrecht concluded in 1713, which was guaranteed by Great Britain. By the articles of this treaty, France was expressly prohibited from crossing the river St. Vincent, or trading to the mouth of the Amazons. In the preliminaries it was declared that the dominions of her Most Faithful Majesty should be preserved entire. But on the 29th of September, two days before the signature of the preliminaries, a treaty had been concluded between Portugal and France, by which the former power was obliged to cede an immense tract of country in America. When the Noble Lord was questioned upon this point, he was evidently much embarrassed and perplexed. At last an explanation was given; from which it appeared, that by entire was meant the dominions of which Portugal had not been despoiled. This statement of the Noble Lord, however, was questioned in the French councils, and no satisfactory information could be obtained. The treaty of Badajos might be adhered to, but the object of France was as completely gained as if her original pretensions had been admitted. She had secured to herself the navigation of the Arawari. From a Dutch map that he had, one or two copies of which only were in England (the rest, from their uncommon accuracy, having been bought up by the Dutch government), it appeared that the only entrance into this river was between the two islands Nuova and Penitenza. France thus controlled the commerce of Brazil, and the whole wealth of South America lay at her mercy. What means she might use to extend her usurpations he would not pretend to foretell, or whether she might not halt for a while to consolidate what she had already usurped. But, after what had taken place in Italy, not a doubt could be entertained that, sooner or later, France would seize on Brazil and Peru. The words of the definitive treaty inflicted upon this country a needless indignity. It asserted the integrity of Portugal, and guaranteed its dismemberment. We held out our protection only to display our weakness. He should thirdly move for the copies of any treaties entered into between Spain and France during the late negotiations for peace. Our new ally dealt in masked conventions, and, after several mock treaties, one made its appearance, by which the whole of Louisiana was ceded to France. She thus got possession of a large and fertile tract upon the river Mississippi, not more distant from Mexico than Northumberland from the metropolis of England. Much had been said of capital; here was a capital on which France would not fail to draw, and the world might long rue that such resources were in such hands. The French were now brought up to the very con-

finances of Canada, and might soon re-establish their empire in that country. But the United States of America had most to fear. Kentucky and the western states had little connexion with the eastern; they were separated by immense forests, and peopled by different inhabitants, adventurers from every quarter. The only outlet to their trade was the Mississippi, and the American government had stipulated with Spain for the free navigation of that river. Now these states must be completely under the control of France. If France does not separate them from the rest, she will make America at all times dependant upon her, and will draw her into the confederacy against our naval greatness and the dignity of our flag; if indeed he could use the expression now that the dignity of our flag, which had once been reckoned our most valuable possession, had been disgraced and degraded. It might be said, that the spirit of Europe would rise to prevent these usurpations in America. Some people seemed to consider the spirit of Europe as a kind of incantation. A foul and flagrant usurpation had lately taken place in the very heart of Europe, while Europe inertly looked on; yet the spirit of Europe was to protect the independence of America. Gentlemen who held this language had profited little by ten years of woful experience. When France had conquered the continent of Europe, could the continent of America be safe? The expedition to Egypt was at first called visionary; but if the principles of the present day had been acted upon by Ministers then, France would now have been in quiet possession of that country, and perhaps other provinces of the Ottoman empire would have fallen a prey to her rapacity. He maintained that the cession of Louisiana had changed the whole complexion of the question. Had this fact been known at the time when the preliminaries were debated, he was well convinced the House would have paused before assenting to them. He had great respect for Ministers as individuals, and he would by no means say that they wished to impose upon the House. He believed that they were ignorant themselves; but ignorance would not excuse them. Did they take the proper means to procure information? Did they peremptorily put the question? If France returned no answer, that was the greatest indignity to the Government and to the country. If France returned a false answer, it was a fraud; and in either case the negotiations ought to have been broken off. At any rate, they were acquainted with the fact before the signature of the definitive treaty; and before they proceeded farther, they were bound in honour to come again and ask for the opinion of the House. Mr. Eliot concluded by moving, "That an humble address be presented to his Majesty, praying that he would be graciously pleased to give direction for there being laid before the House a copy of the treaty of Badajos, re-

LORD HAWKESBURY said, that he did not know whether he could regularly reply at present to the Hon. Gentleman's remarks. To the motion before the House, he had not the slightest objection; but he must say, that if the Hon. Gentleman was not disorderly, he had taken a most unusual mode of proceeding: he defied any one to point out an instance when, in the height of faction, an Opposition had ever adopted such a line of conduct. There had frequently been discussions concerning armaments and other acts of Government, and the constant practice had been to give notice of a motion for an inquiry, to move for necessary papers, without entering into the main question; and when appointed, then at least to state the reasons why Ministers should not be censured or dismissed. Gentlemen, in making their preliminary motions now, took the widest range; and, from what occurred in another place, it appeared were inclined to speak to order, when an answer was attempted to their laboured harangues.

Dr. LAURENCE affirmed, that such a speech he had never heard in that House. He and his Hon. Friends were denominated a faction, and the most unworthy motives were imputed to them. A custom had prevailed for some years of commencing offensive war from the Treasury Bench the moment that any measure of Government was questioned. He was proceeding to state the fatal effects of the non-renewal of former treaties, when—The SPEAKER expressed a wish to know whether it was the pleasure of the House that the debate should take this turn? He submitted to the House, whether, when a motion had been made and acceded to, it was orderly for any Member to enter on the whole subject over again?—Mr. T. GRENVILLE professed to entertain the highest respect for the authority of the Chair; but he begged the House to consider the situation in which they stood. There were three motions before the House, and three questions depending; these had been severally answered from the other side of the House, and he could hardly suppose it was the intention of the House to prevent a Member from observing on the three.—The SPEAKER again interfered, by observing, that the conversation was irregular, as the motion immediately before the House was assented to.—Mr. GREY said, it was quite new to him to be told that the assent of any one member precluded all discussion, and was to be considered so decisive that the motion must be agreed to. If he was right in supposing such doctrine unfounded, the only question was, whether the argument of his Hon. and Learned Friend were relative or not? He conceived that on a motion for further information, he was competent to state the magnitude and importance of the case that called for it, and that it was no indulgence, but the right of every Member.—The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER was not inclined to dispute the position laid down; but he contended that the objection was, that the mode of argument did not apply to any one of the three questions, but to the non-renewal of the treaties. In his opinion, therefore, the argument, even according to the most liberal practice of the House, was not relevant.

Dr. LAURENCE, in continuation, said, that the unprecedented situation in which we stood, justified the course that he had taken. The subject was of such magnitude, that it could not be discussed in one day; Ministers, therefore, should not decline giving information on particular points as required, as it was the only way in which it could be obtained. He admitted, that they had on former occasions given some explanation on the subject of the new boundary of French Guiana; but he denied that any body could have concluded that it would be as it is now settled. The House did not know whether the treaty of Madrid were an existing treaty or not; and this ignorance was a confirmation of the disgrace of the country. In the tricking language of the preliminaries, the integrity of Portugal was guaranteed, but not as before the war. When this defect was discovered, then came another sort of integrity; so that we were glad to get out of the trap in which we were caught, by leaving a part behind us. It was true we had sent Portugal a sum of money; but was this alone acting with good faith to a nation to whom we owed protection? It was unfair to answer the charge of the surrender of our flag, by extolling our navy. Nobody questioned the lustre of its achievements. If in the late war it was a triumph that we could throw supplies into Gibraltar and escape a battle, how great must be the glory of our navy now, when it is matter of regret that we could not cut away the chained navy of France from her shores? The British flag was the last symbol of our dominion in the Northern seas. (Hear! Hear!) It was to that the disapprobation was directed; and when Ministers should come forward to justify its surrender, he hoped they would not construe the charge into an attack upon the British navy.

The motion was put and carried.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, MAY 6TH, 1802.

EARL TEMPLE IOSE, in consequence of a former notice, to move for certain papers relative to Malta. In the first place, however, he said, he should state the reasons which induced him to call for these papers: it was agreed in the preliminary treaty, that Malta should be restored to the Order as it was before the war, placed under the guarantee of a third power. By the definitive treaty both these stipulations were infringed; the Order is not restored to its situation before the war; and a new langue has been introduced into the Order, inconsistent with the radical principles of nobility, on which the Order is founded, as not requiring proofs of nobility. This, his Lordship contended, was a departure from the original stipulation, founded upon the revolutionary principle of interference with the internal constitution of foreign powers, and consequently objectionable. Another stipulation enjoins the knights to return; an injunction with which they could not be supposed willing to comply, in consequence of the want of support, four fifths of their revenues having been swept away. Supposing that they were to return and to elect a Grand Master, the election would be made under the influence of France, if, indeed, the election of a Grand Master had not already taken place, it being well known that France has continued to carry on an intrigue with the people of the island to surrender it to France on its evacuation by the English, and the treaty having stipulated for the validity of such an election. Another stipulation excluded the Barbary powers from the ports of Malta; whereas it was only by keeping them open to these powers, that the independence of the island could be maintained; as it was from them that the island was supplied with provisions. Another objection was, that the treaty proclaimed the neutrality of the island; but it did not guarantee that neutrality, or state any thing specific. The clause inviting his Sicilian Majesty to garrison it for a year with two thousand troops, was also delusive, his Sicilian Majesty having no interest to induce him to undertake that trouble and expense; and, even supposing that he should, it would be only putting the island in the hands of France. In answer to these objections, it was said, that the great powers of Europe were guarantees of its independence. This also was unsatisfactory. It did not appear that they had accepted the trust, nor have we any security that they would. Supposing, however, that they should accept it, still the island must eventually fall under the power of France. Russia was too remote, and had a design upon it. Prussia and Austria had no interest, and could not be expected to take an active part, after tamely acquiescing in the establishment of the Italian republic. The result, therefore, would be, to leave it at the disposal of France, Spain, and Great Britain, being a majority against us. His Lordship then proceeded to expatiate upon the importance of the island, and also upon the strength and value of the island of Elba, and the usurpation of the Italian republic. He next referred to the grand alliance in the reign of William the Third, as an example which we should have imitated in the present juncture; and concluded by moving, "That there be laid before the House a statement of the com-

"mercant duties and territorial revenues of the island of Malta, since it was surrendered to his Majesty's forces, with those duties and revenues distinguished into annual accounts."—The motion was put and agreed to.

EARL TEMPLE then moved, "That an humble address be presented to his Majesty, that he will be graciously pleased to lay before the House a copy of the treaty concluded at Luneville, between the Emperor of Germany and the French republic."

LORD HAWKESBURY said, he did not rise to make any answer whatever in this course of the proceedings, which he thought would not be right or regular, but simply to state in a few words why he should object to this motion. The first motion of the Noble Lord was for a mere matter of account to be laid before the House, and he had offered no objection to it, nor had he any; but this was of another kind, and he objected to it, because no parliamentary ground either had been, or could be stated for the production of the treaty which it called for. Yesterday motions had been made, and one of them for the treaty of Badajos; to which he did not object, because a fair parliamentary ground was laid for its production, and therefore he did not oppose it; nor did he, after this motion was modified, oppose that for the production of the treaty of Madrid. The treaty of Luneville was concluded a year ago, and this country was no party to it; and it was not included in the definitive treaty of peace:—under these circumstances he did not think any parliamentary ground was laid for this motion. This treaty could not be wanted for information, because, in reality, they might have a copy of it at almost every bookseller's shop in this town. There was no ground for calling for it as a state document. Gentlemen had no right to say, that this treaty was in the hands of Ministers. He did not say it was not; but he did say, that there was no parliamentary ground laid for the House to say it was. Feeling that this application to the House was different from that to which the House assented yesterday, that no parliamentary ground was laid for calling for it, that it had no connexion with the treaty of peace, nor with any thing arising out of it, he took the liberty of resisting this motion.

• Mr. T. GRENVILLE said, he could not allow the distinction made by the Noble Lord between the treaties of Madrid and Luneville, neither of which were mentioned in the definitive treaty; but both were intimately connected with it. The cession of the Cisalpine republic was so generally understood to increase the power of France in that quarter, that most people thought we should have retained Malta, as a countervailing possession. It could not then be argued, that the treaty of Luneville, by which the Cisalpine republic was given up to France, was a question unconnected with a discussion relating to Malta.

Mr. PITT said, that his Noble Friend had not stated that the treaty in question had or had not been officially communicated to Government; he merely stated that the Noble Lord and the Gentlemen who supported this motion had no parliamentary ground upon which they could assert that this treaty had been so officially communicated. But he really could not conceive how the production of this treaty could be necessary for the purpose of the debate; nor did he think it could be properly applied for on the grounds which had been stated: his Right Hon. Friends must know, that the treaty of Luneville was not made in conjunction with this country, and that we were not a party necessarily connected with it. Whether we approved of the government of Austria yielding to the necessity which dictated that treaty, was another question; but it certainly was not a British question. But on what grounds did the production of this treaty appear to be necessary to a free, comprehensive, and candid discussion of the treaty of peace, such as tended to convey substantial information, to enable the House to form a judgment satisfactory to themselves and the public?—The mode of proceeding adopted by his Right Hon. Friends upon this occasion seemed to be, to separate, and to take one by one, the different articles of this treaty; and by these motions, to discuss each stipulation by itself, instead of investigating the whole treaty at once, and deciding upon its general merits. His Hon. Friends confessed that the subject was not before the House; they called for documents to enable them to decide; and yet they argued with as much peremptoriness and decision, as if not only no further information was necessary, but as if the question admitted of no doubt. They decided without hesitation or difficulty, that one stipulation was ineffectual—that another was inconsistent with the interest of the country—that a third was disgraceful, &c. He agreed with his Right Hon. Friends, that this subject was to be considered with a reference to the general situation of Europe—granted; but if the treaty of Luneville was laid before the House, of what use would it be at present? His Right Hon. Friend opposite to him (Mr. Grenville) had lamented some of the stipulations of that treaty—so did he. It was, however, now set aside by an act of the French government, which was a new monument of the ambition of that country, erected even between the preliminary and definitive treaty. His Right Hon. Friends opposite to him, and he, did not differ in their opinions of the Chief Consul and government of France. As far as that conduct went, it might be urged as an objection to the whole treaty. He did not differ from them upon general points, but with regard to the inference.

that might be drawn from them. The way to consider this subject would be, in his opinion, when the time for discussion came, to consider the objects gained and fortified by the treaty of peace, compared with the probable effect of a continued prosecution of the war, under all the circumstances in which Europe was placed, when all the other powers were making separate treaties of peace, and securing their separate interests. He had said, perhaps, more than was necessary; but he merely said this to shew the view in which he considered the question. There was nothing more unfair, in his opinion, than thus taking the treaty article by article, and debating it in detail, when the only proper way to consider such a subject was to take it in the whole, with all its bearings and objects; to consider the situation of Europe, and the hopes, by continuing the war, of altering its situation, and to compare them with the difficulties of continuing the war. His opinion of the situation and resources of the country was well known; it was such as ought not to compromise the safety or dignity of the country. He never thought so; and he was now less than ever induced to hold that opinion; we were far from having arrived at the ultimate period of our resources. This was a general question; and he really thought that his Right Hon. Friends would do better to wait for the period of general discussion, than to adopt this plan, which, however, strictly speaking, was not irregular or unparliamentary, of discussing the treaty in detail, and making every motion for a paper a vehicle for general animadversions upon the peace. This kind of debating could answer no good purpose, and therefore he was not surprised that Ministers declined this mode of discussing the subject, and waited for the day appointed for taking the treaty into consideration.

Mr. JONES said, it was not his intention to trouble the House with a long speech on this subject; nor indeed did he think it would be fair, after the very extended, and, no doubt, extempore oration that they had heard from the Noble Mover of this proposition. He could not help remarking, that though that Noble Lord disclaimed asking the judgment of the House, he took the utmost pains to bias that judgment. It seldom happened that he (Mr. Jones) and the late Chancellor of the Exchequer agreed in opinion—(A loud laugh)—yet such was the fact, that the observations of that Right Hon. Gentleman in the course of this evening were exactly the same as those which he delivered yesterday. He hoped, therefore, that the Right Hon. Gentleman would forgive him for concurring with his opinion on this occasion. He condemned the persevering efforts of the Gentlemen who supported this motion, to prepossess the minds of the House, notwithstanding the repeated exhortations they had received, the obvious impropriety and the known unpopularity of such conduct. He would not say that such behaviour was à la Ja- cobin—for that was a phrase out of use—but it undoubtedly was a little à la Porcupine. If the Gentlemen wanted to gain a point by wearing out the House, they were certainly right to return to the attack day after day; for as the Latin proverb goes, Gutta cavat lapidem, non vis, sed sepe cadendo. But let these Gentlemen say what they pleased about the peace, they would not make the country dislike it. The country rejoiced in the peace, for it had restored comfort to every fireside. He firmly believed there was a sincere determination in the Governments, both of this country and France, to maintain the peace. He would conjure the Hon. Gentlemen, therefore, to be no longer teasers of the public mind, and to give up this practice of provoking irregular discussion every day. Long speeches, he said, had been made about papers; he did not know what use would be made of them; but, certainly, the movers worked well with the materials they had. Their efforts, however, were in vain, for the public would hear of nothing but peace.

Dr. LAURENCE contended, that it was perfectly proper, on moving for papers, to go into the discussion of those points to which the papers related; added to this, it was impossible to discuss a subject of such magnitude as the definitive treaty, where so many points were to be considered, in one debate, nor could they go with propriety into that discussion without the means of previously inquiring into the details which related to the subject. The treaty now asked for was one of two documents, the other being the treaty of Badajos, which related to Malta; and he thought it ought, as well as the latter, to be laid before the House.

The motion was negatived.

On EARL TEMPLE's last motion being put, for a copy of the laws and constitution of the Order of Malta, referred to in the 10th and 11th sections of the 10th article of the definitive treaty, LORD HAWKESBURY objected to it, observing, that he believed his Majesty's Ministers were not in possession of any official document of this nature; it was matter of history, and any one might refer to it.

Mr. VANSITTART observed, that he believed the Noble Lord might find the statutes of the Order of Malta in the work of Vertot!!!!!!

Dr. LAURENCE remarked, that it was rather unlikely that those statutes should be found in Vertot, seeing that they themselves were more bulky than the whole of Vertot's work.

LORD TEMPLE remarked, that it was strange that Ministers should be ignorant of that constitution which, in common with other powers, they in the definitive treaty had expressly guaranteed.

LORD HAWKESEURY denied that he said any such thing as that Ministers were ignorant of the Maltese constitution, but that they had no official document on the subject. There were some changes to be made in that constitution, which would be the subject of future discussion.

The motion was negatived.

HOUSE OF LORDS, MAY 7TH, 1802.

EARL SPENCER rose, and said, he did not think it necessary to make any apology for the motion that he should conclude with; the object of which would be, an address to his Majesty, that he would be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid on the table an account of the amount of the territorial revenues and duties upon commerce of the island of Malta, since the said island was surrendered to his Majesty's arms. The Earl said, he thought it wholly unnecessary to offer any apology for this motion, because it must be obvious to all their Lordships, that the island of Malta was a main article of negotiation in the lately-decided treaty of peace. In the preliminaries, according to the 4th article, it was stipulated that "The island of Malta, with its dependencies, shall be evacuated by the troops of his Britannic Majesty, and restored to the Order of St. John of Jerusalem: for the purpose of rendering the island completely independent of either of the two contracting parties, it shall be placed under the guarantee and protection of a third power." Let their Lordships look to the definitive treaty to see how far this preliminary was fulfilled. The first stipulation of the 10th article of the definitive treaty regulated what langues should continue to subsist after the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty, and invites the knights of the Order to return to Malta as soon as the exchange shall have taken place; that they shall form a General Chapter, and proceed to the election of a Grand Master from amongst the natives and those nations which preserve langues. His Lordship observed, that by a subsequent stipulation there should henceforth be no English nor French langue. The English langue had long discontinued to exist, and nominally by this stipulation the French langue was to be abolished; but would it in fact and effect be abolished? The remaining langues would be the three of Provence, Auxerre, and another district in Lombardy. From the state of dependence on France in which those places stood, they were to all intents and purposes French. Spain had two langues; and who would say that the French could not influence and even dictate to Spain in this as in every other respect? The Italian states had another langue; could it be denied that the relationship which the Italian republic and the Chief Consul, as President of that republic, stood in to each other, placed it beyond doubt that the Italian republic would be under the dominion of France? The remaining langue was the German one, and he did not mean to say that the German langue might not act independently; but what chance was there of securing the island of Malta in a state of independence under such circumstances? It was in fact neither more nor less than leaving the island of Malta in the power of France. His Lordship next spoke to the third stipulation under the 10th article of the definitive treaty, viz. the establishment of a Maltese langue to be supported out of the land revenues and commercial duties of the island, who were to have dignities and appointments, and an appropriate auberge, and that no proofs of nobility should be necessary for the admission of knights into the said langue. Upon this the Earl reasoned at considerable length; and, after contending that a langue of non-nobles would not assort well with the noble knights of the ancient langues, complained of it as a revolutionary organization of a new constitution of government for the island of Malta, not only without the consent, but without even having consulted the wishes, or taken the opinion, of the Maltese themselves. He also complained of the inaccuracy of the English version of that part of the third stipulation of the 10th article of the treaty. He did not believe that des habitants des îles de Malthe, &c. was rightly translated, when it was stated to mean the "native inhabitants of Malta," &c. &c. His Lordship considered the fourth stipulation, for the evacuation of the island and its dependencies by his Britannic Majesty within three months after the exchange of the ratifications, as exposing it to the immediate falling into the hands of the French; and said, it was not at all probable that the King of Naples should furnish two thousand men to serve as a garrison for the several fortresses on the island, when no resources were provided for their pay, clothing, and subsistence; but even supposing that the two thousand Neapolitans did garrison the fortresses of the island, what sort of resistance could such a small number of Italian troops make against the armed hordes that France might pour into the island? His Lordship passed great encomiums on the bravery of Sir Alexander Ball, and another British officer, on taking possession of the island, and while they continued to hold it; declaring, that they had so conciliated the affections of the Maltese towards the British, that they would have been much better pleased to have remained under the protection of his Majesty, than under that of any other power. In fact, his Lordship said, Malta ought to have been secured to Great Britain, on account of the various important interests of the British empire, upon which it bore in a material degree. Our Indian empire was greatly exposed, as well as our Levant trade, and all our connexions by the way of the Mediterranean, by Malta's being suffered to remain at the command of France; as every petty quarrel or trifling difference between the republic and the King of Naples might be used as a pretext for the French to send a force against the island, which, from their proximity of situation, they could do much sooner than we could equip and dispatch a fleet with troops on board to its succour and defence (and no fleet was equal to its blockade): but the whole of the article in the definitive treaty, and all its stipulations, were utterly impracticable. Where were the resources to come from, that were to defray the great and additional expense of supporting the new Maltese langue of non-nobles, of erecting and providing an auberge for them, for paying the two thousand Neapolitan troops, keeping the fortresses in repair, and all the other charges of the island? The amount of the produce of the territorial revenues, as far as he could learn, was somewhat about thirty thousand pounds, and the amount of the duties might be about ten thousand more, although he had no account of the customs. The gross amount of the two was scarcely equal to the charge of the present existing demands occasioned by the constitution of the government as it had hitherto stood; where, then, was the surplus that would be necessary to be found? His Lordship reasoned on all these points at some length; and, after thanking the House for their indulgent attention, concluded by moving, as he had intimated in the beginning of his speech, for "An account of the amount of the territorial revenues and commercial duties since the surrender of the island to his Majesty's arms."

LORD HOBART said, he did not rise to object to the motion; but, as a day was set apart for the discussion of the whole of the definitive treaty, he thought it ought to be considered all together, and not piecemeal. He therefore would not attempt to follow the Noble Earl through his speech. He would barely notice, that as the Noble Lord had admitted that Malta was impregnable by blockade, we should not have succeeded if the Maltese had not themselves paved the way for our obtaining possession of the island; and therefore it could not be impolitic to pay marked attention to the native inhabitants, by creating a Maltese langue. As we won the island by force of arms, we had an indisputable right to arrange its government; and the Noble Earl was mistaken in supposing, that the King of Naples would not send the two thousand men to garrison the fortresses of the island, as well as that he would not pay them. He would certainly do both. As to the additional expense which would be necessary to carry the article and its stipulations into effect, Malta was hereafter to be encouraged to pursue commerce; it was most advantageously situated for commercial purposes, and thence the revenue would increase beyond the power of correct calculation. His Lordship observed, he had said more than he meant to do when he rose, as he should reserve himself as to the treaty in general till Wednesday next.

[What is preserved of this day's debate is merely a selection of passages referring to the peace.—The debate was on Mr. Nicholls's motion for an address to the King, on the dismissal of the late Ministry.]

LORD BELGRAVE.—Comparing then the present period with that of the end of the year 1792, let him ask the House, whether they did not feel themselves a little more secure now, than they did at that time? Whether they did not feel themselves very much in the situation of mariners, who had just escaped the dangers of the most tremendous storm they had ever encountered, and who looked back upon the scarce subsiding waves with emotions of calm delight and unspeakable satisfaction? Every man, he said, not lost to all virtuous and honourable feeling, or whose intellects were not wholly benumbed, must have felt at the end of the year 1792, and at other periods of the war, no common anxiety for the fate of his King and country, his family, his friends, and his own safety; if indeed self, at such a moment of general alarm, could have intruded upon his attention. Let them turn their eyes on their present situation, on the vessel of the state having now weathered the storm, and riding in triumph and security in her native port; and then let him ask the House, whether some credit was not due to those who had steered her uninjured through a sea so threatening, so awful, and so tempestuous? As he had already said, he was unwilling to go into details, for the reasons he had stated; but he could not avoid shortly presenting to the view of the House a few of the most prominent features of the dangers they had escaped by the fortitude and exertions of the late Administration. They had not only France to contend with, but French principles supported by arms. They had not only a foreign enemy, but a domestic one, to alarm them and increase their difficulties.—While they had recourse only to legitimate means of carrying on the contest, France, in a state of unbridled licentiousness, had recourse to depredation, confiscation, and blood, to recruit her continually exhausted finances. In the early part of her revolution too, the deformity of her principles was something veiled by appearances so specious and alluring, that they for a while infused their fatal poisons even here; and the disaffected availed themselves of the delusion to spread their snares, and wave their treasons in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and especially the latter country, where the materials to work upon were found more combustible, and better suited to their diabolical designs.—Without dwelling, however, he said, on this part of the subject any longer, he should only add his firm conviction, that had it not been for the vigilance and firmness of his Majesty's government, at the time when the life of our beloved monarch was so basely and traitorously endangered, dreadful would have been the confusion, desolation, and bloodshed, for a season at least, in this metropolis. * * * * Lord Belgrave said, he now began to feel that he was about to tread upon somewhat more delicate ground than he had hitherto done, as he was going to speak of the public indeed, but personal character of his Right. Hon. Friend; but though the ground might be delicate, he should tread fearlessly, considering the person he had to speak of. For seventeen years full of trying events had he been at the head of his Majesty's councils; and though seventeen years, in the countless periods of eternity, might appear inconceivable in the life of man, the period was not short; for he said, if it had (unhappily for the country) pleased God to have removed him from this world at that awful moment when it was of so much importance to any man to be able to reflect that he has spent his life in active virtue, and not in idleness and dissipation, he would ask the House, whether they did not think his Right Hon. Friend might with truth have declared, "For seventeen years I have served my country with unsullied integrity, with entire personal disinterestedness, with the most laborious diligence, with perfect devotion to its interests, and with constant zeal and anxiety for its happiness and prosperity?"

SIR HENRY MILDMAY said, that under the impression of his feelings, which he believed in strict accordance with the general sentiments of his country, he could not give a silent vote. He neither cordially approved the original motion nor the proposed amendment. To the former he objected in principle, and the latter he considered a very inadequate testimony of the public feeling on the conduct of his Right Hon. Friend. From those who approved the principles of the war, and the object upon which it was undertaken and eventually pursued, he thought a more distinct and separate mark of applause was due to the late Minister. He was the person, and the only person, pointed at in the motion of censure, and he therefore thought that it was on his conduct only the House were bound to pronounce. He thought that the attack that had been made was not cured by a general lumping vote of thanks, that included a dozen different persons, whose merits, exertions, or responsibility, could by no possibility be the same. The Noble Lord had appeared to think so in some degree, as almost the whole of his speech went to the individual praise of the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, though his amendment involved the whole Administration. He did not think it necessary to advert to the various important measures that had distinguished the long services of the late Ministry, many of which alone were sufficient to justify an expression of the public gratitude, but which he thought far secondary to the great efforts and magnanimity he had displayed in protecting and preserving the constitution and the country. Others had had the merit of conducting us through wars that threatened our territorial and commercial power: but his Right Hon. Friend had had to encounter a new system of warfare, which, in addition to the objects of all former contests, pointed its hostilities against every acknowledged principle both divine and human; a war waged against every tie that binds society together, and would have involved all Europe in one indiscriminate confusion. France had attempted to introduce her poisonous principles here, and had tainted the minds of many; clubs were established in secret correspondence with Jacobin societies; and attempts were made in every part of the country, and by every means, to introduce revolutionary opinions, and weaken the allegiance of the people to the person and Government of his Majesty. It required no ordinary capacity, no common perseverance and vigour, to save the country from destruction under such circumstances: and he had no hesitation in ascribing the preservation of our religion, our laws, and our properties, and the security we now happily enjoy, to the efforts of the late Minister; to whom, he believed, we were indebted principally for checking these principles, which would have rendered the crown on the head of his Majesty precarious and insecure. It could not be expected that a contest where we had so much at stake, could have been maintained so long without considerable sacrifices from the people; but great as the burdens were they had to sustain, they had borne them with that fortitude and resignation which arose from the sense they entertained of their necessity. The Hon. Member had dwelt at large on the conduct of the war; he had neither recollection nor inclination to follow him, as he considered the present question to be on the general conduct of his Right Hon. Friend, and not a question of detail. Very strong invective had been used against various parts of the conduct of the war; he, however, was satisfied, as far as the present occasion went, with its successful issue in effecting the great object of security. He contended that no war in which this country had ever been engaged had contributed to raise the character of the British arms to so high a pitch. Every Englishman would recollect with pride, the naval victories we had achieved, the perseverance and gallantry of every officer and seaman of our fleets, and the skill that had been shewn, under the direction of Lord Spencer, in continuing for a period hitherto unexampled, the entire blockade of the enemy's ports, both in the Channel and the Mediterranean. He challenged the Hon. Member to shew any one instance, either by sea or land, where, with any thing like an equality of force, the event did not prove honourable to the British arms. We had retreated from the enemy many of her most valuable colonies, thwarted her in many of her most favourite objects, annihilated the whole of her marine, and possessed ourselves of the whole of her commerce, without any loss. These he thought the features of a successful war, and there was no period of it when they were more prominent, or when our prospects were more cheering, than at the time the late Ministers went out of office. He could not conceive, that, after nine years of expensive war, it was possible for any country to look to a more flattering prospect, either if the war was to be continued, or as affording the materials of honourable and advantageous negotiation.

MR. WILBERFORCE.—“ Instead of that narrow policy of temporary expedients with which he has been charged, I am of opinion that his conduct was directly the reverse; and its being so, is a proof of the highest integrity and political wisdom. There is another part of the Right Hon. Gentleman's conduct on which I dwell with particular admiration. When it was necessary to call forth the energy of the country in its own defence, he did so with a zeal and intrepidity beyond all praise; when again the country showed a wish for peace, he was as ready to comply with its wishes. When a peace had been concluded by other Ministers, after he himself had retired from office, being convinced that the nation wished for peace, he came forward to support that peace. His magnanimity in so doing is unparalleled; in this conduct he stands almost unrivalled and alone. This magnanimity appears in his whole conduct during the war. He knew that the country was powerful, but he knew also that it was free. He did not therefore madly oppose its wishes for peace; but, as soon as those were manifested, he made overtures for that purpose; and when those overtures failed, he again roused the energy of the country to compel the enemy to grant us honourable terms. These merits of my Right Hon. Friend are known and allowed by all; the united voice of the country has proclaimed them aloud. With regard to the motives which induced him to retire from office, they do not fall under the present discussion; but that they were honourable and patriotic, let me appeal to the voluntary support he has given to the honourable and patriotic men who have succeeded him.”

MR. GREY.—“ We are told, that the vessel of the state has outrode the storm, and now rides securely in port. In what does this security consist? Look to France, and see the situation in which we are left. There are not wanting those who affirm that the state, far from being in a port of security, can no longer entertain a hope of safety. Before I believe that we have gained all that we have not lost, I must hear very different arguments. We have now made peace with the French republic. We were called upon to do the same at the beginning of the contest. What dangers would the country have known then, to which it is not now exposed? Was the republic more formidable then than at present? But we were afraid of Jacobinism. Is the existing government of France built upon Jacobinism, or is it not? Let those answer who rejected the overtures of Buonaparté, and who justified their conduct in this House. Have we forgotten the position of a Right Hon. Gentleman, that the effect of the success of such an usurpation was a danger too tremendous to be encountered? There are few who will say, that the principles on which the government of Buonaparté is founded, are less jacobinical than those of the other governments which have sprung up in France since the revolution. Had Robespierre been allowed to consolidate his power, and to seat himself quietly on the throne, would he have been less safe to be treated with? If he had found it for his interest, would he not have suppressed the clubs, silenced discussion, shackled the press, and, after worshipping the Goddess of Reason, installed Christianity in the church of Notre Dame? These things have been done by one of whom such atrocities are related during his campaign in Egypt; and why might not the same line of conduct have been pursued by the other governments of France, who have vexed that ill-fated country? ill-fated in having lost its liberty, fortunate in conquest and aggrandizement: but these are poor compensations for being reduced under the yoke of despotism. * * * * * This resolution is to be passed after we have been forced into a peace such as England never concluded since she held her late high rank among the nations of Europe; a peace to be defended on the score of necessity, but which too clearly proves that this country is precipitated from that pitch of greatness to which the arms and the councils of our ancestors had raised it. I approved of the preliminaries, and I would by no means give a vote which would endanger a renewal of the war. But I feel myself strongly inclined to alter my opinion and my mode of acting, not only by events which have subsequently happened, but by the manner in which the peace is defended. What is the boasted port in which we are now riding securely? France has attained that power and those boundaries which few men in France, at the beginning of the contest, considered more than an idle dream. Her present limits are the ocean, the Pyrenées, the Rhine, and the Alps. Indeed she has gone beyond the Alps, and the Italian republic is no longer to be considered but as one of her departments. The Gentlemen on the other side of the House tell us we are secure and triumphant! The maritime and commercial advantages which France has gained are not less considerable. I am convinced that the House heard with astonishment the assertion of a Noble Lord (Lord Hawkesbury), that this peace secured to us a greater naval and commercial superiority than we had ever before enjoyed. The Noble Lord ought to have a more correct way of estimating these matters than tons of shipping or returns of exports. What are present advantages, unless we have some security for their enjoyment? Were these advantages less considerable before the war began? Consider for a moment, Sir, our prospects if we had remained at peace. Do we owe our superiority to the blood and treasure we have expended, to the taxes with which we are burdened, and to the exhaustion which we feel? I greatly fear that we have given France means to rival us upon the seas, which she never before possessed. With a sea coast from the Texel to Spain; with her ancient ports and new acquisitions in the Mediterranean, can it be doubted that she will become a great naval power? Has she no means of attacking yours? You are excluded from almost the whole continent of Europe; she has cut you out from the coast of Africa; she trades with greater advantages in India; from her formidable new position in America she makes the United States dependant, and controls the whole of your commerce to the West Indies. Let the Noble Lord now say that our naval superiority is greater and more firmly established than at any former era! To prove the fallen state of this country, I have only to appeal to the Right Hon. Gentleman's colleagues in office. Instead of expecting approbation, does it not lie on him to clear his character? He may be innocent; but is not the reduction of a great nation to comparative imbecility and insignificance, prima facie evidence of misconduct, which he and his friends are bound to repel?—All the Gentlemen who have spoken have dwelt largely upon the unparalleled difficulties with which the late Minister had to contend: here was the assumption of a fact without any proof. Who ever began a war with such confidence? what Minister had ever so few difficulties, in his own estimation, either at home or abroad? If difficulties did arise, he must prove that they were not produced by his own misconduct; and that without any fault of his, he is obliged to abandon all the objects for which he went to war, although his motto long was,

“Esse fuit; toto certatum est corpore regni.”

He had to struggle with financial embarrassments: when our trade was so extensive, when our credit was so high, could these arise without mismanagement? It is possible that they might; but it is too much to ask us, without inquiry and without proof, to believe that they did. Dissension relaxed the efforts of the confederacy, and at last dissolved it. But were not all his measures calculated to produce discord and jealousy? The grand object of the war was, to reduce the power of France, and to compel a government to abdicate which was inconsistent with civil society. When the destruction of a government was sought, what possible good effect could be produced by military operations in the West Indies? The loss of colonies had no effect in diminishing the influence of the rulers of France. The conquest of Martinique being achieved by those who are most dear to me, I must ever reflect on it with pleasure; but this and subsequent successes in that quarter, did not in the remotest degree advance the object of the war; the force sent thither was so much detached from that which should have been directed against the heart and vitals of the enemy. Was this the only evil of this selfish and impolitic plan? Could we expect that the confederacy would keep united, when it was seen that we were aiming at the aggrandizement of our own power? Distrust was generated, together with a similar desire of plunder, in all our allies. While we were pursuing schemes of conquest in the West Indies, the Emperor attempted to gain a new barrier for himself in the Netherlands, and took possession of Valenciennes in his own name. When we began to struggle for what were called British objects, when an attempt was made by our troops upon Dunkirk, dismay and disgrace attended our ill-directed efforts. These reverses are solely attributable to the fundamental error in the conduct of the war.—To shew the Right Hon. Gentleman's own views of the facility of the task he had undertaken, I would refer the House, Sir, to his repeated declarations of France being not only on the brink, but in the very gulf of bankruptcy. According to him, her resources were completely exhausted, and she could not keep an army in the field many weeks longer. What must be the Noble Lord's notion of the difficulties Ministers had to encounter, when he talked of marching to Paris?—Sir, our situation, for which we are to thank the Right Hon. Gentleman, is such as to justify a peace by far the most dangerous that the British nation ever concluded. The sacrifices which we made by the preliminaries were very great; but many things have happened since which are extremely alarming, and which had the House and the country then known, their joy would have been greatly damped. The island of Elba has been seized under circumstances which, since we are at peace with France, I forbear to state. Italy has been annexed to France; France has gained possession of Louisiana; and, what I think by no means the least important, by the non-renewal of former treaties we have lost many commercial advantages, and a wide door is opened for future altercation and animosity. A Right Hon. Gentleman (Mr. Addington) said, that we could not prevent the usurpations of France, since the Emperor did not oppose them. What is this but a confession that England is excluded from the affairs of the continent, and that France may carry on her ambitious schemes without molestation? I was a good deal amused with the Right Hon. Gentleman's assertion, that the island of Elba was ceded to France by a sovereign independent power, and that therefore we had no right to interfere. The late Minister affirmed, that the opening of the Scheldt was such a violation of the rights of nations, that for that alone he would have counselled a war against France. Is the annexation of the island of Elba to be compared for one instant to the opening of the Scheldt? Yet it is permitted without a struggle; and perhaps we did not even venture to remonstrate! To such a deplorable condition have the councils of the late Minister reduced us, that, after the preliminaries of peace, we are obliged to consent to a prodigious augmentation of the power of the enemy. When this is the sad result of their measures, we are gravely called upon to hail him as our deliverer."

LORD HAWKESBURY.—"I am asked, whether the ground of argument, on Jacobin principles, does not now exist in the same force and degree against the government of France, as it did when this country first opposed it on that account? To which I will answer, that Jacobin principles not only do not exist in the same force and degree; but, they do not exist at all. The Hon. Gentleman has asked, if Jacobin principles did not give birth to the present government of France? That is not the mode of considering the question; it is not material to consider what gave birth to the present government; the question is to us, what are its principles now? And in that respect there has been a complete change in the government of France. The present government of France has published to the world a recantation of every principle of Jacobinism, and of every other principle from which danger was apprehended, in a manner as satisfactory as the most sanguine friend of the war, or the most decided enemy of Jacobin principles, can desire. However I may regret the fate of the House of Bourbon, without considering whether that House was likely to be restored or not in the course of the war, yet if it had been for nothing more than a restoration of that House, the contest would not have been carried on; but the contest here was owing to the entire change of principles upon which the government had been carried on; all principles of established governments had been overturned, and it would have been at any time sufficient ground for other countries to adopt measures for the resistance of such principles, as being utterly hostile to all government whatever, they being in their nature calculated to overturn all constituted authorities. I may be asked, however, what I think of the recantation that has been made of those principles, and whether I think they give evidence of a recurrence to ancient principles? To which I answer, I am aware that whatever may be the desire of persons in France after such a conclusion, it will be impossible for them to set up an establishment upon the best of models, for they must take their materials as they find them. In the mean time, full credit is due to their profession, as far as it regards foreign powers, for they have publicly asked pardon of God and man, and done every thing they can to revert to the ancient established principles of government; and their measures, in every point I have been able to view them, have that tendency. It is an important consideration with reference to this peace, how far it would be prudent in this country, by a continuation of the war, to drive them again to revolutionary measures, where they must abandon the system of justice, moderation, and peace, which they have now adopted."

HOUSE OF LORDS, MAY 10TH, 1802.

LORD MINTO rose to take the first opportunity that offered to him, during the various discussions that had taken place in that House on the subject of the late definitive treaty of peace, to express his sentiments upon that most lamentable and degrading measure; a measure, under all its circumstances, which could not fail to tarnish the glory and splendour which the British character had attained by her conduct during the war in the eyes of admiring Europe. Far distant from his country, and a resident at Vienna during that period when so many countries of Europe shamefully suffered themselves to be overrun by the French arms, when so many nations had already submitted to French chains, and others, panic-struck by the successes of the French, were on the point of submitting without farther resistance, to bow under the French yoke, and receive laws at the dictation of the Consulate; it was his pride to observe, that England alone stood unshaken amidst the wreck of nations and governments; and at the moment when she was deserted on all sides by her allies, and left to contend single-handed with the enemy, she exhibited such an undaunted front to the foe, backed by so powerful a display of formidable strength and resources, as excited the admiration and astonishment of surrounding nations. It was his fortune, in these moments of timidity and despair, which marked the despondent feelings of other nations, to inspire them by appeals to the examples of his country, and to endeavour at rallying their broken spirits and languid exertions in the common cause. But when the news of this ignominious peace, concluded after so many splendid achievements by the British arms in every quarter of the globe; at a moment when our flag waved triumphant in every region of the universe; while we were masters of all the seas, and hourly adding new trophies to our fame, by some of the most brilliant feats of the whole war; he could not give credit to the assertion, but considered it as one of those habitual fallacies so notoriously propagated throughout the war by France, from whom this intelligence first reached Vienna. But when he was convinced of the fact by an official communication, the sensations of sorrow, of shame, and indignation, that he felt, were not to be expressed; and he could have wished, but in vain, to retract those representations of the undaunted spirit and unshaken fortitude of his country, which he had so often and so proudly urged to the ambassadors of other powers, in his endeavours to encourage them to renew and maintain the contest. But if with such decided advantages at the moment in our favour, covered with the glory of our successful efforts and victorious achievements, the Minister of his Majesty had thought fit to sign the preliminaries upon terms so much and so degradingly beneath what this country, under such circumstances, had a right to expect and to demand, what must be the sensations of Europe, what its astonishment, at the final conclusion of a definitive peace (after a year of negotiation) so much worse for the country and its most faithful allies, than the preliminaries stipulated; and this, too, in the very moment when France, by manœuvres of the most insidious fraud and violence, extended her territory, and enhanced, in a most formidable degree, her power and aggrandizement, under the new regulations of the Cisalpine, now called the Italian republic, and the fraudulent juggle of obtaining possession of the island of Elba; acquisitions made with a degree of fraudulent audacity in the face of Europe, and actually during the negotiation of a definitive treaty with this country; and this, without even a feasible pretence on one side, or the least remonstrance to such proceedings on the other? The Noble Lord expatiated upon the importance of acquisitions to France, which not only gave her the command of nearly the whole peninsula of Italy, and bid fair to give her speedy possession of the Genoese territory, by joining the Ligurian with the Cisalpine republic, but, by giving her the island of Elba, gave her not only some of the most valuable maritime ports in that part of the Mediterranean, but the absolute command of Leghorn; acquisitions which, considered with her new territories in Guiana and the West Indies, place her under circumstances more formidable than ever she before stood in at the conclusion of any war with this country since the Revolution. He reprobated in strong terms the conclusion of a definitive treaty, under new circumstances, that so totally changed the relative situation of the two countries, and could not withhold his strongest reprehension of those who had advised his Majesty to put his signature to a treaty which could not fail to degrade this country in the eyes of all Europe. However, much as this treaty was to be reprehended by every man who had the honour or the interests of England at heart, since it was concluded, and his Majesty's signature finally affixed thereto, it was far from his intention to excite against it public discontent or popular clamour; on the contrary, he held it to be the duty of the country at large to maintain it with as much fidelity as if it had been in all respects the most eligible. All that remained for us to do, under such circumstances, was, to be prepared to resist, with unity and effect, any aggression, in the first instance, which the enemy might be induced, on the consciousness of his power, or the views of his ambition, to attempt. His Lordship concluded by moving an humble address to his Majesty, "That there be laid before the House copies of such official communications as had been made to him respecting the late regulations in the Italian republic with France; and also respecting the surrender of the Tuscan possessions in the isle of Elba to the French republic."

LORD PELHAM had no objection to lay before the House, on this or any other important subject, any communications which his Majesty should think fit to authorize. But Government had received no communications on the subject mentioned by the Noble Lord. He did not mean to follow the Noble Lord through the whole of his reasonings and conclusions; in many of which, he would acknowledge his readiness to agree with the Noble Lord: and he did not hesitate to acknowledge to the Noble Lord, that his observations respecting the manner by which France became possessed of the Cisalpine republic and the isle of Elba were well founded; and that those alterations, considered of themselves, would have sufficiently justified his Majesty's servants in advising him to break off the treaty, and to renew the war. But under the consideration of all existing circumstances, it was thought best to conclude the definitive treaty.

LORD DARNLEY said, he had given a silent vote in support of the preliminaries; but he by no means considered himself as bound thereby to vote for the definitive treaty, which he considered materially different from the former; and therefore he should reserve his sentiments till that subject came regularly before the House.

LORD CARYSFORT could not avoid calling the attention of the House to the words of the Noble Secretary of State opposite to him; who, while he avowed the definitive treaty, yet declared that Government had received no communication whatever, even yet, upon the subject of the Italian republic, or the isle of Elba; which subject, the Noble Secretary himself acknowledged, would have been sufficient to justify him in advising his Sovereign to break off the treaty and renew the war. It would be most material then for the House to know explicitly what were those other circumstances which rendered it eligible to conclude a treaty of peace, in the view and contemplation of such transactions on the part of France, openly passing during the negotiation of the treaty.

The question being put on Lord Minto's motion, it was rejected.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, MAY 12TH, 1802.

DR. LAURENCE rose and said, that, having given way for some days past to public and private business, he was happy to find himself at length at liberty to make the motion of which he had given notice. Nothing had passed on any other day, or on this (notwithstanding the flattering picture that had been given of the state of public credit in the sister kingdom), that could induce him to abandon the opinion he entertained, that the treaty of peace lately signed was, in many respects, most fatal to the interest of the country. Let any person consider of what importance to this country were its possessions in the East; and let him at the same time consider how the security and well-being of these possessions were endangered by the non-renewal of the treaties by which they were heretofore protected. Let it be considered what advantages were given to the enemy by this neglect, or omission, or by whatever other name it was to be called; advantages which the enemy himself already exaggerated. He would content himself with a confined and limited consideration of the dangers to which our possessions in the East were exposed, though perhaps the whole were involved. He moved for information, not so much for himself as for the House; he required explanation, that the House might accept it where it should appear satisfactory; and he entered into discussion, that the facts might be fairly ascertained; so that when the House should come to debate on another day the most extensive and important subject that had ever been before it, Gentlemen might not be involved in assertions, contradictions, and errors. If, in his attempt to explain this subject to the House, he should fall short, he was happy that there were persons present, who, from the share that they had taken in the transactions of India, were fully adequate to make up any deficiency on his part. He saw a Noble Lord (Hawkesbury) smile; but if he had any conception of the magnitude of the interests which he had bartered away, he must be satisfied that such gaiety but ill became him. The treaties between this country, and France, and Holland, relative to India, were few and short; but as the countries to which they related were so distant, it was hardly possible that Gentlemen could be so clear as to the necessity and effect of their particular provisions, as of those of the treaties affecting the contiguous countries of Europe. When we were but simple merchants trading to the East, as all the nations of Europe had been previous to the conquests made by this country, a barren rock on the coast of Newfoundland was held to be an object of more importance than, than the settlement of Madras, the most valuable of that part of India where it was situated. From simple merchants we had advanced to the exercise of a delegated authority under the people of the country; in time our authority became paramount; and a people which was found capable of instructing the Greeks, when the Greeks conquered it, became nothing in their own country. Wherever the rights of others had been invaded, he should not hesitate to condemn that invasion. The authority of this country was substituted for that of the Great Mogul. He hoped that when he was forced to give an opinion on that substitution, he should give a sincere and honest opinion, but till called upon he should give no opinion. There was a question to come shortly before the House, in the discussion of which this matter might be somewhat elucidated; for the present, he should only disclaim the necessity of being the advocate of every thing that this country might have chosen to do. It was now necessary to see what rights had been asserted, though for his part he acknowledged no rights; to see what claims had been set up by France and Holland, and how those claims had been urged; to see what the triumphant treaty of 1763 had done for the adjustment of these claims. First, as to what related to Coromandel: France, in that treaty, renounced all the acquisitions she had made on the coast of Coromandel and Orissa since 1749. It had been said, that papers were unnecessary in debating a subject like this, for that history was sufficient. With pleasure and delight he appealed to a history so honourable as that of the period of which he now spoke. We were then unassuming merchants, trading to the East, but perhaps more firmly established than now, when the people of the country were disgusted with our ambitious encroachments. We were then satisfied with a neutrality; but the French, whose power was become more dangerous as it was more extended, were not so moderate. Dupleix, the first European governor who assumed the style of an eastern prince, invaded our rights, and roused exertions which succeeded in repelling him. In Bengal, at the same period, in consequence of a similar aggression, we had made a like exertion to vindicate ourselves, and by that exertion had acquired power. The French had acquired some power in Coromandel, and the five northern circars, of which we afterwards obtained a grant from the Mogul. By this grant our title was superior to theirs. They had, by subsequent treaties, formally renounced their claim; but, by the present treaty, that renunciation was done away, and a door opened for future contention. He now came to Bengal. The French King had consented to keep no troops, and to erect no fortifications on that coast; there was now nothing to hinder the French from doing so. There was no natural reason why they should not fortify themselves, and endeavour to render their establishments as secure as possible. It was true, the sovereign of the country might object if these fortifications were carried to any improper length—(A cry of Hear! hear! from the ministerial bench);—but would the attempt to fortify be deemed a sufficient cause for war? There was no prohibition from fortifying in the present treaty. By former treat-

ties the French had acknowledged Mohammed Ali as sovereign of the Carnatic, and consequently had subscribed to our authority; possibly even from that family some persons might now be found whose title could be set up in opposition to ours. The stipulation in 1763, that no fortifications should be erected on the coast of Bengal, was so scrupulously adhered to in the negotiation of 1783, that when a stipulation was made for a ditch to carry off the water from the fort of Chandernagore, a jealousy arose; and it was not without a critical explanation, and a full security that nothing further would be attempted, that permission was given: and the delay arising from the arrangement of this matter was the excuse stated by the Secretary of State for not bringing the definitive treaty to a more speedy conclusion. The jurisdiction of the factories may, on the ground of application for the surrender of persons taking refuge in them, again produce contention. The convention of 1787 granted a general exemption to all factories, and a general jurisdiction over all persons within certain limits. The omission of any regulation to this effect in the present treaty, might renew the ancient jealousies. Independent of this, there were many claims and pretensions arising out of the trade itself. The French, even when they were admitted to trade under our protection, refused to allow us to regulate their trade, and insisted on carrying it on in their own way; so that no advantage could be derived from it to the revenue of the Company, which, when its collection was attempted to be enforced, they often resisted with force. A perpetual correspondence was carried on, on the subject of these aggressions; so copious, and filled with facts so numerous, that a whole session would not be fit for the detail. The first objection to the treaty was in 1765, when Chandernagore was given up. Mr. Law objected against the strict enforcement of the treaty, and required permission to make lodgments for the protection of those engaged in the trade, which, together with his other demands, was made the subject of a letter from Lord Clive. The complaints of foreigners would grow louder, unless the Company entered into an agreement to supply them with cargoes to a certain amount, out of the private trade of its servants. When Mr. Francis proposed to add a paragraph to the dispatches, saying that the Nabob of Arcot was a legal sovereign, Mr. Hastings was unwilling to do so. The Dutch and Danes applied to this country as the sovereign power, and, under the name of a protection, were granted an indulgence; but they soon refused to submit to the payment of the duties, and we were compelled to exact them by force; and so far did their contumacy extend, that in time of scarcity they exported corn, which they knew their colours would protect, though a general embargo was laid. Nor could it be said that the knowledge of the embarrassment of this country, in consequence of the American war, was the cause of this spirit of resistance; for it manifested itself in 1775, when the disturbances in America had only commenced, and the knowledge of them could not yet have reached India. By the treaty of 1783, his Britannic Majesty is to take such means as are in his power (not even then avowing the direct sovereignty) to procure certain facilities for the French trade: but two years had not elapsed when disputes arose which soon came to a question of force, and ended in the firing of a vessel; a transaction which Sir John Macpherson thought necessary to make the subject of a particular negotiation. Dr. Laurence then adverted to the treaty of 1787, which caused a board of justice to be holden, and in which the French brought forward their claims to the trade in India, particularly in the articles of salt, saltpetre, and opium, and which claims were only settled by a convention entered into with the Government of this country, in which they were allowed to traffic with our East India Company on certain stipulations and fixed prices, in which it had been contended that our East India Company sustained a loss, but which he asserted was only a moderated gain. He then begged to call the attention of the House to the Dutch claims. By the definitive treaty in 1784, their carrying trade was allowed, even to that of naval stores, and the freedom of navigation in the Indian seas. At all times the Dutch were jealous of our obtaining any settlement between our possessions in India and China, which might enable us to send the commodities of Bengal to that vast empire, instead of carrying on our trade with it through the medium of dollars and bullion from England. They were then jealous, he said, even in those periods when they were in alliance and connexion with us: by the alliance formed between France and Holland in 1795, they had become alienated from this country, and might now bring forward claims which before they would not have thought of. They had now become closely connected with that nation, which did not like any other logic than the ultima ratio regum, which was called the last reason of kings, but was now become the first of the republic; and if these claims should be advanced, we should have not only France to contend with, but Holland also, with a recruited navy. He then adverted to the Cape of Good Hope, which he stated to be of essential consequence to this country, both in time of peace and war. It might be urged, he said, in defence of the non-revival of former treaties, that we did not give up our rights, but were prepared to defend them to the utmost. But, though they had not been revived generally, it was surely worth while to revive specifically that part which protected our commerce in the East Indies. "Thus," said he, "I have stated what was stipulated in our favour by former treaties, and is now relinquished, without giving my opinion whether the concession was voluntary, or extorted by force. It is not, however, in India, but here, that these affairs must be settled either by negotiation or force. We must now say, that in proportion to the magnitude of the concessions we have made, we are prepared to defend what remains to the last." He concluded by moving, "That there be laid before this House an account of the acquisitions made, or pretended to be made, by his Most Christian Majesty on the coast of Coromandel and Orissa, between the years 1748 and 1763."

MR. DUNDAS said, that, whether our situation was to be decided by negotiation or by the sword, in India or elsewhere, as the Learned Gentleman had stated, he would dare say, that there was no difference of opinion between them upon this point, namely, that it was essential to the interests of this country, wherever our claims were to be supported, and where our rights were clear and indisputable, not to do any thing ourselves to bring these rights into doubt. He stated it as a general maxim, on which he apprehended there was no difference of opinion in that House or elsewhere; and yet, notwithstanding no doubt was entertained of the truth of this general maxim, he was afraid that, if motions like these were persevered in, much difference of opinion would arise upon the application of that principle; his proposition was such as he held to be clear as the sun at noon-day, namely, that no doubt could be entertained on the relative situation of this country and of France in India. No doubt had been expressed upon that subject till lately in that House, nor would any doubt be entertained elsewhere, but by bringing forward speculations of our own in that House, and making that doubtful in debate which was long acknowledged to be clear in principle. He then entered into an historical detail of the rise and progress of the British power in India, the contests which had taken place from the earliest periods, and the share taken therein by the French, in order to oppose our progress in India, down to the period in which Lord Clive had so distinguished himself; to whom, for his valour as a soldier, and wisdom as a statesman, he paid the highest compliments; the result of whose measures he stated to have consummated the British power in India, and settled our sovereignty there by right of conquest, which right he reconciled to the inhabitants by the wise respect he paid to their prejudices. Having gone through a history of these events, and having given a compendious account of the progress of the Mogul empire, and of its revolutions for eight centuries, he proceeded to state the conclusion which he drew from all these premises; which conclusion was this, "That though we may feel it just and expedient to make such allowances to the prejudices of the inhabitants, and to make such regulations in our territories as we may please, or think advisable, yet with regard to European powers, to them we say freely and distinctly, We have gained this country by our arms, and by our arms we will keep it." For upon all the grounds which he had already stated, it was manifest that the provinces of Bengal, Bahar, Orissa, &c. had come to Great Britain by conquest, as much as any country ever came into the hands of another; and from the period when it became so under the government of Lord Clive to the present day, the French never had, directly or indirectly, from the treaty of 1763, any right whatever to interfere with the provinces of Bengal, Bahar, and Orissa, &c.; but that they were by right of conquest subject to the sovereignty of the King of Great Britain to all intents and purposes; which sovereignty was to be exercised through the medium of the India Company, and through the different organs established for the preservation of our provinces, as much as any other part of his Majesty's dominions. He need not dwell upon these points; the facts were clear and well authenticated in the history of those dominions; and therefore he laid it down as a clear and indisputable proposition, that what we had gained thus by conquest, was to be considered with reference to any other European power, as totally subject to our sovereignty, without any interference of theirs, that we were actually the sovereigns of India, and no European power had any right whatever to dispute our title to this power, which we possess de facto. Such was the state of the British power in India; the situation of France was extremely different, without one inch of territory, except what they might claim by the definitive treaty under consideration. He would beg the House to pause for a moment, and then ask itself this question, Was there a man within hearing of his voice who had any doubt whatever as to these facts at this moment? Certainly none.—Was there any one man within hearing of his voice who thought, that if these facts, and the right arising out of them, were to be called in question, this country would not go the length of risking its last stake to support those rights, and refuse giving up one iota of them? He had no reason to be satisfied in any point of curiosity, by asking why it was expedient in the present moment to avoid references to ancient treaties in the present definitive treaty of peace. It was a subject upon which he did not think it necessary to dwell at present; it was sufficient for him to say, that there was no diminution thereby of our power in India, no foundation whatever for any other to dispute our sovereignty there, nor any thing which entitled others to contest with us the rights upon which that sovereignty was founded. Nor was that all: he would go farther, and say, he mistook greatly if any doubt was now entertained, that, with regard to Great Britain, her sovereignty in India stood at that moment upon a better footing than if the former treaties had been renewed by it. By the treaty of 1783, which was unquestionably the very worst treaty this country ever entered into on the subject of Indian affairs, it was the business of his Majesty's government, and a very laborious one it was, in the convention of 1787, to do away the evil created by the treaty of 1783. By that of 1783, our sovereignty in India was rendered disputable; by the convention of 1787, our sovereignty was re-established. Having expatiated at considerable length upon the merits of the convention of 1787, and the demerits of the treaty of 1783, he proceeded to say, that, had the treaty now upon the table renewed any former treaty, it would have been impossible to refer to the convention of 1787, without also renewing the contests which were brought forward in 1783. It would have been impossible to have introduced the one, without also calling for an explanation of the other; and therefore the affairs of that country were much better, considering all the circumstances of the relative situation of this country and of France, in suffering all treaties whatever to be passed over in silence. We might, perhaps, by renewing some of the declarations and admissions of our sovereignty in India, as settled by the convention of 1787, have employed some antidote against the evil of which we had too much reason to complain; but it was manifest to him that we could not have such antidote without having also a certain portion of the poison, by the renewal of any discussion whatever upon the subject of treaties; and therefore he had no difficulty whatever in saying, that upon a review of the whole condition of our affairs, considered with relation to those of France, we were infinitely better in passing the subject over in silence, than we should have been in endeavouring to renew any of them. He confessed, he said, that when the rumour reached him, that the provisions of the convention of 1787 were left out of the present treaty, he shrunk under an apprehension that our power in India would be destroyed; and he was the more alarmed when he heard it said, that this was brought about in consequence of the views of France to undermine, and finally to overturn, our sovereignty in India. This led him to turn the subject very seriously in his mind, and to look at all the ancient documents, to consider the whole matter deliberately; and the result was, that it was infinitely better for us to have no reference whatever to any treaty; as he had already stated. But the Learned Gentleman asked, if the House could really think that we could be secure in India against the ambitious claims of France, as they had appeared in 1783, and which were done away in 1787? Did he really think we were safe now, without having renewed, by the present treaty, the provisions of the convention of 1787? This he would answer, by putting to the Learned Gentleman this question: Did he really think, that if the

French should be disposed to renew the pretensions of 1783, or any other period, they would be prevented from so doing by a few scraps of paper being laid on the table of that House, a species of artillery that would not be equal to the operation of a single field-piece for half a minute? But the Learned Gentleman would say, that the treaty of 1783 would establish the disposition of the French at that time to dispute our sovereignty in India; it would, indeed, establish that which there was no need of establishing, because the thing was well known. The French did on that occasion, as they would do on every other occasion, provided they thought they could succeed in the attempt namely, endeavour to diminish the greatness of this country, and enlarge their own; but, in proportion as they were disposed to be hostile to our interest, or querulous while we enjoyed our advantages, he had no difficulty in saying, it was the wisdom of this country, in the same proportion, to wait until those claims were made which Gentlemen spoke of with so much apprehension, and in the mean time to stand upon our right, our paramount right of sovereignty. What course the French would take to enlarge their commercial interest in India, was not for us to anticipate. It was enough for us, that if they endeavoured to do so by the exertions of individuals, or otherwise, they could never do so without being liable to be interrupted by this country. If they were to try to erect commercial factories, or to do any thing that interfered with our sovereignty in India, we should be fully warranted, and, what was better, we were in possession of means, to resist such an attempt. But those means would not be increased by a few papers being laid before the House: such documents would not help us to any arguments which we had not already, for the propriety of resisting such attempts; thank God we had never wanted arguments to resist the encroachments of the French on our sovereign power in India, nor had we wanted strength for that purpose. From all this it was perfectly clear, that before the French could exercise any trade in India, they must come to us in the character of suppliants; for nothing that they had yet obtained would enable them to carry on trade in India without our leave. He had stated the difference between the treaty of 1783 and the convention of 1787, already. He had to observe, that we were not now in a situation similar to that in which we stood in 1787. There was now no treaty in existence between us and France, nor any regulation on the subject of India, except the single clause in the convention now upon the table of the House. And with regard to the trade of France in India, if any they were to have, they could have it only through the indulgence of the British power in India; and therefore he said again, we were better off as the case stood upon the present treaty of peace, than if we had renewed any of the former treaties. Whatever matter of complaint was to be urged, or rather of lamentation, upon this subject, it could only be, that his Majesty's government did not settle the whole of the provisions of all former treaties, by taking notice of them all, and finally adjusting them all. This, however in the abstract it might appear desirable, ought not to have been attempted in the present case, because it would have been impossible to accomplish it, without protracting the negotiation to a length that would have been inconsistent with the interests of the states of Europe. The articles in all these treaties must have been all gone over, if any of them were noticed; in the course of which a thousand explanations would become necessary, and which might have made the negotiation in many respects appear to some, idle and ridiculous. But there were other considerations which, he hoped, would operate on the conduct of those who may have the future direction of the affairs of India; and they related to other powers, as well as to the French and ourselves in India; we were not to consider merely our own concerns and those of France in India. He stated it as a solid ground of consideration for the East India Company, to regulate, not only the trade of the French, but to look to the regulation of other subjects, to have an eye upon other commercial connexions. But it might be said, Why not stipulate these things in negotiation, and finally determine them by treaty? To which he would answer, It is much better as it is, for at present we have the sovereignty of India; and he would ask, if it appeared to any Member of that House to be a wise course to exclude the Government of this country from all discretionary power to regulate the trade of India? If the French, or any other power, should claim the right of carrying their goods up the Ganges, or to do any other act, was it not sufficient that we had the power to prevent them? The French trade in India, the Dutch trade in India, and the trade of other powers in India, might go hand in hand, so that it was not detrimental to us; but if detrimental to us, we had the power to stop it, and that was enough for our present purpose at least. He wanted this subject to be considered upon a large and comprehensive scale, and not confined merely to ourselves and France. He did not mean to pretend, or to insinuate, that he was in possession of the reasons which actuated his Majesty's servants upon this occasion, when they came to the conclusion which was now before the public; but he felt himself entitled to state, that if they had done that which some Gentlemen blamed them for not doing, they would have put it out of their own power to do their country much service, which they will now be enabled to render by consulting those who are best qualified to advise them, and that more especially on the affairs of India. But when he heard it said that France was hostile in its disposition towards the trade of this country, and was endeavouring to prevail on Holland, Spain, and other countries to do all they could to discourage our trade, and to prohibit some of it in their dominions, he would ask, Are they so? And if they be, is this the precise period in which you would make them a voluntary gift of commerce in India, when you are doubtful in what relation they choose to stand with you in regard to other commercial connexions? "I own," said he, "this is a subject on which I feel deeply; I have it much at heart; and when I say that, I am sure there is not one man in this House who would feel more sorrow than I should, if I conceived it possible for you to surrender any one of the rights of which I have been speaking. At the same time that I feel these reasons I have been stating, I desire not to be misrepresented; I am one of the last men in the world (my conduct, I think, proves it) who would wish to plead for the system of this country narrowing the trade of foreigners in India: ever since I thought I understood any thing of the affairs of India, my maxim has been to enlarge that trade; and that we might as well attempt to prohibit any foreigners from buying our manufactures of Yorkshire or of Birmingham, or any other manufacture of this country, as prohibit foreigners from trading with our territories in India. But I should guard against misconception of this opinion of mine. When I say we should not prevent the French, or any other nation, from trading with our territorial provinces in India, I mean to say, that I am not afraid of them as merchants; I am not unwilling to give them a boon as merchants, with a chance of reciprocity, and I ask no more; but I think I am not going too far, when I desire this country to guard against that which I know the French have endeavoured to make, and will endeavour to make, if they see any probability of its success; I mean an encroachment on your sovereignty in India. This they have done; and if an opportunity offers, this they will do under the pretence of pursuing trade. They will ask you civilly, for in no other way can they ask it, to allow them to do a number of things for the purpose of carrying on trade, when their object will be to encroach upon your sovereignty. It was in this way that they formerly endeavoured to encroach upon your sovereignty in 1787, when they told us they could not recover their debts without a certain enlargement of power in India: we resisted that directly; and I hope this will be the conduct of this country in future. The very first article insisted upon by Lord Auckland in 1787 was, that nothing in the most distant degree touching our sovereignty in India would, on any terms or conditions whatever, be assented to on the part of this country. I hope it is not presumptuous in me to say, that I trust his Majesty's Government will adopt the same principle, and stand upon the same ground as we did then; and if we do so,

I will venture to say there will be no danger: depart from that principle, and your sovereignty will be first undermined, then attacked, and, perhaps, finally overthrown. As to what may be attempted by France, even with all your caution, I cannot say you will have no difficulty, for I am not going to be guarantee for the moderation of the French; but what I contend for is, that you have now better means than you would have had by the renewal of any treaty; better means than you ever had, of preventing encroachment upon your sovereignty in India. But we have not before us any proof, nor is it insinuated, that the French nation themselves are bringing forward any such claim as we hear stated on their behalf: will it not be time enough, when they do bring forward those claims, for Government to resist them? But surely when we agree that their claims are dangerous, and cannot be admitted, it is singular to pursue this as a subject of declamation in the Houses of Parliament. I say, this ought not to be done; for we all know, that what passes in this House, or in the other House of Parliament, transpires to the people of this country; and I cannot concur with those who wish to make the people of this country think the peace a bad one. I am certainly one of those who cannot give an approbation of all the articles of peace; but is it doing good to this country to keep this question up, and to endeavour to make the people dislike it? Gentlemen complain of the pride and arrogance of France: Is this the way to make her less proud or arrogant? certainly not; and therefore I cannot see the wisdom of stating these claims, which we all know and feel cannot be admitted, and which nobody asserts to have been made. I have stated what appeared to me to be the true substantial rights and interests of this country on the subject of Indian affairs; upon these rights and principles I desire to stand, and I have stated what course I think this country ought to pursue to preserve those rights entire. I am aware that by so stating them, and by so recommending the course to be pursued, I impose on the shoulders of his Majesty's Government an awful and tremendous responsibility; for if you depart an iota from your sovereignty in India, and allow others to encroach on you, or any way to diminish the force of that paramount sovereignty, you will lay the foundation of the overthrow of your power in India. If, being possessed of that mighty empire, and of the means to assert and vindicate your right, you allow others to injure it by any act of executive government, I shall not receive any apology for the Ministers who shall suffer that to be done, under any pretence that the French had claimed these things before, or under any other pretence whatsoever, because you are now more than ever possessed of means to prevent it. I apprehend the Learned Gentleman who brought this subject forward is of the same opinion; and I hope he will concur with me in saying, that Ministers, if they allow our sovereignty in India to be touched, will be without an apology, and that therefore he will now be so good AS TO PUT HIS MOTION IN HIS POCKET. It is my solemn conviction, that if we were now to give way to these hypothetical cases which are stated, and entertain these motions, instead of strengthening, we should weaken the rights of the British empire."

MR. T. GRENVILLE said, there must have been a broad line of misconception between the view of the subject taken by the Right Hon. Gentleman (Mr. Dundas) and his, before the Right Hon. Gentleman could have stated it in the manner he had done. The Right Hon. Gentleman had stated doubts as to the propriety of this motion, because, whether our claims were to be decided by negotiation or by the sword, "surely," said the Right Hon. Gentleman, "it was not wise to bring forward doubts relative to our own claims, which were perfectly clear." He agreed with the Right Hon. Gentleman in this point; but how did the argument apply to France? The Right Hon. Gentleman had asserted, that this country possessed a clear right of sovereignty in the East Indies; but having stated this, what did the latter part of his speech refer to? that the claim which England has asserted, has been and is disputed; how, therefore, did the argument of the Right Hon. Gentleman apply? He did not state doubts, but said, that at all periods France had disputed our claims in India. Of what consequence to the question were the victories and conquests of Lord Clive, or the sovereignty we obtained in India? That sovereignty, as well as whatever rights we claimed, were still disputed by France. He did not mean to say that this country and France were in a continual state of war; but the latter never abandoned her claims, and this state of things produced the convention of 1787, which was a compromise of claims. His Right Hon. Friend (Mr. Dundas) had stated, that the non-renewal of the treaty of 1783, and the convention of 1787, was more advantageous to this country than the renewal of them would have been: this was the first time, he believed, that his Right Hon. Friend had sat in judgment on the treaty of 1783. He desired to know, however, whether in many situations it was not more advisable to possess a limited right by convention, than to rest upon a general, but unacknowledged right; because, by obtaining a limited right by convention, we obtained at the same time a recognition of the original right. His Right Hon. Friend had asked, What advantage was to be derived from laying a few scraps of paper on the table? This put him in mind of a question formerly asked on a subject relative to the East India Company: What was a charter? a scroll of parchment with a piece of wax at the end of it. This mode of argument, however, could not do away that consideration to which important documents were entitled. The object of his Hon. Friend (Dr. Laurence) was to shew what France might claim against this country. With respect to the navigation of the eastern seas, his Right Hon. Friend (Mr. Dundas) had treated this subject with considerable levity: he could not consider it as a matter which ought to be treated with levity. It was not the claims of the Dutch republic, as settled by treaty, that formed the object of consideration; but his Hon. Friend (Dr. Laurence) had stated the dangers which might result from the claims of the Dutch republic in its present state of servitude, when it could only be considered as a member of the French republic, and as identified with France. He expected that some objection would have been made to the production of the papers moved for by his Hon. Friend; but, instead of this, he could hear nothing but a laugh against it, and an advice to his Hon. Friend to put the motion into his pocket. To such a sweeping kind of argument it was scarcely possible to give any answer. The House would recollect, that no doubt was thrown upon the claims upon this country: he admitted that they were clear; but were they clear and undisputed? This was the point. The Right Hon. Gentleman had spoken as to the prudence of stating the claims which France might make relative to our possessions in the East Indies: but as to the cession of the Cape and Cochin, his Right Hon. Friend had not said a single word. Was it a light matter that the Cape and Cochin should be put into the hands of France, before we knew the disposition of the enemy with respect to India, and that France should assert her claims with the Cape and Cochin in her possession? If this was thought a matter fit to be discussed, now was the moment for discussion. These observations were not made for the purpose of querulously objecting to the treaty of peace; no such thing: he wished to call the attention of the House to the danger hanging over the country; how was it to be relieved, and by what suggestion of human prudence? Was it wished to ask the enemy, if he agreed to our right of sovereignty in India? and would they give him the Cape and Cochin to know whether he agreed to it or not? and if he did not, were they in as good a situation as before? When all former obligations were done away, was it not necessary to resort to new conventions? None were now offered in the place of those abrogated; and did the House feel secure in this situation? Was it not necessary to know the intentions of France with respect to India? It was not likely that twelve months would pass before either France would make claims in that country, which we could not agree to, or this country would exercise rights there which France would resist: was it then prudent in this country, before she knew the disposition of France with respect to this subject, to give out of her hands the Cape and Cochin? No argument whatever had been adduced against the motion, which he should certainly support.

LORD HAWKESBURY.—“I am glad to hear the Hon. Gentleman say, that neither he, or, in his opinion, any man in this House, or the country, entertains any doubt of our right of sovereignty in the East Indies. He says, however, that the French entertain doubts, and therefore there should be an explanation. Now, in the present state of things, I contend there is no ground to suppose that the French do entertain any doubt upon the subject. The doubts of France were built upon the ancient firmans, and the treaty of 1783. Now, if these firmans and the treaty of 1783 be at an end, what ground is there to suppose that France does not recognise our right of sovereignty? All the Asiatic and European powers have acknowledged that right. In all negotiations, even in those with France, England has been styled The Government of India. I admit that you came into that sovereignty subject to the engagements which were binding upon the powers you succeeded. These firmans might therefore be considered in force after the commencement of our sovereignty. It will not, however, be contended, that they grant more than indulgences; and I admit that there were disputes about which of them were to be considered good, and which bad. I admit also, that, as they were binding upon our predecessor the Mogul, so they were binding upon us. But the subsequent war destroys them, as it would any other treaties; and the peace of 1783, which acknowledges our sovereignty, does not renew them. Against this, it is said that France renewed these claims between 1783 and 1787: but upon what ground did she do so? why, upon the 13th article of the treaty of 1783. France says, By that article you undertook to restore my ancient trade; and, of course, she brought forward these ancient firmans, to shew what that trade was. Now this is put an end to by the treaty of 1787; for what does it say? Not that doubts are entertained of our sovereignty, but that its object is to explain the 13th article of the peace of 1783. Now if this statement be correct, it follows, that the claims of France might have been formerly well founded under the treaty of 1783; but that the treaty of 1783 and the ancient firmans being now at an end, our right of sovereignty is clear. Now, Sir, with respect to the non-renewal of the convention of 1787, the 13th article of the treaty of 1783 was loose, and therefore the convention was wisely intended to meet the difficulties arising from that article of 1783 at that time; but still the convention of 1787 left many points undecided that might be brought forward, and therefore it was proper to preclude that consequence. The convention of 1787 recites the doubtful article of the peace of 1783; therefore, by renewing it, you would renew the article of 1782. Now if we are recognised as sovereigns of India, if France as to it has no other claim than any other country in Europe, how can our right be rendered more clear? It is objected, that we have no security that a claim will not be brought forward. I have shewn that it cannot be brought forward upon good grounds. That France may not do so, I cannot say; but I do say, that if there be any point which France is not likely to dispute, it would be this (before the present discussion). This I say from what passed in the course of the negotiation, in which, however conducted, a man may be able to see the points which the party is likely to consider most important. As to my reason for refusing the papers, to some of them I have objections; others of them are, I admit, such as have been granted; but after the manner in which the question is started, I think we should stop here, and negative them all."

Dr. LAURENCE observed, that, from the manner in which his first motion had been treated, it would, perhaps, be thought proper that he should put the others in his pocket, as he had been advised to do by a Right Honourable Gentleman. Motives of public duty, however, as well as of private friendship, induced him to submit them to the House. Their object was to shew, that the convention of 1787 was in itself a beneficial arrangement to the East India Company, independent of its putting an end to all claims of sovereignty on the part of the French. He then made a series of motions for the following papers, which met the same fate—"An Account of the Customs of Bengal, distinguishing each year, since the acquisition of the Duwanni—The Price of Salt, as fixed by the Governor-general at Calcutta, in the year 1768—An Account of the Revenue on Salt, from the acquisition of the Duwanni to the present time—The quantity of Saltpetre and Opium sold to and by the Company's Agents during the same time—All Paragraphs in Dispatches from Bengal, touching the claims of the French, from 1765 to 1787—A Copy of the Governor-general's Minute at the Secret Consultation, on the 31st July 1775—A Statement of the Claims of the Dutch to the Navigation of the Indian Seas, previous to the year 1784—And a Copy of the Treaty of Alliance entered into between the French and Batavian Republics in the year 1795."

HOUSE OF LORDS, MAY 13TH, 1802.

The order of the day, for taking into consideration the definitive treaty, being read,

LORD GRENVILLE said, he should offer no apology for having exerted his endeavours that their Lordships might acquire previous information upon the different points to which the definitive treaty referred. The necessity and propriety of his conduct was so firmly impressed on his mind, that he was surprised at any insinuation of irregularity. The fact was, that himself and his Noble Friends had put the House in possession of arguments against the treaty, while those whose duty it was to have stated their reasons in its favour had not thought proper to defend it. The unfairness and irregularity, if any, was on the side of those who had reserved the detail of their arguments to a general debate, in which it was impossible to come to an issue on the various points connected with the subject. He was far from wishing to impute unfairness to any of their Lordships. They had considered that discussion should not precede decision: he had thought that the most favourable thing he could do with regard to the House was to court repeated discussion previous to decision. In this situation the question was now submitted, and he rose to offer such a motion as resulted from the sentiments that he entertained. In doing this, the first argument with which he had to contend was one which had equally been resorted to in and out of the House. It was asked, What was the use of discussion now, when peace was concluded? Was it wished to overthrow the treaty? If not, what benefit could arise from debating upon the subject of it? He should be sorry to bring forward any motion, if he had it not in his power to meet such an argument as that was. Whatever disadvantages might arise to the country from this unfortunate treaty, he would be one of the first to say, it was concluded by the power which had the right, by the constitution of the country, to conclude it; and therefore, whatever were its terms, Parliament was bound to accede to it. It was ratified by his Majesty, and the great seal of the kingdom affixed to it; consequently it was irrevocable; and not to carry it into effect would be to add disaster to disaster, dishonour to the loss occasioned by the treaty, and to impeach the national integrity. The first proposition he should make to the House was, to declare to his Majesty their opinion, that the public faith was pledged to the observance of the peace; that it was an obligation binding upon the country to maintain it inviolate. After such a declaration, what objection could possibly be urged against the discussion of the terms of the treaty? What inconvenience could result from pointing out to the country the injurious effects likely to proceed from them? why was he not to be allowed to urge the House to fix a mark upon those impolitic and weak Ministers who had negotiated such a treaty, and whose counsels had concluded it? It was not his wish to interrupt the treaty, now that it was made; but only to lay before the House the dangerous tendency of its provisions, that future Ministers might be warned against advising a measure so disadvantageous to the country. The object of what he should state to their Lordships was prospective; it was to ascertain the situation in which the country stood now the peace was settled, and its terms agreed to; it was to point out the state of danger in which the country was involved by the treaty, not for the purpose of shunning the danger, but of exciting the country to adopt the real line of courage by preparing to meet it. Such was the view with which he had desired the attendance of their Lordships this day. He should propose to them to lay before his Majesty an address, expressive of their determination to preserve inviolate the treaty; but, having done so, to represent to his Majesty the state of the country, and the means of avoiding the danger which threatened it. This was what he conceived it was the duty of their Lordships, as legislators, to perform; and it should be his task to point out his reasons for doing so. For this purpose, it was necessary to advert to the arguments which had been advanced against the preliminary articles, and the events which had taken place since. He had already stated to the House his objections to the preliminary treaty: if the definitive treaty had been conformable to the preliminary articles, and the relative situation of France and Spain had not altered by intervening circumstances, however he might have been disposed to have protested against the definitive treaty, he should not have thought it necessary to have proposed to the House the adoption of any new measure; but he found that all the grounds of the pretensions on the part of France, as contained in the preliminary treaty, had not only been confirmed by the definitive treaty, but exceeded. The terms of the latter were therefore infinitely more prejudicial than the former. He could not avoid calling the attention of the House to what had been the arguments used against the preliminary articles. It had been stated, that in all negotiations for peace there were two grounds or bases necessary to be adhered to: when, after a long contest between two nations, the respective governments were considering how they might restore the blessings of peace and tranquillity, the basis on which the negotiation proceeded was, either the status ante bellum (the actual situation in which the parties stood before the war), or the situation in which they stood at the time of the negotiation, which was called the uti possidetis. Instead of the negotiators of the definitive treaty proceeding distinctly upon one of these grounds, they had applied both in the most prejudicial manner possible to this country. They had referred to the status ante bellum with regard to England, by giving up all she had taken during the war to France; and they had adopted the uti possidetis as to France, by leaving her in possession of all that she had acquired. It was obvious, that at the commencement of negotiation each country was in possession of some advantage which operated to the disadvantage of the other. It was to our disadvantage that France possessed so much power on the continent, and it was to the disadvantage of France that we, by the superior skill and valour of our navy, were possessed of the colonies of France and Spain. The arrangement to have been desired was, that we should have diminished the power of France upon the continent, in proportion to our sacrifices with respect to the colonies that we had taken. If France could not have been persuaded to that, then it was our duty to have extended our maritime power, for the purposes of compelling her. As far as appeared by the treaty, Ministers had made no attempt whatever to reduce the power of France on the continent, but had, by concessions abroad, given her the means of weakening our colonial strength. This was not acting upon the principle adopted by Lord Chatham at the peace of 1763. That enlightened statesman had always considered that every preliminary treaty should be as definitive as possible. If the preliminary articles of 1763 were compared with the definitive, it would appear that there was scarcely any difference between them; while the direct contrary was the case with regard to the present treaty. By the incapacity of the negotiators, they had left themselves to treat with France during the pendency of a naval armistice. The question before that armistice was, whether this country would suffer the fleets of France, which were blockaded in the mouths of their harbours, to stir out. But what did occur immediately after the preliminary treaty? In direct opposition to our entreaties and threats, France sent an armament to the West Indies, and imposed on this country the necessity of also sending to the West Indies a naval force more than double of any that we had sent during the war. Thus the first fruits of the peace was the necessity of keeping an armament of thirty-five sail of the line in the West Indies. He would not enter into the pretence, on the part of France, for sending the expedition which she did send; nor would he discuss the question, whether it would or would not be better for this country if St. Domingo was under the dominion of France. He should only observe, that the more urgent and pressing were the wishes of Buonaparté to send that armament, in proportion ought it to have been the policy of the negotiators, on the part of this country, to have insisted that the French fleet should not have sailed till the preliminary articles were converted into a definitive treaty, and until he had afforded a conviction that he had no intention of obtaining such a cession as he had since obtained in Italy. Something had been said of the time and temper in which the peace had been made on the part of France, and that it afforded a proof that the person at the head of the French government had become a harmless, inoffensive neighbour, and wished to shew how much he had been misrepresented, when it had been insinuated that there were no bounds to his ambition. He would leave it to any man to say, whether, if peace depended upon the disposition of the republic, we should enjoy it even for the length of time the present debate would occupy. It was evident the definitive treaty contained concessions infinitely more important than the preliminary articles; and it was no less true, that the conduct of the French government evinced a design to exclude the commerce of this country from the continent of Europe. With respect to the situation in which Portugal had been placed by the definitive treaty, the House had been merely told that it was a pity it should be so; and with regard to the Prince of Orange, their Lordships were informed by one of the servants of the Crown, that he looked at the articles concerning that Prince with regret. The indemnity to the Prince of Orange was left in such a situation by the treaty, that it depended entirely upon France whether he should ever be indemnified or not. As to the Cape of Good Hope, not a word had been said, whether it would be advantageous to have it a free port or not. Why, after having stipulated that Malta should be independent, and that its independence should be guaranteed by one of the powers of Europe competent to its protection, was it placed under the guarantee of six powers, who never could be brought to agree upon the subject of it? How could Malta retain its independence? How was it possible that the expense of the garrison, stores, and charges of maintaining that fortress, could be provided by a power to whom no revenues were left? The Noble Lord proceeded to shew that the expense of providing for Malta amounted to 130,000*l.* while its revenues really applicable to that expenditure did not amount to more than 20 or 25,000*l.*; and the inference that he drew from his statement was, that the election of the grand master must depend upon France, and that in all probability the whole island would shortly fall under the power of France. He next adverted to an advantage given to the French with respect to the mutual cession of the colonies. It was stipulated that the French inhabitants of Ceylon and Trinidad might retire from those islands, while nothing of the kind was admitted into the treaty with regard to the colonies that we ceded to France. His Lordship contended, that by the non-renewal of the treaty of Utrecht, this country had renounced the stipulation, that France should not acquire in Spanish America any privileges with reference to commerce that were not granted to England. It was needless to urge how much more important such a stipulation would have been at the present moment, than at the period of the treaty of Utrecht. By the treaty of 1783, we had ceded Goree and Senegal; but at the same time the cession was under a stipulation for the liberty of carrying on the gum trade; but now the cession had been confirmed without the renewal of the stipulation. That it was the intention of France to make war against our commerce, was evident from the circumstance of a decree having been issued by the government, forbidding the right of trading on the coast of that part of Africa. He should be glad if the suggestions he had stated could be repelled. If their Lordships could be satisfied that the definitive treaty would not prejudice the rights of this country, then, if he could not approve of it, he should be ready to admit that, the preliminary articles having been approved by Parliament, it was bound to sanction the definitive treaty. It had been acknowledged, that the possession of Italy by France would justify a recurrence to a state of war: this was not his own argument, but the admission of the Secretary of State. He now entreated the attention of the House to the situation in which the country stood at the time of the commencement of the negotiation. It was in a state of war, but under circumstances calculated as much as possible to alleviate its inconveniences. We had acquired the possession of colonies to an immense extent, which were valuable, not only from their military situation, but by affording the means of carrying on the war itself; the produce of the West Indies had been 2,000,000*l.* annually, from which a very considerable revenue had arisen: this resource was lost. We had by our naval power obtained such a preference, that the fleets of France could not stir; now they had been suffered to proceed to the West Indies, and we were compelled to send an expensive armament to watch them. We were also in possession of resources sufficient to have enabled us to have carried on the war till we had obtained just, adequate, and reasonable conditions of peace. Had we availed ourselves of them? No; we had left to France the whole preponderating power of the continent, and had confirmed her in the possession of Italy. We had also added to France possessions of considerable importance in India, but had omitted to stipulate that they should not be fortified. We had given up to Holland the town and port of Cochin; a situation which the French would avail themselves of for the purpose of intrigue, one in which we should have most to apprehend from the attempts of France, and be least able to counteract them. His Lordship maintained, that it was necessary for the safety of our Indian possessions, that this country should have retained the sovereignty of the Cape. In order to be able to bring home our commercial fleets from India, or to send out troops, it would be always necessary to send a convoy, and then we should be insecure. In time of war, how was a single regiment to be sent? It was true that troops might be sent directly from Great Britain to India, without touching at the Brazils or the Cape; but in such case they would not be fit for service for many months after they had landed. But the advantage we possessed in the sovereignty of the Cape was this: when the war broke out in the

Mysore with Tippoo Sultaun, we sent a corvette to the Cape, whence a force of fresh troops was dispatched fit for immediate service, landed, marched up the country, and were present at the siege of Seringapatam. It was not, he believed, too much to say, that, by ceding the Cape to Holland, we had in point of fact ceded it to the power of France. In the West Indies we had restored to France Martinique and Tobago, and had facilitated the means of recovering St. Domingo. She was besides in possession of Louisiana, and the fruitful country of Florida; for it was a circumstance too plain to admit of a doubt, that Spain never could keep Florida while France had possession of Louisiana. In addition to these advantages, she had the means of entering Mexico at any time. Such was the comparative situation of France and England, in the East and West Indies, and America. How did we stand with respect to the Mediterranean, the next seat of our naval interest? Our naval superiority in the Mediterranean was most important; but his Majesty's Ministers had placed the country in such a situation, that he defied any one to tell him how a single ship could be sent to the Mediterranean. By this policy they had dispossessed the country of Majorca, Minorca, and even the island of Elba, which could only be useful to France for the purpose of excluding us from Leghorn. We were thus destitute of the means of maintaining any fleet in the Mediterranean. His Majesty's Ministers had put it out of the power of the King of Sardinia to open his ports to an English fleet. It was owing to the assistance afforded by the King of Naples and Sicily, that Lord Nelson had been able to refit that fleet which had effected the overthrow of the French armament at Aboukir, and disappointed the gigantic ambition of France. What was the return the English government made to him for his assistance? it had procured a stipulation that France should evacuate his dominions, but had not provided that she should not return whenever she thought proper. The inevitable consequence of such policy would be, that France would obtain the possession of Naples, and in the end we should find ourselves excluded by France from the whole commerce of the Levant. Every object of importance obtained by the valour of our navy had been surrendered by the counsels of those Ministers who had made them pass into the hands of France. Now to address their Lordships on the subject of the defence made to these various charges: the defence rested on the ground of an imperious necessity for peace. In this defence, the Noble Lord who had advanced it was at least consistent, because he had uniformly maintained that the country was not in a condition to strain every resource to carry on the war; but his Majesty's Ministers denied the existence of any such necessity. If it was true that the country was under circumstances of imperious necessity, it was not astonishing that the definitive treaty should have been agreed to; but what security had we that France would suffer us to recover from that state of necessity to which she had reduced us? Such a plea on our part would only furnish a pretence for going on from sacrifice to sacrifice, from loss to disgrace, till at last we had nothing to contend for. It was to prevent this that he had brought forward the present motion, from which, he was persuaded, every advantage would be derived. It would have the effect of declaring to the public and to the enemy, that the country was not reduced to the necessity of making a disgraceful peace: in fact, such an argument as that founded upon necessity, could not be raised by any country that was not prepared to receive the yoke of a conqueror. The question was, whether the advantages of the peace were greater than the disadvantages of the war? If it was expedient to have made this peace, it must have been so from the consideration that some advantage was obtained by it. The advantages might possibly be said to have proceeded from the extension of our commerce; or it might be by enabling the country to adopt a system of economy; or it might arise from our having obtained some security for the continuance of peace. He should consider these points separately. With respect to our commerce, the peace must evidently have operated to the diminution of it. In support of this proposition, he referred to many observations respecting the acquisition of commercial power by France under the definitive treaty. Upon the question of economy, he contended, that in order to be able to husband our revenue, it was necessary that we should be able to protect it. With this view, he recommended Government to keep a large naval and military establishment in a constant state of discipline. With regard to any naval establishment in the Mediterranean, Ministers, by their conduct, had rendered it impossible to send a fleet there. It was with peculiar satisfaction he understood it was the intention of Government to adopt the necessary measures of having a large Channel fleet ready for actual service at forty-eight hours notice. With respect to security having been obtained for not going to war again, he could assure the House that no man wished more than himself that such might be the case. If it was not so, this country would have to commence a new war under every circumstance of disadvantage. If at the end of three campaigns we recovered what we had given up by the treaty, he should think we had made a most glorious war. Such was the situation in which the country stood; and he flattered himself that the House would concur with him in the propriety of considering how we might best resist the danger that threatened us. He feared the spirit of the country would be broken, unless its councils were directed by abler men. He had deemed it necessary to desire the House to carry a declaration to the foot of the Throne, containing a resolution that the House was ready to attend to every practicable economy calculated to enable this country to resist every future attempt on the part of the enemy; but that, in order to do so, it would be necessary to have a scale of defence sufficient to meet the danger. The Noble Lord next adverted to the question of the right of the British flag in the navigation of the eastern seas, and the claims of France and Holland to carry on a free and independent trade. He observed, that although this country might be disposed to treat such claims as ridiculous, Holland and France might not do so. If it should be necessary to maintain a war in India for the sovereignty of the territory, he should consider such war as just and necessary; but the question was, whether France and Holland would entertain the same opinion? Perhaps the very ship that carried out the orders to give up the factories to the French, might bring back an account of actual hostilities. He deprecated the consequences of a war in India, particularly at a time when the East India Directors had stated that the Company was too poor to instruct their own servants in the rudiments of their business. His Lordship again adverted to the impolicy of suffering the treaties to expire, recapitulated his arguments, and expressed his intention of introducing into the address a hope that no time might be lost in settling by amicable adjustment those points which had not been arranged by the definitive treaty. He concluded by moving the address, which will be found in vol. i. p. 572.

The Duke of Norfolk differed very much from the Noble Lord who had preceded him. He approved highly of that exercise of the royal authority by which the late Ministers were dismissed from power. They involved this country in all the calamities which she had for years experienced, and therefore deserved all the disgrace which had been inflicted on them. With regard to the peace, he gave it his hearty approbation, as likely to produce all the blessings which could be expected from such a happy event. It did not meet with his concurrence because he thought it unexceptionable, but because he believed that any peace would be much more useful to mankind than the continuance of such a war. Our fleets and armies had certainly by their glorious achievements raised the national character, great and glorious as it was in history, far beyond what the warmest patriot could have expected. But, with all that splendour of achievement, he preferred peace, as more conducive to the true interest and happiness of mankind. The Noble Peer who had made the motion now before their Lordships, indicated sentiments of umbrage, if not of hostility, to the nation with whom we had lately concluded peace. Whatever his Lordship's sentiments were, he, for one, wished it to be understood, that for the preservation of that peace which we had so lately accomplished, we ought to cultivate every mode of conciliation and friendship. The ideas, however, which had now been suggested, were indicative of the determination of the Ex-Ministers, should they ever return to power. Instead of confirming this peace with the drawn sword against the enemy, he begged pardon, he meant the nation with whom we were lately at war, we ought to use every effort to remove all doubt on their part as to our sincerity. The peace had now been concluded, the national faith plighted, and he hoped never to witness a violation of the treaty, however disadvantageous it might be considered by many Noble Peers, whose opinions were opposite to those of the present Administration. He was no friend to the measures of those in power, but he was a sincere friend to peace. To remove all jealousy and fear on the part of France, he would therefore earnestly recommend some motion in approbation of the peace. The Noble Duke, by way of amendment to the address, moved to leave out all after the first two paragraphs, which went to acquaint his Majesty of their having taken the definitive treaty into consideration, and their resolution to aid him in carrying it into effect.

LORD PELHAM endeavoured to remove the objections which had been advanced by Lord Grenville, who had, he said, in a very elaborate speech, attempted to excite sentiments adverse, not only to the present peace, but apparently to every kind of peace whatever. The preliminaries were not, in his opinion, so very different from the definitive treaty. The spirit, if not the letter, was preserved; and, as our national faith was pledged, he conceived that no man who was hostile to peace could be friendly to the interests of the country. In the very wide range which his Lordship had taken of this important subject, there was much difficulty in following him with that precision which he might naturally wish. He therefore hoped that his Lordship and the House would make allowance for any deficiency of his pursuit through such an extensive maze of fact and argument. He would not attempt to follow him regularly, but endeavour to answer the most prominent points. The Noble Lord seemed to be instigated by such a spirit of opposition to the peace, as if he were resolved, as already mentioned, that there should be no peace at all.—With regard to the little island of Elba, he conceived it unworthy of contest, and therefore would not detain their Lordships by a long disquisition on that subject. As to Malta, it was to be restored to the Order of St. John of Jerusalem, and its independence and perpetual neutrality acknowledged, under the guarantee of Great Britain, France, Austria, Russia, Spain, and Prussia. Such an arrangement was perfectly consonant to the wishes of those who were highly esteemed for their intelligence and patriotism. Perhaps it would have been more agreeable to the policy of some, that Russia had taken possession of Malta; and why at one time such an arrangement had been postponed or neglected, was best known to the Emperor, who had in the settlement of differences conducted himself in the most liberal manner. Many were of opinion, that his becoming one of the guaranties was a greater security for the independence of the Maltese, and consequently the peace of Europe, than the adoption of the other arrangement mentioned. Our possessions in the East and West Indies were much strengthened by the acquisitions which we had attained from the peace; and whatever apprehensions certain Noble Lords might entertain for the safety of our settlements in the East, when contemplating even the supposed ambitious views of the French government, he dismissed all such idle fears at once from his mind, as unworthy of serious reflection. Our sovereignty in the East was acknowledged and confirmed by various treaties, and therefore any apprehensions on that head were nugatory in the extreme. With regard to the state of the Prince of Orange, his claims had by no means been abandoned; but it ought to be recollected, that, however painful his claims were on our generosity as an old and faithful ally, he could not now be considered as a sovereign; and therefore an indemnity for the losses which he had sustained could not be recommended on such a principle of compensation. For the possessions which he had held independently of the States, he would certainly receive an adequate compensation from those who had the control of public affairs in Holland. Ministers were, therefore, not to blame when the claims of the House of Orange were called in question. They had acted with every attention to the rights of that Prince, who had so faithfully conducted himself for the interests of this country, and that of our allies. Great jealousies and fears had been expressed on the subject of our commercial interests, as if we could, on the termination of hostilities, expect that the same extent of commerce would remain to us, which we enjoyed, by the gallantry of our seamen, during the war. His Lordship again earnestly recommended that no ideas of a hostile nature to France should be circulated as if sanctioned by the British Government, which was zealously resolved to use its best exertions for the cultivation of peace and friendship between the two countries. Every measure adopted by Government on such an important subject certainly challenged the investigation or discussion of any Noble Peer; but the Noble Secretary could not help remarking, that the Noble Lord who now appeared in opposition to the peace might have chosen another time equally well adapted for his purpose. Lord Pelham, before he sat down, intimated his intention of submitting to their Lordships, as soon as the preceding motion and amendment were disposed of, another motion for an address to his Majesty, approving of the definitive treaty now under consideration.

LORD MULGRAVE announced his intention of supporting the motion of the last Noble Peer whenever he brought it forward. On this occasion, he had no hesitation to differ from his Noble Friend (Lord Grenville), because he was conscious that he thus properly discharged his duty to his country. His Lordship, who had certainly delivered a very able and animated speech, had dwelt much in condemnation of the arrangement for Malta. He, however, thought, that every candid man would acknowledge the error of the Noble Peer, who had this day, as on former debates, given the most unqualified reprobation of the peace. Malta, luckily for the interest and happiness of Europe, was to be restored to the Maltese, who were best able, under the guarantee of the powers mentioned, to govern that island. His Lordship, in opposition to Lord Grenville, could not conceive any solid ground for entertaining suspicions of the sincerity of France, so far as related to the fulfilment of the treaty; neither was he in the least alarmed for the supposed inordinate ambition of Buonaparté. He wished it to be fully understood on the part of France, that neither the British Government nor British people had the most remote intentions of violating the national faith so solemnly pledged. He saw no needless sacrifices which we had made for the attainment of peace. It could not by any reasonable man be supposed, that, on the return of that desirable event, we were not to make some sacrifice as an inducement for France to agree to terms of pacification. Notwithstanding all the sacrifices which we had made, there still remained to us great advantages, both in the East and West Indies, by the acquisition of Ceylon and Trinidad; but he confessed that he could not contemplate the state of St. Domingo without some serious apprehensions of danger to our settlements in the West Indies. It was evident, that whether Buonaparté subdued Toussaint, or formed a treaty of friendship with him, or whether Toussaint expelled the French from that island, the result would be the same to the British interests in the West Indies. It was also evident, that a very numerous and powerful black army would be retained for the emergencies of the state. An army of Europeans would not be able to encounter the dangers and difficulties incident to such a station as St. Domingo. The consequence would be, that necessity would oblige us to keep up a military establishment able to cope with that of France or Toussaint. As to the resources of this country, they were certainly capable of answering every emergency of the state, even on the renewal of a war equally bloody with that which had now terminated. But our establishments ought to be in proportion to our resources, as we could not perhaps render our resources, immense as they were, adequate to prodigal establishments. Cavilling at the terms of peace, and intimating a desire for the renewal of hostilities, reminded him of the foolish but whimsical conduct of an Irishman, as represented in one of our comedies: Pat, resolving on a quarrel, said to an Englishman, "Why do you contradict me?"—"I do not contradict you, friend. I have not uttered a word. I am only thinking, not speaking."—"Yes, but, although you have not uttered a syllable, you may think of a contradiction—a contradiction is a difference—and a difference with me, you must know, is a downright quarrel!" Thus of the French government: if they dare think differently—notwithstanding their silence—we must, according to the desperate doctrine of certain men, proceed immediately to a downright quarrel, and thus renew the dreadful calamities of war. He sincerely deprecated such rash measures; and recommended that we should embrace every opportunity of cultivating a permanent peace with France.

LORD AUCKLAND said, it had been his intention to take up a considerable share of the attention of the House, as there were some points which he thought it material to have very fully explained: but their Lordships had already heard so much upon the general subject of discussion, that he should now confine himself more than he intended. He should more particularly touch upon the most extraordinary doctrine which had been advanced upon this occasion, that the non-renewal of former treaties affected the rights of this country, and more particularly in India. The position was unquestionably in direct opposition to the law of nations, and to every established principle of common justice. The right of sovereignty of this country in India was touched, indeed, by the loose and provident wording of the 13th article of the treaty of 1783, in consequence of which the French attempted to make innovations in our settlements in that country. This was resisted by our Government; and Colonel Cathcart, an officer of distinguished merit, and who, had he been spared, would have proved an honour to his country, was sent to make an arrangement with the French government. A convention was entered into by these two persons, but so obnoxious at home, from our right of sovereignty not being properly recognized, that he (Lord Auckland), who was then residing in a diplomatic capacity at Paris, had positive instructions from our Ministers here to disavow it in toto. A negotiation was then begun upon this important subject, which lasted for near a twelvemonth; when he, by directions from home, wrote a letter to the French minister, an extract from which he would read, couched in pretty strong terms of peremptory assertion with respect to the exclusive right of sovereignty, which produced the signature of the treaty of 1787, in less than three weeks from its date. [His Lordship here read the extract.] Though that treaty was not renewed, his Lordship contended, that the principle had been sufficiently acknowledged and acted upon by France, to establish the unquestioned right of sovereignty of this country in the Indian seas, and in the provinces conquered by the British arms. With respect to commercial treaties, he said it was perfectly competent to this country and France to enter into such treaties; but that which he had the honour to be concerned in negotiating was only as a treaty of experiment, and as such was to last only for six years; so that it had expired before the commencement of the late war. His Lordship said, he would not take up their Lordships' time by entering into the other subjects of debate, which had already been answered by some of his Noble Friends.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON.—"If it were possible for Parliament to remain silent, after the communication of the definitive treaty, without an implied approbation and admission that it was adequate to the just expectations of the country, and consistent with the honour and dignity of the national character, I might have been glad that public discussion could have been avoided in the perilous state in which this ill-omened peace has placed us; but the very dangers with which we are threatened, and the peculiar circumstances of this peace, make it the duty of Parliament not to shrink from the investigation of our alarming position under the operation of the definitive treaty, to which the public faith has been pledged by the King's Ministers, but to examine and point out the errors committed, and the future dangers to which those errors must expose us, and in some such terms as the Noble Lord has suggested, keep awake the watchful eye of jealousy to secure all that is not yet surrendered to France, though exposed to her ambition and her talents for cavil: nothing in the situation of the two countries had prepared us for terms so disgraceful and humiliating. With all respect for the private virtues of those who compose the present Administration, I could not look with confidence, or trust to their experience or abilities for security amidst the difficulties which surrounded us; the country at large felt more astonishment than confidence when, on their accession to power, they desired not to be judged incapable of the arduous task they had undertaken till they had been tried: they seemed to think it of trivial importance, to the public whether the state vessel, exposed to the most turbulent and dangerous sea with which it has ever been assailed, should be intrusted to known and approved abilities, or to persons who had never arrested the attention of the public, till they were placed where their errors might be the country's ruin; and as if inexperience was essential to the good management of public interests, they pressed to their aid a Noble Lord, beloved by all men for his private virtues, but one whom flattery would not venture to qualify with the character of an able and experienced negotiator. Thus seconded, they undertook the conduct and management of the most intricate and involved interests, and opposed their private virtues and unpractised abilities to the crafty experience of men, who, for nine long years of duplicity and chicanery, had successfully practised on the hopes, fears, and credulity of the whole world, till by force and cunning, unrestrained by any moral virtue, they had raised their country to that formidable eminence from which they impressed with terror and mistrust every nation with whom they had any political relations. Under such unequal negotiators some disadvantages might naturally be expected, though the two nations were placed by the war in situations of no great disparity, though the respective countries felt equally the oppressions and burdens of the war, and looked with equal ardour to the blessings of peace. The preliminaries, however, of peace, or rather catalogue of uncompensated advantages to France and her allies, at the expense of Great Britain and her allies, staggered the most desponding advocates of peace: but the earnest wish for the return of its blessings, for the revival of all the relations of amity, and the peaceful renewal of friendly and commercial intercourse, and the extinction of all the horrors of war, overweighed all other considerations; and the preliminary articles, approved by nobody, gave a species of joy to all classes, not without hopes, and, indeed, assurances that some articles respecting our allies, affecting our national honour, would be altered: but the definitive treaty has destroyed all those hopes, for it has only heaped concession upon concession, and added disgrace to our disgrace, and invented and practised a mean to remove all security for those rights which remain unconceded; and with the security of those rights, they have removed even the hopes of stability from that peace which they have purchased by such large concessions. They have wilfully deviated, or (which I rather suspect to have been the case) submitted to a deviation from the uniform practice and caution of their predecessors, by not renewing all former treaties applicable to the present state of Europe; for it is no answer to say, as my Noble Friend (Lord Auckland) has just observed, that many treaties, formerly renewed, bear no relation to existing circumstances. By the omission to renew any former treaty, Ministers have, as far as in them lay, unadjusted all former adjusted disputes, at least they have left us to the honour and justice of France, without the customary acknowledgment of our right or pledge that she would not dispute them hereafter; they have thrown such mystery over this part of their conduct, and have defended themselves so

doubtfully on this subject, that it is difficult to understand whether they avow this omission as an advantage which they have ingeniously obtained over France without discussion, or whether, having sought to renew all applicable treaties, they have been refused by France. The country have a right to know, and I call upon them in fairness to declare, on what footing this omission stands; for whatever may be my opinion on the first supposition, it must follow from the last, that the refusal to renew them is a distinct abrogation of all treaties, a distinct reservation of all old disputes, and a distinct repeal of all former adjustments: on the former supposition I shall say a few words, as I differ in some measure with my Noble Relation, though I concur with him in his inference. It has been nearly admitted by Ministers, that former treaties (by the omission of renewal) are abrogated. My Noble Relation seems to think we have lost (though not all our rights) at least our title-deeds, and specifically affirms the loss of the gum trade. I am far from thinking any of these events to have arisen simply by the tacit omission of the renewal. War does not abrogate any right, or interfere with any right (though it does with the exercise), but such as it professes to litigate by the war: it suspends, it is true, all relations of amity and commerce, all amicable intercourse; but nothing seems so obvious to common sense, as that peace has the same effect upon war as war on the preceding peace, namely, that it removes all its operations. War oppresses all the relations of peace. Peace, by removing the effects of war, removes that pressure; the oppressed energies of peace revive; the subject whose litigation made the war, must be adjusted by the peace which terminates the war, or it would be still an object of possible dispute; but no reason can be shewn why formerly adjusted disputes should be readjusted; they may be so certainly, at the will of the parties, but not necessarily. All the writers on the law of nations distinctly affirm, that peace has relation only to the war preceding, leaving all former relative situations of the two countries as before the war; and that former treaties, though not renewed expressly, remain in full effect, if not expressly abrogated in the treaty, or by private consent and acknowledgment. The uniform practice of renewing treaties, indeed, makes some little deduction from the force of this doctrine, and leaves no excuse for Ministers who have neglected it, which they might have obtained it: if it had been refused by France, the advantages of peace and its stability stand upon a different footing from that which has been made known to Parliament. We may have rights founded on the best title, supported by the best arguments; but we have no undisputed rights, all former disputes being let loose. The stability of peace depends upon acknowledged and undisputed rights, more than upon good and suff-

cient title. The Noble Secretary of State, who certainly did not answer any of the objections so ably detailed by my Noble Relation, for want of argument supposes (what not a syllable which fell from the Noble Mover justified), that he had argued against any peace whatever. He certainly considered the peace as inadequate to our fair expectations; but that we were pledged to its observance: he did, and I concur with him, state, that the definitive treaty was rather the preliminary articles of war, than a confirmation of peace; that we were exposed to many disputes by not renewing the treaties which had adjusted them; and the stability of peace, so dearly purchased, was thereby destroyed. With respect to the loss of right to the gum trade, by the simple omission of the treaty that relates to it, I wish to say a few words: if I am right, that peace, by removing the effects of the pressure of war (except as far as conquest has altered possession), restores all other rights to their state as before the war, in which doctrine I stand sanctioned by the writers on the law of nations, the case of the gum trade will stand thus: by the treaty of 1783 Great Britain ceded to France in full right the river Senegal and its dependencies, with certain forts, on condition that the English shall have the liberty of carrying on a trade for gum from the mouth of the river St. John to the bay of Fort Portendic; for it is impossible not to consider a right reserved in the very treaty that cedes the subject which supplies that right, as a condition of the cession, and inseparably involved in the cession. We conquered the possessions thus conditionally ceded in the course of this war. By the treaty of peace now under discussion, we cede all the conquests of this war. We did not conquer that which we enjoyed by reservation from our former grant; we did not therefore cede that which we had so reserved. This is, however, a matter of opinion, and both the conduct and argument of Ministers leave it a matter of possible dispute: they therefore have made a peace, with the reservation of a subject of quarrel in this instance; indeed it is a peace productive of no symptoms or relations of friendship and amity; it has terminated the war, in order that France may have leisure to take possession of the cessions made to her; but lest any friendly intercourse should appear intended on her part, she has shut up her ports against us. In the East Indies, my Noble Friend (Lord Auckland) has proved by his private notes, that he asserted our sovereignty: the treaties of 1783 and 1787, containing no such word, seem to prove that it was ineffectually asserted by him; and it appears by both those treaties, that we ceded the independent trade over all our possessions, which by force of the term can be dependant on nothing, not even on the treaty which stipulates such grant: the treaty becomes only an evidence of the independent right; but the limitations respecting salt, &c. in the treaty of 1787, are merely conventional; and fall with the treaties, should they be abrogated. If difference of opinion should exist on this subject, it will be at least a proof that Ministers have left points of great importance unsettled, which may, and probably will be disputed, if not now adjusted. I therefore agree with the Noble Lord who made this motion, that it is necessary to our situation, that it is a necessity produced by the conduct of Ministers, who have pledged the country to the maintenance of this peace, even under all its circumstances: I agree with him, that the King's prerogative to make war and peace is indisputable, and I acknowledge that the King has an indisputable right to choose his Ministers and his counselors; but I do not agree with my Noble Relation, not to mean censure on those Ministers whose conduct we both disapprove: the power which appointed them cannot give them experience and ability to manage the complicated affairs and interests of a great nation. Good intentions and private virtues are not excuses for rashness in undertakings, and errors in the management of interests, on which the peace, commerce, and future importance of this country, depend."

THE EARL OF WESTMORLAND said, the arguments of the Noble Lord who spoke last had a tendency to make the people dissatisfied with the peace; he however gave him credit for having brought them forward with the purest motives. He nevertheless could not avoid thinking, that if there was a necessity for using such language, there was a time more suitable than the present. He declined saying any thing concerning the preliminary treaty; but he should confine himself to the articles of the definitive. The Noble Lord must not be surprised to hear some of his own arguments repeated, arguments which he appeared in some degree to have forgotten. The change of sentiment that he had sometimes seen in that House reminded him of an extraordinary metamorphosis, related, as he believed, by Swift. In a certain country the men and women changed sexes; among other strange effects of this transmutation, the maids of honour became officers of the guards, and the officers of the guards became maids of honour. It was, however, remarked, that among the new maids of honour, those who had been the most profligate became the most reserved; and that among the virgins, now become military beaux, those who had been formerly the most modest became the most dissipated of the corps. He made no application, but

His Lordship defended the whole of the definitive treaty; and said, there were very strong reasons why the commercial treaties with France and the other powers ought not to be renewed. When former treaties had been renewed, great doubts existed as to the propriety of doing so. But he would ask, if it would be wise to refuse treating with Holland and Spain through the medium of France? The treaty of 1787 had been made merely to correct the inadvertency of 1783. If it was said that we had gained nothing by the late war, he would desire Noble Lords to look at the different states of Europe, to see what they had lost, and how little we had lost in comparison. We had fortunately a great and able Statesman at the head of our affairs; and if every other power engaged in the war had had such Ministers, we should not now have to regret the desolation of the greater part of Europe. Great stress had been laid upon the appointment of Buonaparté to the presidency of the Italian republic; but he would ask, if France had gained a single inch of territory in Italy by that act? Certainly not: her power there could not be increased. As to the isle of Elba, he would ask, where was the difference, whether it belonged to France, or to the King of Etruria? So far from thinking that the occupation of Louisiana by the French would be dangerous to the American States, it would only serve to awaken their jealousy against a power which would never be able to attack them in that quarter with any success; and he trusted, that in any future contests between us and France, we should find these States to be most friendly and watchful allies. None of those things complained of had made such an alteration in the affairs of France as could justify Ministers in breaking off the treaty and renewing the war. There was one reason predominating over every other, which made it necessary for Ministers to conclude a peace—that was the general wish of the people; for though he would not have Ministers be guided by speeches pronounced in Guildhall or Palace Yard, they were bound to regulate their conduct by the sentiments of the people at large. The Noble Earl then drew a comparison between the state of France and Great Britain; the former was distracted by parties, the existence of its present government depended on the life of one man, and the country was not in a condition to restore either its commerce or its navy. How different was the state of Great Britain, whose commerce and wealth gave her strength, and enabled her to call forth at any time all the energies of the people, who now enjoyed a state of unexampled tranquillity.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH, after noticing that this was the first time of his offering himself to the House, said, he obtruded himself with great diffidence upon their Lordships' notice, new as he was to them; but he felt an irresistible impulse of duty to express his gratitude as an individual to those Ministers who had been the means of raising the honour of the country, and procuring it at the same time the blessings of peace. He was desirous likewise of refuting the opinion, that the renewal of old treaties was of any use to this country. Those treaties, indeed, were no more than waste paper, since they no longer applied to the actual situation and circumstances of the world; and if they had been renewed, it would have been absolutely necessary to have excepted, by specific regulations, every article in them, as they would either have been nugatory or injurious. He had read these treaties with considerable attention—they were out of the usual course of his industry; but he preferred the general and acknowledged principles of the law of nations, as less liable to misconception and abstract reasoning. But the Noble Lord who had brought forward this discussion, with such severe terms of reprobation of the definitive treaty, had forgot that he was not always the strenuous advocate for the renewal of treaties; for it would be found from the instructions to our negotiator at Lisle, in the drawing up of which his Lordship, he should suppose, must have had no inconsiderable share, and a copy of which was actually upon their Lordships' table, that in that negotiation there was a particular injunction against the renewal of certain stipulations of the treaty of Utrecht. Our sovereignty in India, upon the violation of which by the non-renewal of treaties so much stress had been laid, his Lordship said, he thanked God, depended upon surer and stronger ties than all the treaties that ever were made could give: it depended upon the right of conquest in a legitimate war, a war of defence, upon the public and repeated recognition of all the powers of Europe connected with commerce, and upon the established right of possession, the best right of all. Our sovereignty in India was now upwards of forty years in duration, and was older than any existing government in India. It could not be strengthened by all the treaties that could be devised; and the power that could meditate to dispute that title must be so divested of all justice and moderation, that she would not be bound by any treaties that could be devised or entered into. His Lordship next adverted to Malta, and insisted that the arrangement with respect to that island was wise and prudent in the highest degree. He contended, that the Order was not in such a state of poverty as the Noble Lord had represented it. The Cape of Good Hope, the cession of which was so much deplored, he thought we were well rid of. He would tell the Noble Lord, that the expense of that post would have been so great, that the country would very soon have had reason to complain of its retention. He would tell him, that we could not send a chaldron of coals thither without the expense of 26l. 10s.; and it was a well-known fact, that at the time the Dutch were sending home, during our scarcity, a small supply of grain to this country, the government there was obliged to send ships to India, to get rice and other provisions; and an urgent request came home for a supply of biscuit, not for the troops only, but even for the Dutch themselves. It had been urged by the Noble Lord, that, deprived of the Cape, our fleets must be employed in conveying our trade and our troops to India; but can it be forgotten, that in the war before the last we had France, Spain, and Holland against us, with a fleet more equal in power than what they now can boast of? With respect to the idle compliment of the Dutch striking their flag to us, he thought there was not much magnanimity in enforcing that from the weaker power, which we did not require from the stronger. Of Portugal much had been said; but he believed that that country was truly thankful for what we had done for it in the definitive arrangement for peace. He then entered into a strain of panegyric on the present Ministers, who had accepted their situation under circumstances of peculiar gloom and depression, from causes both domestic and external; and concluded by saying, that they had his most humble and sincere thanks for their spirit and their moderation, their wisdom and their firmness, by which they had rescued the country from its dangers and difficulties, INCREASED ITS GLORY, and procured the blessings of peace.

EARL DARNLEY said he had cheerfully given his vote for the preliminaries; but he could not give it for the definitive treaty, on account of its variations from the preliminaries. His Lordship seemed to think that Malta should not have been given up, without receiving St. Domingo or some other equivalent for it.

The EARL OF ROSSLYN answered Lord Ellenborough as to what he had said, rather contemptuously, of our having omitted to insist on the Dutch lowering their colours to the British flag; and shewed that it was not trivial or ludicrous, but a matter of great and serious importance. He said, our right to the sovereignty of the seas originated so long since as the beginning of the 16th century; that in the time of James the First, the learned Grotius wrote an able book against our right to maintain it, and that the no less learned Selden gave it a full and complete answer. He lamented that for the first time in his life he must give his vote against the wishes of his Noble Friend (Lord Grenville); but there were words in this address, moved by his Noble Friend, which he could not vote for.

The LORD CHANCELLOR left the woolsack, and declared, that he had, during the greater part of his life, lived in habits of the most familiar intimacy with his Noble and Learned Brother (Ellenborough); but that the influence of private friendship had no concern with a question of national consequence. He thought his Learned Brother spoke too lightly of the ambiguity of treaties, which he feared might be attributed to their joint legal professions.

His Lordship coincided with a Noble Duke (Norfolk), that appearing to distrust the faith of the French was making peace with a drawn sword in our hands; but at the same time he was anxious that the country should be kept in such a state of defence as might ensure our safety, without needlessly exciting the jealousy of our neighbours. His Lordship contended, that in every point of view it was not only fair but honourable both to ourselves and our allies. In our foreign possessions we were, he said, placed in a better situation without the recapitulation of any former treaties, than we should have been by enumerating and referring to them. In India the treaty of 1787 had given to France the privilege of a free trade: this was done in consequence of particular advantages granted in return; but, now that those advantages had ceased, who would deny that we were better situated with the acknowledged sovereignty of the East, unencumbered with any privileges granted to France? With respect to Honduras, our situation was likewise improved. Either Spain must allow us the right of cutting logwood, or the country is ours by the right of conquest. Towards our allies our conduct had been just, and highly honourable to ourselves. The Porte was restored to the state she held before the war. It was partly in justice to our faithful ally, and partly to preserve our own territories, that the expedition to Egypt was undertaken. In consequence of this, Portugal was left to herself, and, under the influence of duress and terror, formed the treaty of Badajoz. We, by the peace, had guaranteed the integrity of Portugal; but it must be observed, that her integrity as before the war was not mentioned, and the treaty could therefore only relate to her integrity as acknowledged by that treaty. For the House of Nassau we had done every thing that honour could suggest. It was true, no specific sum had been granted, nor the spot where the indemnification was to take place been pointed out; but four powers had guaranteed the indemnification, and the security was surely better than if it had been guaranteed by France only. It had been urged, that a separate article was signed between the French and Dutch ministers at the moment of signing the definitive treaty; but that was no concern of ours, nor any way altered the nature of the indemnity. On comparing the state of France with this country, his Lordship passed the highest encomiums on the late Ministers, who had raised Britain to such a pitch of glory. He likewise frequently panegyricized a Noble Lord (Nelson) who sat near him; and, above all, united the praises of Mr. Pitt and his Lordship for the glorious action of Copenhagen, which completely established the British right to search neutral vessels. His Lordship said, that the right of the flag was not surrendered by this treaty; it had, indeed, never been exacted, except from the Dutch, and they had complied with it ever since the year 1515. In no treaty with France or Spain had it ever been mentioned, nor in fact in any with Holland, but rested upon the tacit acquiescence of that country as an old and established custom. He then concluded with defending the provisions of the treaty, as far as regarded the expenses of the prisoners of war, and the losses experienced by those who deposited property in the French funds.

EARL CAMDEN assigned his reasons for not finding himself able to vote with his Noble Friend (Lord Grenville) for his address, although he thought highly of the greater part of it; but, as those parts which he approved could be contained in the proposed amendment of the Noble Secretary of State, and the objectionable passages omitted, he should vote for the amendment; especially as he thought the address having been known to have been amended by the Secretary of State, would have a better effect, and make a more favourable impression abroad, than if it came from any Noble Lord who objected to the peace. He nevertheless declared that he did not approve of the preliminaries, and still less of the definitive treaty; but the treaty being concluded, he thought it proper to support it.

The DUKE of RICHMOND warmly commended the speech of the Noble Lord who opened the debate (Lord Grenville), but he did not approve of the conduct of the war in all its parts. He thought the public money had been lavishly squandered in running after every petty German prince to beg him to take some of our cash; not but he approved of subsidies, when wisely applied, and when their troops were to act under our command. In our state of maritime superiority, he saw no reason of necessity for making peace, as we might have conducted the war single-handed with more advantage than we could now revive it if the French should persist in their system of aggrandizement.

LORD HOBART, in a short speech, by an explanation of two or three facts, answered several of the strongest objections stated by Lord Grenville. He particularly contended, that the Noble Lord had spoken inconsiderately when he stated that the possession of the command of the river Arawari by the French would endanger British ships in their attempts to enter Rio Janeiro, by shewing that the course of the river Arawari ran a different way towards Paita, and Rio Janeiro lay many degrees lower than the river Amazon.

EARL SPENCER rose to make a single observation, in answer to a part of Lord Hobart's argument; and declared, that he had intended to speak to many particulars stated and reasoned upon by those Noble Lords who had endeavoured to answer his Noble Friend's objection;

but the late hour rendered it too inconvenient to the House and himself for him to attempt it.

LORD GRENVILLE also prefaced his explanation, by saying, that he did not at that late hour (seven in the morning) rise to reply, though he should have been extremely glad to have done so, to many curious arguments that had been opposed to his objections in the course of the debate; but he was too much exhausted, and he conceived their Lordships were so likewise; he would therefore only say one word in explanation of a gross misrepresentation of the Noble Secretary for the war department (Lord Hobart). He had not mentioned Rio Janeiro, because he well knew where it lay; but had said that the French possession of that part of Guiana bounded by the river Arawari, would, during a war, enable them to oblige the Portuguese to shut British ships out from the Brazils, where it was sometimes useful for our ships for India to call, water, and obtain provisions; and then we could put in no where nearer than Madagascar, where we should find but poor accommodation.

Lord Pelham's motion was then put, and carried without a division*.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, MAY 13TH, 1802.

The order of the day for taking into consideration the definitive treaty, being read,

Mr. WINDHAM rose, and spoke nearly as follows:—"Upon a subject which has already received a good deal of discussion, in several important points of detail, I hope I shall not be under the necessity of troubling the House with any argument of great length. If, however, I am relieved from such necessity, I owe it to that mode of proceeding to which some have objected as irregular. The best proof of the propriety of the conduct of those who brought various points of the definitive treaty separately before the House, will be the manner of our now coming to the general examination. Who can deny that every man who has attended those discussions must find himself better prepared, better informed, more competent to form a fair and accurate judgment on the whole subject by the separate explanations, and the additional lights which have been derived from the preliminary debates? By having investigated the points in detail, we are qualified to pronounce a decision upon the whole case. Much ground has been cleared, many questions have been answered, many difficulties have been elucidated, which must otherwise have perplexed the consideration of a subject, in itself so full of matter, and so little susceptible of being reduced into a short compass. Assisted by those previous inquiries, we are enabled the better to shape the argument to such parts of so complicated a subject as are the most deserving our consideration.—I therefore proceed to take a view of the leading points of the definitive treaty. The order is different, and I begin with Malta. After the discussions that we have already had regarding the situation in which our interests in that island are left by the treaty, it is unnecessary to enlarge upon the advantages which the French have gained by the stipulation of neutrality. It is clear, that, including the force of their allies, Spain and Holland, they may have eighteen ships of the line in its neutral port, while we have no more than six. But these points of detail are of inferior importance. The whole disposition of the island of Malta renders the stipulation of neutrality fictitious. The garrison must in fact be French. It is in vain to talk of the mummery that there shall not be this langue or the other langue. The whole is French. If any man denies this to be the case, I shall be very happy to see his opinions and his reasons recorded, that they may be compared with the future result. So far from having restored the Order of Malta, we have, by the arrangements of this treaty, made war upon it in the very spirit of French principles. This little Order, which contained in itself the great characteristics and distinctive qualities of that which the French revolution served to destroy, we have now concurred to overthrow. The little phial which contained the essence of the old principles, Ministers have diluted, and not even with common water, but with water taken from the puddle. In this degradation, how can its ancient spirit be kept up? Nay, it is already understood, that the German knights refuse to serve in a body so degraded and fallen off from its original and peculiar character. As to the notion that Neapolitan troops can form any security for the independence of the island of Malta, who does not see that the idea is wholly ridiculous? The proceeding is a perfect syllogism. If Malta is put into the hands of Naples, and Naples is in the hands of France; Malta, to be sure, is in the hands of France. In truth, the case of Malta is a virtual and total surrender, with a ridicule in the manner, infinitely disgraceful to the reputation of our national councils. Far better would it have been to have made an absolute cession of it, and thus have acquired a claim to compensation and equivalent, than to have formed a vain and futile pretence to establish its neutrality and independence. At present our footing and interest in the Mediterranean, which used to be reckoned of so much importance, are utterly abandoned. In this and in various other points there is a marked variation between the preliminaries and the definitive treaty, to the disadvantage of this country.—The Cape of Good Hope is given up in full sovereignty to the Dutch; so that the latter may, whenever they please, surrender it to the French. The question of its being made a free port is left entirely at the option of France; and with such an arbitrator we can only expect that it will be made a free port, if that mode of keeping it were to be less favourable to England than any other. But it is said, that the Cape is but a tavern. Be it so. A tavern that can furnish refreshments to armies and navies in the midst of a voyage of five or six months, is not an object of trifling consideration. Nay, without it, how can troops be sent out for the protection of your Eastern empire? Without the refreshment of that tavern, troops must arrive in India in such a state as to be unfit for service for weeks, and months possibly, after their landing, and that too on an emergency when their immediate services may be required. The only other place of stopping at is the Brazils; and how can we calculate that in time of war we should continue that facility? Our Indian empire then being our sheet anchor, every thing accessory to its preservation and defence is of the utmost importance. While we lose any advantages from the Cape, see what France gains! what she gains likewise by the restitution of Cochin to the Dutch, and the additional means of annoying our possessions, which her coalition with the Dutch must afford.—The command of the Cape and Cochin gives her the means of preparing an armament and landing it in India, before we shall have conceived in this country the least suspicion of any such design.—With respect to the boundaries of French and Portuguese Guiana, it appears to me, that even with the benefit of all the previous consideration, this subject, which could not before have been understood at all, is now understood but very imperfectly. Ministers seem to have been themselves completely puzzled in the transaction. It is not wonderful, therefore, that they should not be either very able or very willing to explain the particulars of it to us. The Arawari is at last agreed to be the limit; contrary to what was declared in the preliminaries, which said, that the dominions of her Most Faithful Majesty were to be restored to their integrity. The French, as appeared in the mean time, had made a most curious attempt to change the meaning of these words, by signing a treaty with the Portuguese, at Madrid, two days only before the signature of our preliminaries, and then contending that the terms integrity of her Most Faithful Majesty's dominions were to be understood with reference to the boundary settled in that treaty. This, as is evident, was a most gross and scandalous fraud, and as such was spoken of in this House; a fraud by the French on the Ministers, if the Ministers were unacquainted with the fact; a fraud by the Ministers on the country, if they could be supposed to have known the fact, and not to have mentioned it to the House. But this fraud, it seems, is not to be insisted upon. It is too bad for even the French negotiators to contend for. And therefore you suppose that the words in the preliminaries are to stand according to their original and natural meaning. But not at all. Though the French do not insist upon their fraud being carried directly and regularly into execution, they do insist upon receiving a compensation for it. And here it is that we hear for the first time of the Arawari; a boundary never thought of, as far as I have ever heard, but in the treaty of Badajos (with which this country had nothing to do, and which does not even appear to have been finally executed); and never mentioned in this House but in an answer to the Noble Lord's (Hawkesbury) to a question put to him by an individual Member. This Arawari is now taken, upon the result of a negotiation, as the compromise between the boundary understood to exist at the time of the preliminary treaty, and the boundary attempted to be imposed by the fraudulent treaty of Madrid. The first question is, why any compromise at all? Why are the French to be allowed to sell their frauds? But the next question is, at what price have they sold them? I maintain that they have gained by this pretended sacrifice all that the original attempt was calculated to procure for them: that by the possession of the Arawari, they are in possession, in effect, of the mouth of the Amazons; which is all they ever wanted. The Hon. Gentlemen (his Majesty's Ministers) were so lost in these wilds, had so confounded themselves between those different streams, between the and the Arawari, the north branch, and the south branch, the Catapapatuba, and the Vincent Pinson, that having met with a civil Gentleman here, who was so good as to offer his assistance, fairly put themselves into his hands, and were led about by him, not knowing in the least where they were going, till, in the end, he brought them back precisely to the point from which they set out, that is to say, the mouth of the river Amazon. The question is one that must ultimately be ascertained by maps; and on their authority I rest the assertion, that the Portuguese have not acquired that security which it was their object to procure.—When I look also at the cession of Louisiana to France, a point acquiesced in by the definitive treaty, it is of a magnitude that I am at a loss to describe in adequate terms. Taking the indefinite extent of Guiana, and the cession of Louisiana, we may be said to give away a fourth part of the globe. We have given the command of the two greatest rivers in the world—the Mississippi in the North America, and the river of Amazons in the South. Rivers are the vital parts of countries: we may be said, therefore, without hyperbole, to have made a present to France of a brace of continents.—Never was there such a lavish, prodigal, thoughtless spirit of cession! Ministers have really scattered pearls like barleycorns; and I am amazed to see with what coldness and indifference the country has viewed transactions of such importance, by which so many of the most valuable interests have been lavished upon their rivals, and in which so many stipulations are contained pregnant with danger and pain to themselves.—In addition to these considerations with regard to foreign objects, the whole continent of Europe is abandoned to France. I should think, indeed, that instead of our being called upon to shew the danger of such a state of things, those who have acquiesced in so monstrous an innovation, are bound to shew that it can be otherwise than dangerous. While they are letting in tides which are spreading so furiously in every direction, it is their business to shew us what they will not inundate, what they will spare. We follow this torrent, threatening our rights, in many different tracks. We see it endangering us at Honduras, we see it menacing to shake and unsettle in India the dearest part of our foreign empire. But this matter will require more particular discussion, and I am glad that it has already been the subject of debate. That the definitive treaty has not settled our rights in such a manner as to preclude all doubts, I perceive from the fact admitted last night by my Right Hon. Friend (Mr. Dundas), a person conversant beyond any other in the affairs of India, who confesses that in the first instance he was alarmed, lest, by the non-renewal of treaties, particularly the convention of 1787, some danger to our Indian dominions might arise. That any uncertainty was ever felt by him, is at least a proof of the fact that uncertainty may exist. We contended, that by the abrogation of the convention of 1787, founded upon and referring to the treaties of 1783 and 1763, something was taken away, which had formerly quieted the claims of France, and secured the rights of this country. But it was said, that at the same time we were freed from the treaties which laid the foundation of those claims, and that it was better to get rid of the disease and of the remedy: and, doubtless, it is possible that a constitution may be improved by such an operation. This argument was at least to the point, whether it was conclusive or not. With regard to the arguments to prove the clearness of our Indian rights, they seemed rather less in point. We were told in lofty and magnificent phrases of the justice of our cause. But who had said that our cause was not good, that our rights were not clear? We have to contend with an adversary who may not choose to appeal to the House of Commons. The argument was all thrown away, for it was coram non judice.—The question is, what will the enemy say, and how should you have acted to meet his objections? If disputes were to be settled by a man and his own attorney, the business of Westminster Hall would not be a little diminished; but unfortunately, when the matter is very amicably settled, the adversary comes and drags the suitor into court. So, to discuss the justice of the cause here, when nobody disputes it, seems to be a waste of very excellent argument. The Hon. Gentleman, like another Ajax, is dealing his blows without mercy among us poor cattle, taking us for so many Trojans, instead of reserving his might for foes who I can assure him will furnish full employment for it, were its amount greater even than it is. We all know, that previous not only to the convention of 1787, but to 1783, claims respecting Indian trade and territory had been set up by the French. What reason have we to think that the present government of France will drop any pretensions hostile to this country which former governments had advanced? In 1783, as well as I am afraid will appear to have been the case in 1802, points were left unsettled, and new explanations became necessary. The convention of 1787 was more favourable to us, because concluded in a moment when England could negotiate with greater effect, and it gave us the most satisfactory security. The French abandoned the means of enforcing any claims of a kind that could be proved injurious to us. But why were these means now restored? on the contrary, why were not new means taken to prevent the possibility of claims by which our empire in the East may be disturbed? What has been doing for the last seven months? Our rights, whether of conquest or treaty (as so ably distinguished and demonstrated last night), are unquestionable; but is there not reason to apprehend a renewal of former evils? From some parts of the speech of my Right Hon. Friend (Mr. Dundas), I should have been led to think that he had been napping, and on his awaking had imagined that we were still at open war. He talked of drawing the sword against any power that should dispute our rights, and exultingly dwelt upon our strength in India. This was not perhaps exactly the moment when we could say, Here we stand upon our sovereignty, touch us who dare. It is very true, our strength in India may defy all attack; but does he not know, that, though the dispute is in India, the battle may be fought in Europe? Like an action at law, the right may lie in Cumberland, and the issue be tried in Westminster Hall. The French may think us strong in India and weak in Europe. We have seen already how, by a close squeeze in Europe, they have made us vomit up all that we had gorged elsewhere.—With regard to the sincerity and faith of France, let us look to some of the specimens of it as displayed in other countries. The Grand Duke was driven out of Tuscany, for the purpose of substituting in his room a figure under the name of a king. They move their duke to the other end of the board, and fill the square with a king. Still the territory, it was supposed, would remain the same: so thought Austria; so thought Great Britain. But not so. The change of government was meant only as an expedient for a change to be effected in the territory. A Prince of the House of Spain, placed in the sovereignty solely by their appointment, must do whatever they bid him; and what they direct him to do, is to make over to them in perpetuity Elba with its port and fortress. And thus by a happy transformation, equal to any that could be practised by the most skilful algebraist, these possessions are exterminated from the Duchy of Tuscany, now become the kingdom of Etruria, and vested for ever in the hands of the French. That they may not, however, appear to deal hardly with their new friend, that they may not levy too heavy a fine upon him on his admission, may not take too large garnish on his entrance into their spunging-house; they devise a way for making him some amends. Porto Ferrajo, they say, and Elba, we must have. They are absolutely necessary for our purposes against England. But you shall not be altogether a loser. As we have a running account with Naples, after taking Elba from you, we will give you a draft upon Naples for Piombino. This is at once an example, as far as a single instance goes, of the benefit of the treaty, and a specimen of the character and mode of proceeding of those on whose good faith we shall have in future to depend. When we cast our eyes upon the map of Europe, and survey the growth of France, the prospect is so immense, as not to admit of a summary. The subject at length would be nothing less than the history of the war, and the history of the French revolution. To know what France can and will do, we ought to know what she has done and has willed; and this should be compared with what is likely to be done by Great Britain. As an instance of what France can do, now that it is distinctly a body of new Romans meditating the conquest of the world, let us recollect that France has effected in ten years, what Polybius mentions with wonder, as having been accomplished by Rome in little more than half a century. Their achievements have far outstripped those of their predecessors, who might exclaim in the same plaintive strain as Hosier's Ghost, in our popular ballad,

For resistance I could fear none,
But with twenty ships had done
What thou, brave and happy Vernon,
Hast achiev'd with six alone.

The French have taken the Romans for their model, and affect to imitate them in every thing. Independent of their territories, the map of Europe is but small, and only two great powers are left standing. Russia is powerful, but at a great distance from them; Austria alone remains strong, and perhaps not impaired, in territories; but so bereft of all external aid, so stripped of support, that in any new storm, the first heave of the sea must infallibly bring it by the board. In fact, there is no single continental power which can again dare to face France, without being instantly crushed by that enormous mace with which she is now armed. The French avow that they act upon the Roman model; they fairly acknowledge what they mean to be, and frankly tell us also what they mean us to be.—Some indeed admit that Europe is gone, and they say, Peace be with it! they think that, come what will, we may take to our boat and escape. That might have been said formerly; but the spectre of French power now pursues us in every direction. In Europe, in Asia, in America, it follows, continually scaring us with its threatening aspect. Look at the West Indies, and see France in possession by cession of Martinique, Guadalupe, and St. Domingo, since the preliminaries, by the permission of Ministers. It is pretended, indeed, that the recovery of the latter island from the Blacks was necessary to the security of our own colonies: such is the opinion of those who are interested in the West India islands; but is that authority conclusive? Allowing the fidelity and patriotism of these men to be unimpeached (as they certainly are), is it not possible that the regard for their property may induce them to form an opinion of the policy of our facilitating the recovery of St. Domingo, that may be inconsistent with the interest of the nation? For my part, I conceive that the power of the Blacks, confined to St. Domingo, and without the means of extending beyond it, was much less formidable to this country than the establishment of the power of France. Even though the emissaries or the example of the Blacks might have reached the other islands, still, though private property might have been endangered, the political interest of the state was less endangered. The West India proprietors might think, that, if the negroes obtained the ascendancy, their property would be ruined, while, if the islands fell under the power of France, though the value of their property might fall, it would not be entirely destroyed. This was a view of the case, however, which, politically speaking, would not lessen the injury to England. Indeed, with the possession of St. Domingo, with a port which almost commands our communications with our most important islands, it would become a most formidable neighbourhood to our colonial power, and in time of war would become a military station, from which we should be attacked, and a point which would give the enemy an opportunity to harass our trade. In fact, we have given up two continents to France. We have allowed her to be placed in a situation in which she will acquire such an influence over the American States, as at a future period may enable her to employ them with advantage against our most important interests.—Such being the means of France, what is her will? Those who expected that the peace would disarm France of her hostility, who thought that she would be contented to cultivate the advantages of commerce and manufactures without animosity towards England, must now see that she pursues more than ever the grand object of universal empire. At every period before the preliminaries, and since, she has expressed, without disguise, the spirit by which she is animated; she proceeds like a general changing his guards, sending out his parties, marking out his ground, and arranging his plan of operations. Every thing is conceived and conducted in the spirit of hostility; and after having succeeded in the war of swords, now terminated, she enters with the same disposition, and with the same hopes, upon the war of the custom-house.—What then are the means which Britain possesses, and how ought she to call them forth to ward off the dangers that assail us? In considering this, we must inquire what are the moral resources, taking that word a good deal in the French sense. What is the mind to call forth, and employ the physical means? In all animal life (states may be considered as living bodies, subject to the general laws of animated nature), it is observed, that the foresight of danger is generally accommodated to the force and means which are enjoyed to escape from that danger. It appears to me that this nation has been more defective in the foresight of danger than in the means of repelling it. From this defect a great part of the calamities of the country at this crisis have arisen. The nation has too much undervalued its danger, and its exertions have fallen short both of its means and of the occasion. At first, when the principles of the French revolution were at work, when other nations were actually in conflict with it, when the havoc that it produced was seen in the example of others, it was said that all this would never reach us, that the menstruum might dissolve the base metals with which it came in contact, but would pass harmless over the pure gold of the British constitution. Men were not aware, that the character of the revolutionary principle was, to prey both on good and bad, nay, on the former in preference. It was not long before the pure gold of the British constitution was found as susceptible of the effects of Jacobinism, as the baser materials, which they were so fond of imputing to the composition of other governments. In the year 1792 all the establishments of this country began to fume and hiss, under the action of the new principles, like the veriest piece of copper under the touch of aquafortis. But nevertheless there seemed to be a strange and extraordinary indifference to the state of Europe and to the progress of the hostile principle. Snug was the word. People were for leaving other nations to shift for themselves; the high spirit and the politic maxims of our ancestors were forgotten. Even when other nations stood forward in the common cause of nations, in our defence as well as their own, there was no alacrity to participate in their exertions. The nation seemed not only to have no disposition to engage in the war, but to display a new and singular anxiety to avoid it. From this view of the state of Europe, from this estimate of the nature of the danger, arose the conduct of the war after it had become inevitable. Differences of opinion existed as to the mode of carrying it on. There were persons of great abilities and high situations with whom I had the misfortune to differ on these views of things. Agreeing in many points with them, co-operating with them in a public capacity in leading objects, and respecting their talents and their motives, I was obliged to differ from them on the grounds at which I have hinted. The war was to be viewed either as an ordinary contest between two nations, and carried on upon the usual principles of annoying and weakening your antagonist till he was brought to equitable sentiments; or we were to consider it as a new and extraordinary war, which should be carried on with a system suited to its portentous nature. Hence, therefore, it was to be carried on by attacking enemies' colonies, capturing their ships, &c. or it was to be carried on by aiming decisive blows at the seat or centre of the system from which the true principle of the war and danger proceeded. I do not mean to say that these different plans were exclusive. I only mean that the one more particularly arose out of the one view of the case, the other out of the other. Those who preferred attacking the centre of the evil did not think it wrong to aim at the advantages of the other, if the first failed; while those who directed their efforts to the colonies and marine of the enemy did not mean to say that the restoration of monarchy was not a desirable object. The whole question was, which was to be the leading and principal object, which the secondary and subordinate one. I shall not inquire which of these was the best. The one was tried, the other not; and whether that which was not tried would have succeeded, must remain a matter of judgment. I may add, however, that the plan which was not pursued was that most conformable to my own opinions. Except early in the war at 'Toulon, and afterwards in the melancholy affair of Quiberon, there was little or nothing attempted upon what I thought the peculiar principle of the war, and upon that plan of conduct appropriate to it. As to the Quiberon expedition, at a time when the clamour was loudest against it, a Right Hon. Friend of mine (Mr. Pitt), with great manliness and liberality, said in this House, that he took his full share of the responsibility. Yet, fully acknowledging the generosity of that conduct, I am ready to avow——"

MR. PITT (to order).—"I submit to the House, whether it be consistent with order for my Right Hon. Friend to go into an historical account of opinions respecting the conduct of the war, particularly as that inquiry is not connected with any subject immediately under the consideration of the House. I beg leave also to submit to my Right Hon. Friend, whether he can consider the obligations which were in force when he and others were his Majesty's confidential servants, as now dispensed with?"

MR. WINDHAM.—"I do not think that the obligations to which my Right Hon. Friend alludes, can be understood as preventing me from giving that sort of explanation on which I was proceeding. I was going on to say, that I considered the expedition to Quiberon as a measure in which my Right Hon. Friend, and the majority of the cabinet, must necessarily have concurred, rather as a measure of my own, pressed by importunity——"

MR. PITT (to order).—"I cannot admit that my Right Hon. Friend, though he generously offers to undertake the whole responsibility of the Quiberon expedition, has, according to my recollection, stated correctly the extent of the share which I had in that measure. I cannot think it consistent with the duty imposed upon the station which my Right Hon. Friend filled, to divulge any consultations or opinions (supposing his statement correct), which must have been expressed in official confidence."

MR. WINDHAM.—"I conceive that I was merely stating a circumstance personal to myself; and my Right Hon. Friend would have seen by the application, that my explanation could not have been considered as any disclosure of state secrets. I was going to shew, that, the country having misjudged the war, the conduct of it naturally partook of what I conceive to have been error. What I say of the system of war, as in my judgment best suited to the circumstances of the late contest, is not an arraignment of my Right Hon. Friend, to whose department its conduct particularly belonged (Mr. Dundas). I can bear testimony to the zeal, the diligence, the activity, the ardour, and all the other eminent qualities which are known to belong to my Right Hon. Friend, and which were never more displayed by him than during the course of this war. I do not arraign the separate plans of my Right Hon. Friend, neither do I divulge state secrets. I state what was no secret, that previous to the time when I came into public station, my Right Hon. Friend had marked opinions on the subject of the war, and that we did differ in our views of the subject. When I was interrupted, I was labouring to shew that the country had not rightly judged its situation, and that the mode of war pursued, contributed to confirm their error. The country never knew sufficiently why it was at war. It has been said with great force and eloquence by my Right Hon. Friend (Mr. Pitt), on different occasions, that we were at war for security; we were indeed at war, because we could not be at peace; we were at sea, because we could not be on shore: yet, though reminded of this, the character of the war itself, the grand monitor, was wanting. The manner in which it was carried on did not sufficiently mark its nature. The force was centrifugal; it threw out all our operations towards the extremities. It never converged enough towards the focus from which the danger proceeded. The question, why we were at war, perpetually recurred; and people were not enough taught to see that we were at war, because the French government was such as to leave us no peace, and was necessarily in perpetual hostility with every thing which, as individuals and as a nation, it was our interest to defend.—This error has pursued us into peace. No person who looked at the causes of war, could have looked at the terms of peace without alarm. The country, however, is not sufficiently impressed with the dangers of peace, because it was never perfectly alive to the character of the war. But to return to the conduct of the war: although it has been unsuccessful in securing those objects which I thought peculiarly at stake, I do not on that account presume to say that it was wrong; I do not undertake to say, that the course which I more approved would have been more fortunate. This would be to reason as ill as the Hon. Gentlemen (on the opposition benches). The mode tried has failed: but it does not follow that any other would have succeeded. The case may possibly have been one in which success was not to be had. If I have thought otherwise, if I continue to think so now, that we are judged after the event, and with a view, as it were, of the symptoms after death, still this is only matter of opinion, in which every one must form his own judgment. Experience has not decided the question. Thinking, however, as I do, I conceive it to be the duty of every man to correct the public error. It is better to think that the country had not seen its situation in a proper light, than that, aware of its real danger, we had failed in the means of repelling it. Great as the exertions of the nation have been, they have not been so great as they ought to have been, compared either with the objects at stake, or the means we possessed. It is consolatory to think that the nation, not having seen the danger, will, seeing it, take the steps necessary to maintain its character and to ensure its safety. It is true, indeed, that there were those who perpetually laboured to promote the French cause, and by every act endeavoured to counteract those feelings of honour, magnanimity, and independence, by which nations can alone become great. If, however, the people of this country have utterly abandoned the feelings which every great nation should cultivate, and that policy, without which no nation can flourish, we must have insensibly degenerated from the principles of our ancestors; and it will confirm the remark of the writer, who says, that sometimes a silent revolution takes place in the character of nations, as decisive as could be produced by the most violent convulsions. Never was there a war carried on with such an incessant cry for peace from the very beginning of it. How, in any other war, would it have been tolerated that the justice of our cause and our proceedings, in every instance, should have been arraigned, and those of the enemy defended, in newspapers, in pamphlets, in Parliament; that every one who endeavoured to rouse the public spirit was vilified and traduced? How could it have happened (if the people had been sufficiently impressed with the nature of the war), that it was doubtful whether the processions to St. Paul's to celebrate three of the most splendid victories this nation had ever gained, would have been received with applause? How else could it have happened, that attempts should be made to depreciate one of our most brilliant naval victories, and to shew that the advantage was on the side of the enemy? To prove these circumstances, nothing more is necessary than to examine at pleasure the files of newspapers, the pamphlets that issued from the press during any period of the time. And what is the inference? Why, that such writings never could have obtained circulation, had there not been an indecision in the public mind on the subject of the war, and a total change of the very feelings and sentiments with which the nation had heretofore ever been actuated.—It is with reluctance that I acknowledge this state of the public mind to have prevailed. It certainly was not sufficiently awakened to a full sense of the nature of the danger that existed, or the extent of the exertion required.—I am afraid that I shall be obliged to speak in a style not more pleasing of the means and resources which we possessed. Perhaps we have been too much in the habit of flattering ourselves on this subject on the efforts that we have made. Certainly nothing is more agreeable than to 'praise the Athenians among the Athenians;' but I rather consider it the duty of public men to speak wholesome truths. We must compare our exertions with the object. If the war was not originally just and necessary, every shilling spent was too much. If it was, as some have considered it, merely a war of experiment for a short time, to see what we could make of it, we have made too great sacrifices. If, however, it was a war for the very existence of the country, the exertions that we have made have been too little for the object, too little even for our means. That our exertions, however, had not injured us, would appear by considering whether the country has pined or thriven, whether it has become fat or lean, by its efforts. Surely, if, as some pretended, the country has been ruined by the war, it has not been thrown into a galloping consumption. I have, indeed, heard it argued, in the true spirit of Jacobinism, that, though individuals were rich, the country was poor; every distress incident to men and to the social state has been insidiously represented to be the offspring of war; as if the same distress did not exist in all wars, nay, in all times; as if it were not obvious that poverty must ever accompany great wealth; as if poverty were not a sort of secretion from that full and plethoric habit, which it is our constant endeavour to produce in this country, and our constant boast that we have produced. Indeed it is easy to shew how commercial wealth and poverty must be connected, because, in the fluctuations of trade and manufactures, numbers are occasionally deprived of their employment, and left destitute of their usual aliment, while the tide of prosperity flows into other channels. No less absurd is it to say, that the wealth with which the country abounds is in few hands, as if it were possible that a country could have much wealth while it was monopolized by a few; and as if such an opinion were not more notoriously untrue of this country than of any other. Unhappily, indeed, it seems to be thought by some, who acknowledge both the wealth and comfort which this country enjoys, that these blessings may be preserved without the aid of arms. The balance of power is treated as an idle chimera; and we are told, that from our insular situation we may look with indifference on the confusion and derangement of the continent. It is very well, indeed, to tell us to enjoy our own comforts; it is like the idle story told of some king of England, who, when informed that his subjects were dying of famine, is said to have asked, why they did not eat bread and cheese? The answer was, that they could not get bread and cheese to eat. So we are told to be satisfied with our own comforts and happiness, with our commerce, with our prosperity. Doubtless: if we can preserve them. But will the French allow us? Do we not see that France is acting upon a contest with us in peace, that she is lowering our dignity, plucking our honours? The notion that peace would hush up all our dangers, had induced us to give up to Holland the honour of the flag; which, however little important many may please to think it, kept up the pride and spirit of the service, and has been maintained by us for a century and a half. This it was also which induced us to submit to have the cockades taken out of our soldiers' hats in Portugal. We also allowed, under the same idea, our ambassador to remain at Amiens, kicking his heels near the hall of audience, as a lacquey, while Buonaparté, instead of communicating with him, set off for Lyons, designedly, as it should seem, to furnish a precedent for similar insults on any future occasion. Such being the situation and the feelings of the country, the next consideration is, what we ought now to do? On the supposition that Great Britain is at present in a state of infinitely less security than it was on the night when this treaty was signed; and comparing what it has given up with what remains to it, I have no hesitation in repeating my former assertion, that the fee simple of the country was worth more on the 30th of September last, than it has been since, or perhaps ever will be again. We have now, however, signed and sealed the bond; and, as Dogberry says,

Our study should now be to correct those fatal dissensions which the treaty of peace may create. As to India, our rights are manifest, though we depend on those same claims being renewed which were set up by France anterior to the treaty of 1783. But while our right is liable to be called into dispute, we should keep in our hands better means of asserting it than we can have after the surrender of Malta, the Cape, and Cochin. The First Consul would not, during the negotiation, have gone to Lyons, if he did not mean to produce suspicion and uneasiness with respect to the peace. The Ministers think that we talk too freely upon these subjects, and are suggesting to the enemy a renewal of their claims, as if the foolish and silly French wanted us to point out to them the nature of their claims! Have they not shewn, during the war, any designs upon India? Has not the capture of Seringapatam revealed any of their intrigues? What are we to surmise from their steadiness in insisting on the possession of Malta, the Cape of Good Hope, and Cochin? Was not the expedition to Egypt projected in the view of a triumphant march into Hindostan? And are we, like ostriches, to put our heads in a hole, and suppose ourselves perfectly safe from our pursuers, or act as persons often do in embarrassed circumstances, and submit to be ruined sooner than look at the state of their own affairs? If France means not to pursue her claims, why not send to Paris for explanations to that effect, before we give up what she never has put into our hands? A similar explanation should be required respecting the Bay of Honduras, and many other points. Let us have a fair understanding as to the extent of our danger. I know that some may be disposed to calculate the life of a nation like that of an individual; and, regardless of posterity, say, ‘though our commerce may fail in the end, it cannot do so for a long series of years, and will, at least, last during our time.’ The nation which has not more foresight or feeling than that, must inevitably perish. Great stress has been laid on what is called the failure of the predictions respecting the result of the American war. These predictions, however, have, on the contrary, been realized. Had we had America now to support us, we never could have consented to such a peace. America has been an immense resource to the enemy during the war; and the very convoy which entered France at the time of Lord Howe's victory, was thought a sufficient compensation to that country for the destruction of its fleet. Let those who think that in spite of this peace the country will still last their time, will still furnish life and heat for their ephemeral existence, for the miserable animalculæ that are crawling upon its surface, let them take care that they do not deceive themselves. They may calculate ill who suppose the misfortune may not reach them. The fate of nations often comes upon them much quicker than is imagined: in this manner is Spain, of late a rich and powerful nation, all on a sudden become one of those states which are now the vassals of France." Mr. Windham concluded with moving the address, which will be found in vol. i. p. 572.

LORD FOLKSTONE seconded the motion, and observed, that the subject had been so ably and so effectually argued by his Right Hon. Friend, that little remained for him to add to it. He however could not avoid remarking, that in this treaty not only a neglect, but a dereliction of our naval rights, was apparent, and the flag of Old England degraded. It was, therefore, impossible to approve of such a treaty: and he was unable to conceal that opinion; unable also was he to conceal, that when all other countries were supporting the faith of their ancient and respective treaties, Great Britain alone was neglectful of hers; and that when it was a first-rate principle with all other nations to respect and value, as well as to protect their allies, Great Britain alone was regardless of hers, and ungrateful to those who sacrificed even all that was dear to them as nations in hers and the general cause. We had entered into the contest under the avowed principle of asserting and protecting the rights of the House of Orange, and we basely deserted her; we in form, but not in substance, made a shew of our attention to that illustrious House, than which none ought to be more respected or valued in the eyes of this country, whose cause she early and effectually adopted and supported; and our return to her, in the hour of her necessity, is a vain and empty stipulation in words, a mere parade of notice, but nothing solid or substantial in it. In the case of Portugal, our conduct was even worse, and more ungenerous; for we were not content with neglecting and deserting her, but we committed her to the spoliation of her bitterest foes; though, in fact, it was not these foes who committed that spoliation; it was this country that tore from her Olivenza, it was this country that invaded and divided her territory of Guiana. These were circumstances that must strike every thinking mind with shame, horror, and disgust; but he feared very much that all he could say upon these topics would have little weight there. We had of late learned to appreciate the temporary advantage of commercial considerations, so much above all other interests, that little was to be hoped from a state so besotted with the avaricious sentiments of sordid wealth as we were. In the same impolitic view he beheld the surrender of Malta, and could impute it to nothing but an infatuation in the minds of Ministers, who, not content with ceding the East and the West, and the privileges of the British flag in the North, now also resign the Levant, and its best and only protector Malta, into the very hands of our ancient and mortal foe. For these reasons, he thought the treaty disgraceful and dishonourable, and the address should therefore have his most decided support.

LORD HAWKESBURY rose, and addressed the House to the following purport:—"Sir, I have listened with the utmost attention to the observations of my Right Hon. Friend: and indeed it was impossible I should not; for though some parts of his speech were very remotely, if at all connected with the question before the House, yet the ability and ingenuity that he exhibited throughout peculiarly entitled him to attention. A good deal of the speech of my Right Hon. Friend consisted in predictions as to the consequences, and assertions as to the conditions, of the peace; but I will assure him, and the Noble Lord who seconded his motion, that were the treaty such as they have described it, and I considered it as by any means injurious to the interests, but particularly if it were degrading to the dignity of the country, no man in this House, or in the empire, would be more ready to oppose it than myself, whoever the author of it might be. I however view the negotiation in quite a different light from that in which my Right Hon. Friend seems to consider it. I am of opinion, that, though some commercial questions were not finally arranged, it was better to leave those questions for a future adjustment, than longer to defer the negotiation. I maintain, that peace, under all the circumstances, was desirable, and that it would have been extremely culpable in Ministers to have declined it; but I would not be understood to insinuate that there was no other alternative for the country, or that the peace is to be considered in any point of view dishonourable. It is such as Ministers have thought it expedient and prudent to conclude, and such as the House and the country called for. I am glad that the whole of this question is at length brought before the House. I have always objected to the discussion of it in parts, because if ever there was a subject which ought to be discussed all together, it is a treaty of peace. The parts must be examined with reference to each other, and not distinctly; for though in one part something unfavourable may appear, yet that, upon a review of the whole, will perhaps turn out to be a concession, in order to obtain some advantage on another part. For these reasons have I for some days back deprecated the practice of Gentlemen in cavilling at particular provisions of this treaty; a mode of proceeding which tended to produce a false impression on the public mind, and even calculated to prepossess the judgment of the House. I cannot be, nor ever was, adverse to the discussion of this subject point by point; my desire was, that those points should be fairly and relatively taken, and not in that separate and detached way in which Gentlemen have been endeavouring to canvass it, without taking into account the causes which produced the commencement and conclusion of the negotiation, and the effect of the whole of the terms combined. This question has at length come to that species of investigation which I wished for, and in which, whether right or wrong, it ought to be taken. It seems to me properly to have divided itself into two heads: first, whether the terms of the definitive treaty were consistent with the basis of the preliminary articles; and, secondly, whether, if any departure from the preliminary articles had taken place, that, or any events which had occurred during the negotiation, were of such consequence as to induce Ministers to refuse to conclude the treaty? Before I proceed to remark on these heads, I beg leave to say a few words on the circumstances in which this country was involved at the time the negotiation was begun. To this Gentlemen seldom look, though it is evidently connected with, at least necessary to, a proper decision on the subject before the House. It will be remembered, that we were then left almost alone to contend with France; Austria obliged to comply with a peace dictated by the enemy; the German empire at her mercy; deserted by our allies except two, Portugal and Naples, neither capable of affording us any effectual aid; we saw ourselves, instead of being at the head of a formidable confederacy, menaced by a league of our old allies, under the influence and direction of France. Such was our situation; and in this dilemma peace was the wish of all persons, of all parties; with, I do admit, some exceptions, of whom, no doubt, my Right Hon. Friend was one, it was called for loudly by the country; it was pressed strongly by Gentlemen on the opposition side of the House, that some attempt should be made to negotiate. Accordingly negotiation was entered into, and announced by Ministers to the House on the first occasion afterwards. But this negotiation commenced under prospects very unfavourable, in the degraded state of Europe, after the important event of the treaty of Luneville, and when our ships were shut out from almost every port in Europe. Notwithstanding these disadvantageous appearances, Ministers were determined to sustain the honour and consequence of this country, and in their proposal to negotiate, they laid down three principles as the rule of their conduct: first, the complete integrity of the dominions of the British empire; secondly, fidelity to our allies; and, thirdly, to obtain compensation out of the conquests we had made to counterpoise the acquisitions of France on the continent. In these objects it was our firm purpose to persist, and the probability of our success in attaining them was considerably heightened by some events which gave a propitious turn to our affairs about that time, namely, the victory of the 3d of April in the Baltic, and the gallant conduct of our army in Egypt, particularly on the 19th of March, which not a little contributed to dispose the French government to peace: at all events, Ministers meant to seek compensation in the East and West Indies, as that seemed the most advisable principle. But as this subject has been so fully canvassed in the debate on the preliminaries, I shall pass it, observing, that we have annexed to our dominions two of the greatest naval stations in the East and West Indies; not that I would argue this as a proof that the peace is more or less honourable on account of this annexation; for, according to the doctrine that my Right Hon. Friend holds out, it is not an island more or less, or any conquest whatever, that will constitute the security or the advantages of peace. I doubt whether, in this view, any thing short of the total subversion of the French government would be satisfactory; but that I think must be now left entirely out of the question: that hope can scarcely exist in rational minds. I shall now proceed to examine the division of the question which relates to the events that occurred pending the negotiations. I agree with the sentiment expressed by my Right Hon. Friend (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) on a former evening, that it was impossible to view some of those events without anxiety and alarm: so much for the points themselves. But it was gravely to be considered, how far these events ought to have influenced the progress of our negotiation; or whether it would have been justifiable in Ministers, on account of those events, to break off the treaty. I am no advocate for the opinion of some persons, that we ought to be insulated in our politics as in our situation, and that we should have no concern in continental politics; nor can I subscribe to the doctrine of my Right Hon. Friend, that we are on all occasions to volunteer in continental affairs; that an interference is not, as it would seem, a matter of choice, but of obligation. This interference must at all times be determined by circumstances; whether the power aggrieved, or whose rights may be invaded, should feel any desire for our assistance, or any inclination to assert her own independence, were certainly material to be considered; otherwise an interposition would be the height of extravagance. Our connexion with the continent is relative; and when we propose to interfere in its affairs, it is but wise to consider the amount of the interest that should prompt us; if the object could be carried, what the disposition of the power immediately benefited may be; and if we should lose, what degree of injury our own country is likely to sustain. Before we engage at all in such contests, the internal situation of our own country should be taken into consideration. I believe, on a review of the circumstances of the principal transactions that took place during the negotiation, the reasons which I have stated would apply with sufficient force to dissuade any British statesman from attempting to prevent it. God forbid that we should not be influenced by obligations of honour; or that we should give up the reputation of the country, by declining to protect any power from injustice! but a strong case should be made out to persuade us to an effort attended with risk to ourselves; for the same reason which would induce an interference in favour of the Cisalpine republic, would urge us to insist upon the restoration of the Netherlands to Austria, of Holland to the Stadtholder, and of Savoy to the King of Sardinia. Even were we disposed to resist the accession of Buonaparté to the presidency of the Cisalpine republic, how could we have accomplished any thing without the aid of the continental powers? And how did the case stand? Buonaparté's newly acquired power was scarcely announced when the cabinet of Berlin congratulated him, that of Vienna acquiesced, and Russia shewed no symptom of dissatisfaction. Would it then be considered wise or prudent in us alone to renew the war in consequence of this event? He would put the question to any Gentleman in the House, whether the value of the object would even excuse such a resolution? Another event which is supposed to have changed the nature of our negotiation, is the cession of Louisiana to France. On this point, I would beg to call the attention of the House, that I do not mean to consider it an indifferent object; but it will be recollected, that Louisiana is an old French settlement, and that during the negotiation of the peace of 1763, which was generally thought the most triumphant peace this country had ever concluded, this settlement was privately transferred by France to Spain; and that transaction was much more gross than that now complained of, because Louisiana was referred to expressly in the treaty of 1763. As to the political advantages which France could derive from this possession, I doubt whether they can be of much consequence; but I have little doubt that they are not of such consequence as to have justified Ministers in rejecting the peace. Gentlemen have said a great deal of the influence which this possession threatens to give France over the United States of America.

To this I shall mention, that it has been the policy of America, since its separation from this country, to keep an equal balance between France and us. Such was the system of General Washington, and such is the system of the ablest statesmen in America at the present day. The probability therefore is, that the possession of Louisiana, by placing the French upon the back of America, every maxim of sound policy, will incline her to cultivate a more intimate connexion with this country; but my Right Hon. Friend apprehends that France would be enabled, through this settlement, to swallow up America; he very much underestimates the power, population, and spirit of the United States; for he should remember what efforts the Americans made, and with success too, alone and unaided, in the war of 1756, to resist the French, who were then in possession of Canada and Louisiana. When, therefore, the increase of American power since that period is considered, though the possession of Louisiana by the French may now be an object to excite their jealousy and caution, it by no means endangers the independence of the Americans.—With respect to the definitive treaty, Gentlemen complain of it on two grounds, namely, for faults of omission and commission. Under the first class, the principal is the non-revival of the several commercial and political treaties, and two particular conventions. As to the first, I should suppose, if Gentlemen would look into those treaties, they would not be so very solicitous for their revival. From the treaty of Westphalia, up to that of 1763, it was the practice, as the system of Europe was perpetually changing, to renew former treaties, with such alterations and additions as suited existing circumstances, until at length those treaties became so confused, inconsistent, and contradictory, as to contribute more to augment litigation than to produce the adjustment of any difference. If we made any engagements, they should be precise and explicit, not such as those treaties; besides, we ought to be cautious how we should consent to multiply our engagements. Another objection that I have to the renewal of those treaties is, that we should bind ourselves too much. I shall state the former practice as to such renewal of treaties. In 1748, when we guarantied the Pragmatic Sanction, we also guarantied Silesia to Prussia: what then, if, agreeable to such a precedent, we should have to guaranty the Netherlands and Sardinia to France? I would ask my Right Hon. Friend, whether this was not a sufficiently strong objection to the renewal of former treaties? The situation of Ministers in this case was one of extreme difficulty; they were rather willing to sacrifice some advantages than place themselves in the dilemma that I have described; and they determined, if they could not get Europe to do right, they would not be a party to her wrong. I would ask my Right Hon. Friend, whether the renewal of political treaties, accompanied by such consequences, was so desirable as would make us a party in the confirmation of the aggrandizement of France, and involve us in infinite difficulty? As to commercial treaties, if any person looked into them, they would be found not less objectionable than the former. Our treaty with Holland gave the Dutch the power of carrying warlike stores even in time of war to an enemy's ports: would it be advisable, after the experience of the last war, to renew such a treaty as that? Objections equally strong would be found to operate against the renewal of our former treaties with France. From these considerations I think it will scarcely be disputed that it was better to leave commercial arrangements to be hereafter adjusted, than to postpone the conclusion of the definitive treaty, even if the country was to be left in the state it was in before the preliminaries were signed. I contend that the inconvenience to our trade cannot be so great as Gentlemen profess to fear, because, under all the obstacles of the war, our manufactures found their way into all parts of Europe; and no prohibition that can be imposed during peace, however so severe or rigorously enforced, can put a stop to that intercourse. If any such interruption should be given to our commerce by the French government, it must be a matter of regret; but the extension of our resources, and command in the markets, it is not in the power of France or any other nation to prevent. If it is to be a war of duties, we are more than equal to meet France; for her articles of commerce are few, ours are numerous; the exclusion of her brandy and wine would severely operate against her; and we could do without these liquors, but France cannot do without the productions of our manufactures; for they are there articles of the first necessity. With regard to the East Indies, and the allusions to the stipulation in the treaty with the Dutch, respecting our flag and that of Holland, I shall say, as to the flag, it seems to be completely misunderstood by Gentlemen. It is known that we have always claimed a right to superiority in the narrow seas of India, though we have scarcely ever insisted on it, except with regard to the Dutch, with whom we once disputed the right; and therefore in a treaty of peace, a stipulation was introduced relative to the exercise of that right; and in every other treaty since, this stipulation has been renewed; but it is not by any means tantamount to a renunciation of the right which we claim, not only with respect to Holland, but as to every other power. Gentlemen seem also to misconceive the nature of our right to cut logwood, &c. in the Bay of Honduras. The fact is, that right was ceded to us by the Spaniards in 1787, in return for some lands that we gave them on the Musquito Shore; therefore it is a settlement which we possess of right, and to which the Spaniards were as much bound to refer in the treaty as we were: it was, in truth, on our part no omission. Gentlemen pointed their animadversions at the difference which they alleged to exist between the preliminaries and the definitive treaty, which they stated to consist in these five points; as to prisoners, Portugal, Newfoundland, the Cape of Good Hope, and Malta. In these are comprised what are called the faults of commission. As to the first, though the Right Hon. Gentleman has made no allusion to it on this day, yet on a former occasion he remarked upon it so much at length, that I cannot forbear to make some observations upon it now. The state of the question is this: in the treaty of 1763 an article was inserted, that every belligerent power should maintain its own prisoners; and that article was again renewed in the peace of 1783; it is an article which humanity and justice approve, and is sanctioned by the best modern authors on the law of nations, among whom is Vattel: but the French disputed this principle with us in the late negotiation; alleging, that they did not grant it to any of the other powers with which they had concluded peace. When, therefore, they afterwards acceded to this principle, we could not claim a modification of it in our own favour, by refusing to allow a deduction for the subsistence of the Russian prisoners who were soldiers in our pay, and under our disposal when made prisoners." On the subject of Portugal, the Noble Lord went over the grounds already so often stated; adding, "Some time after I came into office, it was thought by Ministers that the Portuguese might make a much firmer stand than they did against France and Spain; and it was determined to send advice to Portugal, as to the means of resistance; and I have no hesitation in saying, that one part of that advice was, to place a more able officer at the head of their army; an advice not dictated by any disrespect to the officer then commanding, but merely because from his age he was deemed incapable. This advice, however, was not attended to; had it been, it was intended to follow it up with some succours; but Ministers would have been culpable if they had committed any part of the British army to the care of an incapable commander. Notwithstanding this conduct of Portugal, Ministers took means to communicate to her the progress we were making in negotiation, and the prospects that we had, exhorting her to hold out as long as possible, that she might obtain better terms; yet she concluded a separate peace. We afterwards stepped in, and by our interference reduced the extent of the cessions that she had herself agreed to make in Guiana; an instance of liberality scarcely to be paralleled. We so arranged it for her, that her navigation of the river Amazon is perfectly secured, and not at all exposed to that interruption from the possessions which the French had obtained by the treaty, that Gentlemen on a former evening so strenuously maintained, upon the authority of a map not quite so accurate as they have been taught to believe. As to the third point of difference, Newfoundland: no concession was made to France in that article; the arrangement is precisely as it stood before the war, therefore no animadversion has been made on it. The Cape of Good Hope, which forms the fourth point, has called forth many observations; but if Gentlemen would more attentively compare the terms of the preliminary and the definitive treaties, they would see that the Cape was to be surrendered, in full sovereignty, to the Dutch, and that there is no material difference between the two treaties on this head. In the opinion of persons best qualified to judge of the Cape, it was thought more advisable to give it up thus to the Dutch, than to make it an entrepôt in the hands of any other power. Gentlemen dwell upon Malta as the fifth point of difference. As to that I shall say, that whether the arrangement of that island be as good a one as could be contrived or not, it is as good a one as circumstances permit. Gentlemen could not expect that we should retain it ourselves; for, when we blockaded it, we issued a declaration, that it was not our intention to retain, but to restore it to the Order of St. John, under certain regulations. The first object of those regulations was to ameliorate the condition of the Maltese, and at this Gentlemen seem to level their principal hostility; they are averse to the privileges granted to the inhabitants; they do not seem to think of the important point we have gained, in the abolition of the three French langues, which had much domineering influence in that island, leaving only the Russian langue, and creating a Maltese langue. Gentlemen would not be so disturbed at the creation of this langue, or at the privileges given to the natives, if they would recollect the conduct of those natives during the siege, when under a British officer they were so active in their exertions to annoy the French, and to second our views: surely such men were entitled to our peculiar protection, and had some claim to be relieved from the oppression to which they were liable under the ancient constitution. Is it not of consequence to the security of the island to conciliate the population to the Order, and thus enable that Order to establish a formidable militia for its defence? A power to guaranty it, with a view to preserve it from the dominion of France, was also chosen; that guarantee was, in fact, first offered to Russia; but such is the change in the politics of courts, that Russia refused; and it was therefore put under the protection of Naples, a country which has the deepest interest, from the contiguity of the island of Sicily, to take care that Malta should not fall into the hands of France. This is not all; we have the guarantee of Austria and the principal powers of Europe, for the independence of this island. Under all the circumstances, I think there is no real departure in the definitive treaty from the basis of the preliminary articles; and I also think that no event which occurred in the interim could excuse a departure from the negotiation. From the language of Gentlemen, they seem to fear that we have lost all by the peace; but I am decidedly of opinion, that we never stood at the conclusion of any treaty of peace in so good a relative situation to France as at present. I do not mean to say, that any acquisitions or commercial advantages that we have made, or could make by any peace, could be a compensation for the terrible consequences of war; or that the prospect of any farther acquisitions should induce us to prosecute hostilities, for we were fatigued with the contest; not so as to shrink from it if indispensably necessary, because we felt that our resources were perfectly adequate to any occasion: but was it not wiser to foster these resources, to promote our trade and navigation, and hold ourselves always ready to maintain the importance, dignity, and interests of the empire? It has been said on a former day, that we should have endeavoured to secure a port in the Mediterranean, for the advantage of our trade; but the House must be aware that Holland, while it had the most important trade in the Levant, never had a port in the Mediterranean. In that trade they were enabled to exceed us, in consequence of certain injudicious regulations as to quarantine, which Parliament abolished about two years ago, but which, while existing, gave to the Dutch the opportunity of underselling us in all the northern ports. It is rather singular, while Gentlemen speak so much of Louisiana and other comparatively unimportant additions to French power, that they never allude to our conquest of the Mysore; the destruction of that power which was the staunch ally of France, and the inveterate restless enemy of this country. What is our relative situation to France in the East Indies? Who will answer by attempting a comparison? and is not our situation in the West almost equally superior? Our islands almost trebled in produce during the war, with the addition of one of the most fertile islands in the West Indies, containing a most capacious harbour, and forming the first naval depôt in that quarter. What a monopoly of all the European markets for West India produce do we not possess! and when are we to expect any rivalry from France, whose principal colony, St. Domingo, is in such a distracted state, that, whatever may be the event of the war in that island, it must be left little better than a waste? It will be recollected, that the returns of France from the West India trade were no less before the war than eight millions annually, and that she derived from this source a considerable balance of trade in her favour; but what are her prospects now? Indeed, if the naval and commercial means of the two countries be duly compared after the events of the war, the power of France will in most respects appear more specious than solid, while ours will be found solid and safe, and supplied moreover with the means of extending itself by the extent of our capital." France (his Lordship went on to say) possessed no such means; and, in his opinion, it was better to possess more capital and less territory. For the extended dominion of France was liable to fall to pieces; its extent was matter of weakness, and the multiplicity of her objects must frustrate their accomplishment. The comparative superiority of our resources, when our superior capital was attended to, could not therefore be denied. But what was our security for the enjoyment of these advantages? This question he might answer by saying, that, under all the circumstances of our situation, we had made an honourable peace, a peace that secured all the vital springs of our strength and power. He was ready, however, to confess that the state of the world was such as could not prevent us from considering the peace as insecure; but all history, and even his own experience, taught him that the apprehension of that insecurity should be no obstacle to the conclusion of peace, when peace could be concluded on honourable terms. When a good one was within our reach, we ought to seize it, though we might not be confident of its permanent enjoyment. Here the Noble Lord referred to the peace of Ryswick; which, though deemed by King William insecure, and not so advantageous as might be expected, was, notwithstanding, deemed by that wise Prince such as should not be rashly rejected. He wished Gentlemen would bear in their recollection the speech of King William to his Parliament on that great occasion, and they would there find the sentiments which they should now entertain; they would see that it would be for them not to permit the enemy to do that in peace which they were not able to effect in war. He did not pretend to say that the security of peace was no consideration; all he should ask was, could a better peace have been secured, had the contest been protracted longer? If not, was it not better to take the chance of it, such as it could be obtained, under all the circumstances of our situation? In acceding to that peace, there was another motive which weighed heavily with him, and which, no doubt, must have had great weight with the House: he meant the internal state of France. France had now abandoned the principles and maxims of the revolution, and was rapidly reverting to the ancient principles of religion and civil order. The current ran that way; and would it be wise, by renewing the contest, to replunge her in all the horrors from which she had so lately emerged, and which threatened to agitate the rest of the world? Much had been said of the ambition of France, and of the views of her present rulers; but the ambition of France was the ambition of the French people, and was the same under the monarchy as under her present form of government. Neither view should make us hesitate respecting the eligibility of a peace which enabled us to escape out of a disturbed state of things, with our financial system and all our resources entire. It was not merely an alleviation of their burdens that the people languished for; but they were anxious for peace, because their patience was worn out by the war: they sighed for the termination of a struggle which had lasted nine years, and which they were reluctant to continue without any definite object. If our interests remained entire, if our honour was preserved, for what purpose should the war have been longer persisted in? He would not waste the time of the House in dwelling longer upon this topic; but as a day had been appointed, and a motion made for taking the treaty into consideration, he did not think the House should separate without coming to an opinion upon it. Of those who thought the peace dishonourable, that it affected our vital interests, and left us in a state of doubt and insecurity, he could not expect the support: but he was as confident, that those who thought our honour had been preserved; that the terms on which peace had been concluded were as good as, under all the circumstances of our situation, could have been expected; and that a peace which left our resources entire should be adhered to, that they might be husbanded for vigorous resistance against any future encroachment, would vote for the amendment which he should have the honour now to propose. He then moved the amendment in vol. i. p. 587.

Mr. T. GRENVILLE rose to make a few observations on the reply of the Noble Lord to the speech of his Right Hon. Friend; but he must first complain of the manner in which the reasonings of his Right Hon. Friend had been misunderstood or exaggerated. The Noble Lord seemed to rest the whole of his defence on the merits of the definitive treaty; yet at the conclusion of his speech he entered into a justification of it, and owned that the people were worn out with the war, and clamoured for peace. In this he was not prepared to acquiesce; for the spirit of the people was more alive to their liberty and independence, even in the latest period of the war, and they continued to think it necessary up to the very signing of the preliminaries; he could not, therefore, bear it said that their patience was worn out by the contest. Another mode of exaggeration which had been employed by the Noble Lord (Hawkesbury) was such as he could not pass over. That Noble Person had asked, whether no peace was to be accepted, and whether no terms could be endured by his opponents? He had pushed this unfair mode of arguing still further; for he had asked, whether the war should have been continued for Malta, for Louisiana, or for the Italian republic, as consolidated by Buonaparté with that of France?

"I am not of those," said Mr. Grenville, "who would have objected to any terms. About two years since I was deputed by the then Administration to negotiate a peace; and I certainly should not have accepted of the mission, if I had not been inclined to negotiate on honourable and safe terms." He thought it, however, unfair to put the question of peace or war on the ground of each individual sacrifice made by this country; and particularly as in the affair of the Italian republic, where an enormous addition was to be superadded to the sacrifices already made. He would much rather argue the question on this broad and general ground: "Will you suffer the enemy to do you that mischief in time of peace, which they could not effect in time of war?"

We had given up the Netherlands; we had lost sight of Holland; and yet the argument was now so managed as if the evil was cured, instead of being increased by the mass of cessions. He was not for going to war again for any one of these, or for the whole of them; but he must desire, that, considered as a whole, they should not be kept entirely out of the question. He could not, for instance, but notice the accession of weight and influence which France had received by the ceding of Louisiana. This was a matter settled in a secret convention, and kept wholly out of view when the limits of French Guiana were debated, on a view of the preliminaries. Did Ministers conceal, or were they aware at that time of this convention? This was a subject on which an explanation was due to the House. They had been told, it was true, that there was in this part no naval station; but he must ask, whether this cession did not command the two Floridas? and whether, in the case of a new war, the cession of the one was not, in point of fact, a cession of the whole? This question he had pressed before, but unfortunately he had pressed it without effect. On the island of Elba he should not offer one syllable, because that question had already been debated. The Ministers had exulted in the non-renewal of treaties, considering their renewal as a matter which was fraught with danger, doubt, and insecurity. They had rejoiced in this as if they had been sent on a voyage of discovery, abandoning the beaten track of all their predecessors. These treaties, however, he must observe, had often replaced the security, and fixed the boundaries of disturbed Europe. There were difficulties, no doubt, in this instance, arising from the new limits of the Rhine and the cession of the Netherlands. But these difficulties could not be admitted to supersede the advantages arising from the renewal and recognition of former treaties. He would admit that our late enemy was not easily to be bound or debarred by treaties of this description from the objects of his ambition; but he was not prepared to accede to the statement of a Noble Lord last night, that these treaties were only worth so much waste paper. It was said by some persons, that we should sanction the ambitious projects and attainments of France, by entering specifically into those treaties. It was to be recollected, however, that Buonaparté, pending the congress of Amiens, had set out on his mysterious journey to Lyons. We afterwards knew, and of course lent an implied sanction to the object of this journey; for, though not expressly described, our recognition, when the matter was fully known, was not the less given to the establishment of the Italian republic. A difference, he was aware, had been laid down between all treaties considered as commercial and political. He was convinced that we could not renew a treaty which had expired, or enforce one which was not agreeable; and such, no doubt, was the case with the commercial treaty made with France in 1787. This, however, did not imply or sanction the exclusion of any treaty whatsoever. With respect to India, it was contended, that all *firman*s of the native powers, as well as our own treaties, were cancelled by the war, and that we stood on the distinct claim of our sovereignty. But we pronounced in our own right, without considering what was the opinion of France with respect to claims which, in the late treaty, she had not recognised. A Right Hon. Gentleman (Mr. Dundas) condemning, for the first time, the treaty of peace in 1783, had said, that he was equally happy to get rid of the poison of that treaty, and of its antidote, administered in 1787. This opinion was evidently changed, when the same Right Hon. Gentleman gave his assent to the treaty of Lisle in 1796. Mr. Grenville then proceeded to remark on our exclusion from the cutting of logwood in the Bay of Honduras, the access to which was assured by former treaties with Spain, which now were all extinguished, and the advantages of which would be but ill repaid by a return to the Musquito Shore, now a shore without settlements. On all these occasions he was for a limited right, settled by a convention, rather than for a general, and perhaps an unadmitted claim. He next proceeded to notice the situation of the House of Orange, whose claims had been loosely passed over in the definitive treaty, and to which we had taken no one step to discharge our obligations. By a separate convention, it was in fact determined that that House should not have one stiver of compensation which was not to be drawn from this country. On the relinquishment of the honour usually paid to our flag by Holland, also, the Hon. Gentleman severely animadverted. He then observed on the article by which the payment of the debt due for the maintenance of prisoners is regulated. The House were told, that the Russian troops, being not merely under pay, but subject to our control, ought to be considered in the same light as the native troops of this country. But was this really the fact? It certainly was not. The Russian troops, who were fed, clothed, and arrayed at our expense, were so far from being destined to the service of this country, that they were to be employed to act offensively against us. The French government had succeeded in detaching the Emperor of Russia from our friendship; and this was the boon which they presented to gratify their capricious ally. On the subject of the article respecting Portugal, the Noble Lord had said there was no deviation from the preliminaries of peace, by which the integrity of her territory is secured. Yes, this integrity had been a ground of stipulation; but of what description was the integrity which was secured? Was it the integrity of possessions as they existed antecedent to the war? No, said the Noble Lord; but Portugal had obtained an integrity of possession, which, when the matter came to be investigated, turned out to be a mere definition of limits. He would not entertain the House by entering into any geographical statements; but he could not avoid making one remark with regard to these limits. The Noble Lord talked of a distance of fifty miles established by the new limits which had been fixed from the river of the Amazons. How such a distance could exist, he was quite at a loss to conceive, when he reflected that the Arawari flowed into that very river. While he was on this subject, he wished to say a few words on the obligations of this country to procure for Portugal, not an integrity of the kind now described, but integrity of a substantial kind. He was not disposed to question the policy of the late Administration, in preferring the expedition to Egypt to the defence of Portugal. But what was the inference to be drawn from this arrangement? It was, that if we did not grant an old and faithful ally assistance, in a moment of difficulty and danger, we were bound by every consideration of public faith, to take care that her interests should not suffer from our preferring other objects to that of affording her protection against an enemy who had attacked her independence. This was the conduct which good faith clearly dictated; and he was amazed to hear the language of the Noble Lord in justification of the vague provision which the definitive treaty had made to secure this object. What was the natural effect of even a dereliction of the interests of our ally? It was, to estrange Portugal from our interests, and to create a spirit of hostility to a power by whom her interests had been so grossly neglected. On the article relative to the Cape, he had only one observation to make: and that was, that, by the arrangement which had been agreed upon, the Dutch might make it a free port; and thus we might lose all the advantages of the arrangement previously established by the treaty. He next touched on Malta, the regulations respecting which he censured in very severe terms. In the preliminaries, Malta was made independent; but it now appeared that this declaration of independence had been made while Ministers were ignorant of the arrangements by which this independence was fixed. The Order was to be restored: but how was the restoration of an Order to be effected, all of whose funds were lost, gone, and dispersed? From an average of ten years previous to 1798, it appeared that 130,000*l.* constituted the whole annual revenue. To the three French langues 58,000*l.* formerly belonged, the whole of which was confiscated. The whole of the revenues of the Spanish langue consisted of 27,000*l.* and this sum was also confiscated; or if the appropriation had not already taken place, it was likely to do so at no very remote period. After estimating other losses in Germany, Poland, and Bavaria, the total of the provinces left did not much exceed 23,000*l.* a year; and this was the sum allotted for the support of the Order to be restored. What, on the other hand, was the amount of the expense annually incurred on an average of ten years? It was not less than 130,000*l.*; to cover which, the sum he had just stated was allotted. So much he thought it necessary to state respecting the funds then existing for the support of the Order. The island was declared to be independent under the protection of a third power. He might first of all be permitted to ask, Was the King of Naples, by whom this protection was to be afforded, himself independent? Was he not, on the contrary, totally dependant on the power of France? To remedy this defect, however, and to secure this independence, the House was called upon to consider the powerful guarantees which had been established. On a former occasion the Noble Lord had stated, that the accession of some of these powers to this arrangement had not been received. But, admitting that they would accede, what was the consequence? France was the guarantying power nearest in situation to the island whose independence was to be secured. From the new constitution given to the Order, and the establishment of a new langue, tumults and broils might arise in the island. France, as an amicable guarantying power, might immediately interfere; a squadron might sail from Toulon, and take possession of the island before the design was suspected; and it was not easy to say what new changes would be introduced before these troubles were quelled. The Hon. Gentleman concluded with saying, that the original address had his cordial approbation.

Mr. DUNDAS took this opportunity of noticing some misrepresentations of what he (Mr. Dundas) had said last night. A Right Hon. Gentleman alleged that he (Mr. Dundas) had applied his observations to the convention of 1787, as containing evil provisions, which we ought not to renew. He had done no such thing. His argument was this, and he begged leave now to repeat it: that the merit of the convention of 1787 depended solely upon this, that it applied an antidote to the poison of the treaty of 1783; the meaning of which was, that the convention of 1787 had the merit of counteracting the treaty of 1783; but he had not said, that either the one or the other of them was the foundation of the prosperity of India. He thought it necessary to explain this, which seemed to have been misconstrued by the Right Hon. Gentleman: but this was not the main purpose for which he rose to-night to ask the attention of the House. He rose to make an observation or two which were very material. The Hon. Gentleman had put it to him, how he reconciled his conduct in assenting to the negotiation at Lisle, by which the provisions of the convention of 1787 were stipulated to be assented to on our part? His answer to this was a very short and a very plain one, and he hoped it would be a very satisfactory one. It was this: that since the year 1797 the condition of this country in India was changed most materially; and that which might have been offered in 1797, and was offered then, might have been, and would have been, improper on our part in 1802, because our situation in India had been most materially changed in that time. In 1797 we had not what we now possessed, namely, the undoubted sovereignty of India; and therefore, whatever opinion he had in 1797, he was perfectly warranted in changing that opinion in the present instance; for in the one case we were warranted in demanding more than in the other; and he was only desirous of our availing ourselves of the advantage which we now possessed. In 1797 we had no such advantage; there was, therefore, no real difference in his conduct: in both instances he had been desirous that this country should have the best possible terms of security for its tranquillity in India. Did the Right Hon. Gentleman mean to make it matter of reproach to him, that he had changed his opinion as to our situation in India upon a change of circumstances there? Did he mean to say, that, although he could discover a material change of circumstances in our situation, yet there was to be no change in his opinion as to the conduct which we were to pursue? Did he mean to urge it as a fault in him, that he had, upon an attentive perusal of documents, from 1763 down to the present period, become of opinion that our sovereignty in India was now entire? and, as he was of opinion that we were better off in this respect by not renewing any treaty than if we had renewed any of them, that he should endeavour to impress that opinion on the House? He believed that the Noble Person who had been alluded to (Lord Grenville) stated an opinion much as he had done, on the ground of our sovereignty in India, and that he had changed the opinion he had first entertained on this subject. This he learnt from the common vehicles by which the opinions of public men were conveyed to the public. But he would leave this part of the question, and take the liberty of saying a few words with regard to the question now before the House. When he heard of the signature of the preliminaries of peace, he was at a distant part of this island; he had no hesitation in saying, that when he heard of the manner in which the Cape of Good Hope was to be disposed of, he heard it with regret and sorrow. He had always considered that place as a great acquisition to this country. He was of that opinion in theory before we had it; he was confirmed in that opinion by experience of the use of it since it was in our possession. He looked upon it as a good depôt, and a place for the reception of our troops when we had occasion to send them to India; by their being landed and refreshed there, they went to India full of health and vigour, and were in every respect fit for immediate service. It helped us in the course of our immense fleets on their way to India. These were advantages that we had experienced. He looked upon the Cape and Ceylon as our two great bulwarks, and at no period of his life had he been of another opinion on this subject. No connexion, however close; no friendship, however cordial; no attachment, however sincere, should induce him to withhold his opinion upon this subject. That opinion was, that the Cape of Good Hope should not have been given up by this country; and he was ready to confess, however unwelcome it might be in that House, or unpopular in the country, that, had he been in administration, nothing should have induced him to be a party in agreeing to a peace upon any terms by which this country was to abandon the Cape of Good Hope. He felt this sentiment still the more strongly on account of the connexion that was now established between France and Batavia. He considered the Cape of Good Hope as almost invaluable to us, as a place of safe reception to us between Asia and Europe; but, although this was his opinion, yet he did not hold it to be any part of his duty to join those who took so much pains to render the peace an object of disapprobation with the people of this country: he saw no good that was likely to arise out of that conduct; neither did he think it was proper to cavil too much at that part of the exercise of the prerogative of the Crown, although it was done of course under the advice of Ministers. With regard to Malta, he considered it also as a place of great value, on account of the communication it had between the Mediterranean and the Levant. It was one of the finest ports in the world. It was in a commercial view most important for us to retain; but it was not in a commercial view that he felt the full importance of this place. He felt its value much more on account of the effect it would have on surrounding nations, to see the flag of Great Britain hoisted as an assurance to all who passed it, of the protection of the British arms, should they chance to stand in need of it; and when he came to add to this the desire of the Maltese to continue under our protection, he was the more induced to express his regret that this place had been given up. He had therefore no difficulty in saying, that, under all the circumstances, he could not have assented to the giving up of either of these places, had he been in administration. But now for the immediate question before the House. He could not agree to the address moved by his Right Hon. Friend, because it commenced with an invective against the peace. He saw no good likely to arise to this country from that course of proceeding. In the year 1783, when a peace was made, after it was admitted to be necessary on all hands, yet that peace was afterwards made use of by parties in that and the other House of Parliament, as an organ to destroy the Administration who made it. He did not like the purpose for which the parties then decried that peace: as little did he like the course which was taken now, which he could not help regarding as a CONSPIRACY for the purpose of supplanting the present Ministry. He had stated the points in the present case in which he did not concur: but he desired to be understood as not being a party to any such confederacy. He agreed, on the whole, with the amendment; and had it not been moved, probably he should have moved some amendment himself. The first address, if agreed to, he apprehended might do mischief. He approved of the amendment, because the general tendency of it was only to approve of carrying into effect the definitive treaty; because it was founded on the basis of the preliminary treaty, which had already been approved of by the two Houses of Parliament.

Mr. GRENVILLE, in explanation, vindicated his Noble Relative (Lord Grenville) from the charge of having expressed a doubt on the right of our sovereignty in India. The Hon. Member was called to order; but he was suffered to proceed, and in the course of his observation he declared, that the Noble Lord alluded to had, on the contrary, uniformly declared that our right was indisputable.

GENERAL GASCOYNE, seeing many Gentlemen desirous to deliver their sentiments, and considering the lateness of the hour (two o'clock), moved that the House should adjourn till to-morrow.

The question of adjournment being put from the Chair,

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said, his own feeling was in favour of a decision before the House should part. It was the interest of the country also, that no delay should take place. On the other hand, he was extremely desirous that the subject should have a full investigation. If, then, there were so many Gentlemen desirous to deliver their sentiments, the propriety of giving an opportunity to say every thing that could be said upon the subject was such, that he thought every feeling of his own, and the public consideration, should give way. He hoped, however, the numbers inclined to speak were not so great as to prevent the House from proceeding in the debate.

Mr. PITT observed, that if any considerable number of persons on the one side or the other were desirous of promoting and co-operating in a more minute inquiry, and of giving more material information on a subject of so much importance, he should feel no difficulty in saying that he was ready to accede to the motion of adjournment. But for himself he could assure the House that he was PERFECTLY SATISFIED with the tone and spirit of the address, as it was amended, as well as with the arguments so ably and successfully used by his Noble Friend. In favour, therefore, of the amendment, he should have contented himself with giving a silent vote. There was, when he reviewed what had already fallen in the course of the debate, no prospect of any new arguments which might be supposed capable of making any serious impression on the minds of Gentlemen, and of changing their opinions as they existed on either side. His Noble Friend had made but one speech, and those who disapproved of the peace had delivered three or four speeches, with all the benefit of a peroration and a summary. As he saw no probability that any additional arguments of importance would be thrown out in the course of further investigation, he should therefore press the immediate decision on the amendment.

Mr. GREY said, that, however he might be disposed to vote against the address, he was less inclined to oppose the amendment; for, though he could not help thinking that the dangers of the country were greater by the definitive treaty than by the preliminary articles, yet he was convinced upon the whole that his Majesty was well advised to put an end to the contest, even on those terms, rather than continue the war. It was difficult to reconcile the conduct of the Right Hon. Gentleman opposite to him (Mr. Dundas), who was ready to concur in applauding the wisdom of the treaty, yet strongly arraigned that wisdom, inasmuch as it had sanctioned measures to which he himself would not have acceded, the cession of the Cape of Good Hope and of Malta. The war, he was convinced, had failed in all its objects; our successes, however signal, had been separate, and their great end had been consequently defeated.

The House then divided—For an adjournment 187; against it 135;—majority 52.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, MAY 14TH, 1802.

The adjourned debate was the order of the day.

MR. SPEAKER having read the address proposed by Mr. Windham, and the amendment moved by Lord Hawkesbury;

Sir W. YOUNG said, that if it had not been for the adjournment of the debate, he should probably have delivered his opinion upon the subject: after the very comprehensive view that had been taken of the question by the Movers of the address and of the amendment, he could not have expected, at a late hour in the night, to have fixed the attention of the House to the observations he had to offer. As to the views of the Right Hon. Gentleman who moved the address, they were beyond all question derived from patriotic principles, and a sense of the public duty that he owed to his country; nor could he bear to hear it said, that his speech had a factious tendency, or that there was any design in that Right Hon. Gentleman of taking the public opinion by surprise; he was so long connected with that Gentleman, and many of those who agreed with him in opinion, that he could say that their motives were the same as his, not proceeding from a factious spirit of opposition, but a deep felt sense of public duty. The Noble Lord (Hawkesbury) had said, that the peace was to be considered as a whole; he and his friends thought it impossible well to consider a whole, without attentively observing the parts which formed that whole, and the quality of the materials of which it was composed. If the address moved by his Right Hon. Friend, produced no other effect than the amendment proposed by the Noble Lord, still he should consider that it had not altogether failed in beneficial consequence; for, although he preferred the original address, still he was glad to see such a document come from the hands of his Majesty's Ministers as the amended address, for the amended address seemed to confess what the original address proclaimed; the object of the original address being to call the country to a sense of her danger, to shew her the precipice on which she stood, and the means of her salvation. As to the difference between the preliminaries and the definitive treaty, he should first advert to the observations that had been made last night respecting Malta. It had been said, that the treaty gave a preponderance to the Maltese langue; they were to fill at least half the offices of the state, and might be expected to form a sufficient militia for the protection of that island. Gentlemen who held that language seemed little acquainted with the island of Malta or its inhabitants; he had himself resided there for ten weeks, and had better opportunities of being acquainted with the subject. In the whole island of Malta there were not five men who could be called merchants; and could it be expected that an Order which valued itself on its high nobility, could associate with persons of the description of gold-workers and sellers of coral in the administration of the island? If a few could so far degrade themselves, their votes would be lost in the opinion of the majority; and the island of Malta would then, instead of being restored to the Order of St. John of Jerusalem, be in fact given up to the democracy of the Maltese. That this would be the consequence was still further apparent from this circumstance, that the noble knights of the other langues seldom visit the island; and therefore the management of its affairs, and all the influence attending it, must fall into the hands of the Maltese langue, which would soon be such a democracy as he had represented. Another important part was, the cession of Louisiana from Spain to France, directly in the teeth of the stipulations of the treaty of Utrecht, and many other treaties, wherein this country (properly jealous of the increasing connexion between France and Spain, and the ascendancy the former power was gaining) bargained that Spain should not cede any part of her empire to France. He differed from the Noble Lord in his opinion respecting the value of Louisiana; he thought that, both from its real value and its situation, hanging over Mexico, it was a most important acquisition to France. The probable re-conquest of St. Domingo by the French was in his view of things a subject of much danger to our West India possessions; he should think them far safer, were St. Domingo to be a negro republic, than to have the whole of that large and most fertile island in the hands of France. At present France would require a very large army there, to conquer it, and to maintain its conquest; but it must be recollected, that when peace should be restored, the army which they will always keep up in the island, and which we cannot prevent them from keeping up, will always (in case of a dispute between this country and France) be sufficiently strong to threaten the existence of all our settlements in the West Indies. The absolute value of St. Domingo to France is incalculable; the French part alone was formerly worth all our settlements in the West Indies, and employed above 700 heavy ships in its trade. Now that the whole island is in the hands of France, much more commerce and colonial productions must be expected from it, and a new nursery of seamen is opened for the French navy. Besides the danger that impended over our own West India settlements, the dangerous situation of Mexico was also to be considered, which now lay in a manner at the foot of France. When France is in possession of St. Domingo and Louisiana, if a dispute should arise with Spain, and the French standard were unfurled, and pointed to Mexico, what myriads of adventurers would join it, in hopes of exchanging the iron of the North for the gold of Mexico! The conquest of Mexico would present no difficulties to France; she can have it now whenever she will. Such are the incalculably valuable acquisitions that France has obtained by the peace, in the West Indies. In Europe, and in every quarter of the world, she has exhibited the same spirit of adventure and desire of aggrandizement. She has possessed herself of the Italian republic, and the island of Elba. Were Gentlemen so little read in the history of the great military republics, as to be unaware of the enterprising spirit and aspiring genius of those men who guided their deliberations in council and their operations in the field? With such men the history of the French revolution, and of the late operations of the French army, abounded. Of such men the world must be at this day aware; France has great numbers, possessing adequate genius, and a spirit of enterprise, prompt to embark in any of those projects most competent to promote her interests, her prosperity, her power, and aggrandizement, not only in those new territorial acquisitions which she has secured in Europe, but in those new and important territories ceded to her in the West by Spain and Portugal, and thrown open to France such a field of new enterprise in the bosom of America as opens exhaustless resources of wealth and commerce. Was it then to be rationally supposed that France would fail to benefit of this new vantage-ground, on which she now stood; or that she would not, so soon as her strength and resources were at the proper pitch, pour destruction, military and commercial, upon all the powers by which she is surrounded? It had been said that capital was a tyrannic power, which could at all times secure monopoly, and defeat every attempt to meet it by any other principle in the field of commerce. Such was the boasted power of British capital; but even those who used that argument, were aware that persevering industry was the source of capital; that, by the advantageous cessions of territory in every quarter of the globe, which France had obtained by this treaty, she had acquired ample means for the employment of her industry and the acquisition of that capital, which, no sooner should she attain an addition to her power and her natural advantages, than she would studiously convert to the depression and ruin of this country, by excluding our manufactures from every port in the world where her influence could be exerted, and substituting her own. It was to truly British and legitimate industry and commerce that we owed the extent of our wealth and the great resources of our revenue; and therefore it was more peculiarly the duty of those who negotiated this treaty, to have looked with a jealous and vigilant eye to the maintenance of our commerce with the ports of the Mediterranean, where exist the principal marts of consumption for our linen and cotton manufactures. With respect to the cession of Spanish territory in America to France, it was in act in direct violation of the treaty of Utrecht; and it was a ground, in his mind, upon which, notwithstanding the treaty of peace, it was the duty of his Majesty's Ministers to appeal to Spain, and endeavour to procure an adjustment less calculated to excite apprehensions, as well in Spain herself, as in Great Britain, for the dangers of new aggrandizements to France in that quarter of the globe. Upon the whole, however, though the definitive treaty was one to which he never would have agreed to set his hand, yet, now that it was concluded, he thought the country bound in every principle of good policy and national faith to maintain it inviolate. But, in that faithful observance of the treaty, it was the duty of this country to be perpetually vigilant against similar designs, which France, tempted by her power and her ambition, might be induced to meditate. From the nature and extent of that power, the attack, whenever it should come, might be expected to come suddenly; and when he considered France as possessing in Europe a line of coast from the Netherlands to Italy, together with her influence in the other ports of the Mediterranean, her new acquisitions in the East and in the West, he trusted that his Majesty's Government would be jealously alive to the necessity of maintaining, at all times, such a military and naval establishment at home and abroad, as would be competent to enable this country to reassume hostilities with security and effect, whenever it should unfortunately become necessary. He concluded by supporting the original motion.

LORD CASTLEBROUGH.—“I feel considerable reluctance, Sir, to attempt troubling the House upon a subject that has already been so ably and so fully discussed; but I must solicit a few moments of your attention, while I state the reasons which induce me to concur in the address moved by my Noble Friend. It appears to me that the question may be resolved into two points, and on those only I shall dwell, viz. how far the late treaty has provided for our security; or whether it might be better provided for by a further prosecution of the war? But before I come to a more immediate consideration of these two points, I wish to be indulged in a few observations upon the two great features which the discussion seems to have hitherto assumed. What I allude to are, the alterations that have taken place in the relative situation of the two countries between the signing of the preliminaries and the conclusion of the definitive treaty, and the proceedings which the British Government should have instituted in consequence of those alterations. As to the events that have taken place upon the continent, I am ready to agree, that they are extremely important in their nature, and that as such they might have been the ground of a new consideration; they might be deemed sufficient to justify a breaking off of the treaty, or at least a demand for an equiv- lent. But in making up my mind on this part of the question, I think it my duty to examine how far it bears on the general question. Did these alterations so endanger our security, as to make it wise in Ministers to break off the negotiation? I cannot really consider them of that magnitude with regard to us. But have Ministers made any attempt to obtain an equivalent? They may, or they may not, as far as I can pretend to say. But what could be that equivalent, the failure to obtain which would have justified them in breaking off the treaty? I am rather inclined to agree with my Noble Friend, that neither the alterations that have taken place subsequent to the signing of the preliminaries, nor an endeavour to obtain an equivalent, could have warranted Ministers, who acted on the principle of our own security, to forbear bringing the treaty to a final conclusion. The security of the continent, though much to be wished, was not with them the most urgent, or the most important object. But, in considering the consequences of the First Consul of France having assumed the Presidency of the Italian republic, it was material to distinguish between the direct and indirect disposal of the resources of that republic. That he indirectly influenced the resources of the Cisalpine republic, previous to the signing of the preliminaries, nobody will deny; and that since his accession to the Presidency of the Italian republic, these resources are at his more direct disposal, may be also acknowledged. But as that influence more immediately affects other countries, and as we were anxious to provide for the security of our own, was this change in the influence of France over Italy a sufficient cause for a renewal of the war on our part? I cannot, neither do I believe the House can think so. Indeed the cession of Louisiana appears to me of more importance. In that we are more particularly and more vitally concerned, because it may more materially affect our colonial interests. But is the chance of its affecting those interests, dear as they justly should be to us, a justifiable ground for relinquishing the hopes of peace? SURELY NOT. As to what the Honourable Baronet asserted, that this cession was a breach of the treaty of Utrecht, surely in that assertion he did not evince his usual accuracy of research; for Louisiana was not then considered as one of the possessions of Spain that should not be yielded to France; neither was it guaranteed by that treaty. It passed to France from Spain by a secret article of the treaty of 1763. That was looked upon as a proud peace; yet the present treaty was in some points more advantageous, for by it we possess a leading and commanding station in Trinidad, which we did not possess before. But it is asked, How far will the spirit of encroachment, which actuates France, be permitted to advance? That spirit it is no doubt our duty and interest to watch. But I am bold to say, that it is peculiarly incumbent upon us, under the circumstances of our present situation, to show ourselves anxious to prove, that it is our sincere wish to embrace a system of peace, as far as that system is compatible with our safety. That proof we have given by acquiescing in the alterations that have taken place in the relative situation of the two countries since the signing of the preliminaries; and, unless France now begins to act in a different spirit from that which prompted these alterations, neither the maritime nor the continental peace that now prevails can be of any long continuance. But it was the prerogative of his Majesty to make war and peace; and how Ministers would act in advising the former, depended on their discretion. If future encroachments were attempted by France, no doubt the House would be prepared to pledge themselves in support of Administration, and both Parliament and the country would unanimously and cordially combine in arresting the progress of such a spirit, that must prove both dangerous to our own security, and subversive of the independence of Europe. There are two other topics on which I must now beg leave briefly to touch; the one is Malta. By the preliminaries it was stipulated, that that island should be made independent of the contracting parties, and it was expected that a great power (Russia) would have garrisoned it; but this, it seems, Russia declined. —As a military station, Malta was undoubtedly of great value, especially as it favoured an attack upon Egypt. In this view it was more important than its bearings on Italy or on our commerce. But when Russia refused to garrison it, what better arrangement could have been made than that which the treaty has adopted? That it was not in a perfect state of security I am not prepared to deny; but if adequate funds were provided to support a garrison, its situation would by no means be precarious. The conduct which its inhabitants had displayed, on very trying occasions, gave a fair promise that they would again act with the same spirit for their defence. The funds indeed formed an important question; and I am happy to have found a statement of the revenues of the island, which I am led to think authentic, and which represents them in a more favourable light than they had hitherto been represented. This statement makes the revenues amount to 130,000*l.* Since that calculation was made, a new source of revenue has been opened by the establishment of new langues in other countries, particularly the Russian and Bavarian langues. So that, taking the old and new revenues together, they will now amount to about 300,000*l.* exclusive of the commercial revenues of the island at the disposal of the Grand Master. Besides, an improved regulation has lately been adopted in the customs, which promises a great increase in the revenue; and on every view of what may improve or increase its revenues, they may be expected to amount to as large a sum as they stood at previous to the war. Add to this an accumulated surplus left by the late Emperor of Russia, and which will now be converted to the better re-establishment of the Order. So much for the revenues of Malta.—The grand object that we had in view, Sir, in that contest, in which for nine years we were engaged, was the attainment of general security; and to see how far we have succeeded, I cannot do better than refer to the three leading points on which this security was to be founded. It was by the abolition of Jacobin principles, by the enemy being placed in that situation in which they could no longer hope, with the same prospect of success, to press them against this country, or by such an alteration in their application, that they could not excite any feeling of formidable danger. Sir, will any man now say that the danger from French principles exists to the same extent as at the commencement of the war? Whatever opinions may be entertained of the nature of the present government of France, it cannot be denied, that no particular spirit of malignity is now shown to this country. We hear no more of those wild schemes of subverting our independence as a nation, which former governments of France were so forward to avow. The French now look to this country as a country enjoying the advantages of liberty, and as possessing a constitution which is worthy of being considered as the model of a free government. They feel for us all that defence and respect which it was usual to entertain under their ancient government. With reference to the second ground of security, I contend, that even supposing the French principles to exist in their full force, it is impossible to entertain the same hope of establishing them in this country. At the time the war broke out, their principles were not understood; they were apt to mislead, from their novelty; they had not produced in France those miseries and crimes which have now rendered them the just objects of universal execration. Now their real character and tendency is notorious to the world; the people of this country have for nine years had an opportunity of contemplating the enormities to which they have given birth, and to turn from the view of such disasters to the blessings of a free constitution. It would therefore, Sir, be impossible now, if these principles still remained, to propagate them with any prospect of success. The third ground of security arises partly out of the two preceding circumstances. The best test of the extinction of these principles would undoubtedly have been the re-establishment of monarchy in France; and hence, in conducting the war, we looked to this as a most desirable object, so long as any chance of its being obtained continued. I never professed, however, to say, and I am equally confident my Right Hon. Friend near me (Mr. Pitt) never professed to say, that security could not be obtained in any other way. We sought security by pursuing this object as long as the circumstances of Europe afforded any prospect of success; and though in this object we have failed, I maintain that, as far as our separate security is concerned, it has been fully accomplished by the conduct of the war. For, though the territorial acquisitions of France cannot be viewed without regret, I concur with my Noble Friend, that, so far as our separate security is concerned, this extension of territory is a circumstance which ought not to excite any degree of immediate alarm. I concur no less with him in thinking, that, relative to France, we are now in a GREATER state of security than in any former period of our history. I am indeed ready to say, that the influence which France has acquired, is for the continent highly disastrous, and that the state in which the balance of power is left in the general system of Europe, is extremely unsatisfactory. France, if she chooses to neglect the internal improvement of her territories, may undoubtedly carry desolation over the continent to a degree still more extensive. Whether she will, for the purpose of gratifying an inordinate lust of dominion, incur the imputation of leaving her own people the prey of barbarism, we have yet to discover; but at present the extension of her territories, as far as the safety of this country is involved, excites in my mind no degree of apprehension. That, by the cultivation of the arts of peace, by the introduction of habits of industry into the territories she has acquired, she may hereafter make very important advantages from her conquests, I do not deny. Nor do I mean to assert, that with regard to the security of this country these acquisitions may not, at some future time, acquire vast importance; but I do contend, that, as far as immediate security is concerned, as far as our interests are at present liable to be affected, they ought not to give rise to alarm. The dangers which may flow from them are not the dangers of the present moment; they can only be dangers of a remote period, a period by far too remote to be calculated upon when judging of the effects of the present peace. I am, indeed, surprised at the unworthy timidity expressed by my Hon. Friends on the other side. When I make use of this expression, I am far from meaning to insinuate that they are conscious of any such dishonourable feeling; but I cannot help saying, that the fears which they have expressed can serve no other purpose but to lower the tone and temper of the people of this country, and to elevate the tone and temper of our late enemy—(A cry of Hear! Hear!) On this part of the subject I beg leave shortly to take notice of the change which has taken place in the situation of the country, in consequence of the war. The Noble Lord below, in the former part of this debate, stated this alteration with such ability, that I shall at present content myself with recalling the circumstances which he enumerated, to the recollection of the House. No one more sincerely laments than I do the loss of our influence on the continent; but if I were called upon to say what would have the greatest effect in restoring our influence on the continent, I would say, that it would be the giving back to France her colonial possessions. Let her commerce be revived—let her colonies be cultivated, and our interests will proportionally increase.—Now let us see what is the comparative state of the imports and exports of the two countries. During the war our imports have increased from nineteen to thirty millions, and in the same period our exports have been augmented from twenty-four to no less than forty-three millions; our articles of British manufacture exported have risen from eighteen to twenty-four millions, and our tonnage from 1,600,000 to 2,100,000; our mercantile seamen have increased from 118,000 to 143,000: and when it is considered, that during a considerable period of the war 120,000 sailors have been employed in our navy, this accession of numbers cannot be considered without astonishment and admiration, nor fail to exhibit the most satisfactory evidence of the flourishing state of our maritime resources. Such a view of the commerce of the country, at the conclusion of a war the most expensive in which this country was ever engaged, surely affords no room for indulging any great degree of apprehension for its future prosperity. It is besides, Sir, to be considered, that during the war a considerable part of the carrying trade was in the hands of neutrals, and that it will now naturally return to its ancient channels of British conveyance. When I take these circumstances into consideration, I confess that I am astonished at the apprehensions which my Hon. Friends have expressed. How, on the other hand, Sir, does France now stand in point of commercial resources? In 1777, the latest period to which any regular account can be obtained previous to the war, the French exports were 12, and their imports about 9,000,000*l.* In the interval they had certainly increased; but, allowing for this increase, they will not differ materially from this statement. From the West Indies their imports were about 7,500,000*l.* and their exports about 2,500,000*l.* at the same period. By the report of last year the imports from the colonies did not exceed in value 61,000*l.* and the imports were not more than 41,000*l.* Suppose then that at the commencement of a commercial rivalry betwixt the two nations, the exports of France should be 7, and their imports 8,000,000*l.* while our exports amounted to 43, and our imports to 23,000,000*l.* was there any reasonable ground of apprehension about the result of such a commercial contest? Yet, Sir, by a strange inconsistency, when such is the relative situation of the two countries, we are told that our commercial greatness is on the eve of being eclipsed, that our prosperity and our wealth are on the brink of destruction. Before we give way to such groundless apprehensions, before we cherish such desponding fears, it would at least be becoming to estimate the means we enjoy of increasing that wealth which we have acquired. We ought to calculate the effect of a capital more than adequate to the territories on which it is to be employed, before we ascribe so much to the acquisition of territories, for the improvement of which, as in the case of the territories of France, capital is wanting. So far then, Sir, I see no room for apprehension, and I think there is as little to be reasonably dreaded from any prohibitions imposed on the introduction of our manufactures into France, or into the countries of her allies. How it can be the interest of a poor country to purchase dear articles instead of those that are cheaper, I confess I am altogether at a loss to discover; yet such would be the policy of France in excluding our manufactures from her ports. But, even allowing that France by this exclusion should act against all the plainest dictates of common sense, how can we imagine that she will be able to persuade the powers under her influence to consent to such prohibitions? Is it at all probable that they will choose to buy articles at a much dearer rate, when English manufactures are in their power at a lower price, and of superior quality? It is not easy to suppose that they will consent to a prohibition so obviously disadvantageous. But, Sir, let us briefly turn our attention to the state of Europe, and see how far this influence of the French can possibly be exerted. We have already seen the experiment tried, and we have seen its futility demonstrated. We have seen the trial made in a year of war, when every effort was used to ensure its success, and under circumstances far more favourable to such success than any which can exist in a period of peace. I confess, Sir, the subject is a very dry one; but it is one in which we are all much interested—one on which we are all anxious to have our minds relieved from apprehension—(A cry of Hear! Hear!)—In the year 1800, a year surely the most favourable for the exclusion of articles of British manufacture, our exports to the continent of Europe were to the value of 7,500,000*l.* Having stated what this amount was at a time when the prohibition against our goods was more general than at any former period, I beg leave now to turn the attention of the House to the countries which are not under French influence, and to which, consequently, the prohibition will not extend. They are Denmark, Sweden, Russia, Prussia, Poland, and Germany. To these countries the exports amounted to 6,000,000*l.* in the year I have stated. Now what are the countries to which it may admit of argument whether the influence of France is so powerful as to procure an exclusion of our manufactures? They are Holland, Spain, Portugal, and the States of Italy. As to Portugal, I see no reason to believe that durin peace the French will insist on excluding our manufactures. The prohibition only extended to the continuance of the war; and the stipulation at the conclusion of peace is, that France shall be allowed to trade with Portugal on the footing of the most favoured nations. This is all that I should ask for British commerce and British manufactures. Let a fair competition once be established, and I have no fear about the result. The greater part of Italy I allow to be under French influence; but with Venice in the hands of the Emperor at the one extremity, and with Naples at the other, I see little reason to dread the consequences of any prohibition which the French may attempt to establish. In stating that to these countries during the year I mentioned, our exports amounted to 1,300,000*l.* all that remained was only 200,000*l.* out of the value of the whole exports. We have already, therefore, seen the worst of the effects of such prohibitions during the continuance of the late contest; it is contrary to any principle of reason to suppose that we can experience worse effects during a peace, and therefore we have no reasonable ground of apprehension. If we look to America, we see the fairest prospect for the continuance of our commercial relations; and if we look to the West Indies, there is quite as little room for gloomy apprehensions. It may be said, indeed, that several important colonies are now to be restored to the enemy, and that our trade will materially suffer by this restoration. This is, in my opinion, a groundless apprehension. If we look, Sir, at the extent of British produce sent to all these islands, we shall find that it did not exceed in annual value 800,000*l.*; an amount surely, when contrasted with the great aggregate of our exports, of very inconsiderable importance. But I deny that a loss, even to this amount, will be sustained. France cannot in the present state of her manufactures supply the demands of her colonies. She will be compelled to resort to the British market to obtain the necessary supply. We find that this is nothing singular in the history of this country. For a considerable time after the peace of 1763, the restored possessions of the French were supplied with articles of British produce; the same thing took place at the peace of 1783; and it is surely much more likely that it should take place under the present circumstances of France and her manufactures. When we look to the state of the French colonies, which are now in their own possession, we see still less room for apprehension. On the situation of St. Domingo, I have only a few observations to offer; and it is the less necessary for me to enlarge, as I see an Hon. Gentleman opposite (General Maitland) who will give you much more accurate information on the subject than any to which I can pretend. I say then, Sir, that, if France succeeds in restoring industry to this important colony, this they could only do by importation. According to the most moderate calculation, about one half, or nearly 300,000 of the blacks, have perished since the commencement of the first disorders in the island. Taking the number of negroes wanted to be 300,000, and the price of each man to be 60*l.* which is not an exaggerated valuation, no less a sum than 18,000,000*l.* will be necessary to provide for the island the number necessary to fill up the place of those who have perished in the civil contests, or openly in the field. Can we suppose, that, under the present circumstances of France, she should soon possess such a redundancy of capital as to enable her to make the purchase, without which the island was without value, far less to put it on that footing which would render it as valuable as it was prior to the first insurrections which took place? The question of the probable success of the French, or of the difficulties they may experience in restoring tranquillity to the island, is one involving so many different considerations, that I am unwilling now to enter upon it. I will only remark, that the establishment of an independent Black government is what I could not contemplate without dismay. The dangerous effects of such an establishment on the tranquillity of the negroes in our own islands are sufficiently obvious; and I leave it for the consideration of the House, that with such an establishment, France might avail herself of the breaking out of the first war to annoy our islands." His Lordship concluded by expressing his conviction, that we had come out of the combat in a situation which would enable us to meet any danger that might threaten our independence or our honour. The exertions we had already made had enabled us to sit down in peace, if the world would allow us to continue so; and under the circumstances in which we found ourselves placed, he thought it well to discontinue the contest, since we could discontinue it in perfect consistency with our safety. He trusted that a vigorous establishment would be preserved, and that we should be ready to stand forth in any contest which might be necessary for the maintenance of our rights, our independence, or our honour.

GENERAL MAITLAND began by stating, that he rose for the purpose of making some remarks upon the speech of the Hon. Baronet who had just sat down. In these remarks he should indulge no theoretical opinions of his own; but should merely offer some practical knowledge, and some information derived from experience and observation. The worthy Baronet, in treating of the subject, had confined his observations principally to the West Indies, to the possession of St. Domingo by France, and to the cession of Louisiana. With respect to the boundaries stipulated in America, he could not conceive that much danger would arise from the fixing the boundary of the Arawari. Before the war, the French, as a Noble Lord had justly said, had pushed their settlements as far as the Arawari. With respect to the course and position of that river, different opinions had been given by different Gentlemen. For his own part, he had no more means of ascertaining them than those which were possessed in common by every other person. But the answer to the observations that had been made was obvious. What were the boundaries? He founded his opinion upon that of the two countries the most interested upon the occasion. We knew that France had conceived the boundary that she desired, to be of such importance as to carry on the war against Portugal for the purpose of obtaining it. We knew too, that Portugal conceived also the boundary to be of such moment, that she resisted it as long as she was able. When, therefore, we saw the importance which these two powers attached to it, was he to be told that they knew nothing of their own interests, and that we were better acquainted with them than they were? He came now to the effect of the boundary of the Arawari, which was coupled with the cession of Louisiana. Of Louisiana he had heard much; he had heard that it would enable France to attack the United States on one side, and that she would be able to penetrate to Mexico on the other. This, however, was not the first time that strange doctrines had been maintained respecting Louisiana. Similar ones had been held at an early period of the last century, and upon them were founded the famous Mississippi scheme, and the consequent Mississippi bubble. When Louisiana was formerly in the possession of France, it was totally imbecile. During the time it had belonged to Spain, it had not advanced to greater maturity. In the year 1795, its population had not increased at all since the time it had been ceded by France. But it was contended, that the possession of Louisiana would give the French great influence eventually in the councils of North America. There was one observation that would apply here. We possessed Canada; yet the possession of that settlement did not enable us to affect the United States. If that were the case, how much stronger would the arguments apply to the case of Louisiana! If the standard of France were set up in Louisiana, and the standard of the United States were set up in North America, he should, he confessed, have no fear of the result. With respect to Mexico, he saw no cause for those apprehensions which seemed to have produced such an effect upon the minds of some Hon. Gentlemen. He proceeded now to the general question of the colonies. When Gentlemen talked of what France could do with her colonies, did they never recollect such a thing as the British navy? Did it never enter their minds, that she must send fleets and armies to those colonies to render them powerful, and that if she did, she must have passes from the Lords Commissioners of his Majesty's Admiralty? The whole argument upon this part of the subject seemed to him to be a most curious one. When, it was asked, did a great military power refrain from acting upon military principles? True; but how did this assertion apply to the colonies? To do us injury, it was not necessary that France should be a great military republic; she must be also a great naval republic. He wished now to say a few words with respect to St. Domingo. He owned that he had been a good deal surprised at the language which had been held by a Right Hon. Gentleman last night; but much more was he astonished at the language used this day by the Hon. Baronet. A Noble Lord opposite to him, who had spoken second (Lord Castlereagh), had contended, that what Great Britain had obtained by the war was security. Yet though by the war we had got rid of the revolutionary spirit in Europe, we had attained that end to the colonies by the war. We had, however, got a better chance of producing that effect by the peace, than we could have had by any other means that we could have employed. An Hon. Member had alluded to the case of a free republic, or, as he should call it with more justice, a free anarchy of blacks, being established in St. Domingo. This would be the greatest evil that could happen to that island. If the French did get the better of the existing state of affairs in their West India islands, then, it might be said, another kind of danger would arise. True, but that would be of a legitimate kind, and one against which we could apply precautions. The Hon. Baronet had adverted to the danger of a large French army being maintained in St. Domingo. That this was not an important consideration, he did not mean to say; not that such an army could do any injury to our islands, but that a large force would be kept in them, till the result of the expedition to St. Domingo was known. That expedition he believed would not be effectual so soon as some Gentlemen imagined. There was one other topic to which he wished to be permitted to allude; the situation in which we were placed with respect to the East Indies. An Hon. Member had confined his observations principally to Cochín; he should extend his to all the settlements ceded; and, giving that Hon. Member the advantage of those cessions, he would then maintain that never were our possessions, or indeed any possessions, more secure than ours were in the East Indies at the present moment. Pondicherry was formerly of great importance certainly; but the annihilation of Tippoo's power had entirely put an end to it. Cochín was nearer to his territories; but that settlement now was of as little importance. The Hon. Member proceeded next to the discussion of the cession of the Cape. Of that possession he was as far from undervaluing the consequence as any man; he agreed with almost all that had been said last night upon the subject. To the cession of such a place, he should have looked with a disapproving eye, had not our East India possessions been so secure as they were; and had not the annihilation of Tippoo's power, and the possession of Ceylon, rendered our security doubly secure. Upon the subject of Malta, he should not dwell long, as it had been so much and so ably argued already. That that island was of great importance, he was prepared to admit; but still it was not sufficiently so to justify us in carrying on the war solely upon that account. But it had been said, that our fleets would not be able to go into the Mediterranean for want of ports. Lord Nelson, however, found no difficulty; and though we had no port, he was enabled to beat and annihilate the whole French fleet. After that event Malta fell into our hands, and an expedition was sent to Egypt. General Maitland here bestowed a warm eulogium upon General Abercromby, who, he contended, would, if Malta had been of that paramount importance which it was contended to be, have fitted out his force for the attack of Egypt from thence. But what did he do? He carried all his force to a Turkish port. In conclusion, he should only add, that the more he considered the whole of the treaty, and the conduct of his Majesty's Ministers, the more did it appear to him that the peace was as honourable as could be made, and as likely to be permanent as any peace that had ever been concluded before.

LORD TEMPLE said, he should not now go over the whole of the subject, as its principal points had been so thoroughly discussed. The Noble Lord (Hawkesbury) had stated the peace to be insecure, and therefore he would vote for the address because he wished to make it secure. The Noble Lord (Castlereagh) had observed, that this country would not long remain at peace if France still pursued that line of conduct which she had adopted between the preliminary and definitive treaty: for this reason he voted for the address, because France had constantly shewn the same spirit of aggrandizement. He must a little complain of the Noble Lord who had spoken last (Castlereagh), and the other Noble Lord (Hawkesbury), with respect to the course of argument which they had adopted. They had asked, was it better to renew the war on account of the aggrandizement of France, or to make peace? But this was not the question. The question was, whether, with our successes and our resources, we were not entitled to more than his Majesty's Ministers had obtained? The question was, whether we should not have obtained a compensation for the advantages which France had in the mean time obtained? It had been said, that the definitive treaty agreed with the preliminary treaty, and therefore they were bound to agree with the amendment: he could not agree to this proposition, because the situation of Europe was not the same at the period of the definitive treaty as it was at the period of the preliminary treaty. Would the Noble Lord contend, that our situation was the same after France had become possessed of the Italian republic, or that the basis of the treaty was not changed? Under such circumstances his Majesty's Ministers ought to have obtained an adequate compensation from France for the increase of power to her which had taken place between the preliminary and definitive treaty. What was the situation of France with relation to the rest of Europe? It had been truly stated to be unsatisfactory. With respect to Malta, they had been told that it was placed in the hands of an independent power; it was necessary, however, before this assertion could be received, to prove that Naples, to whose hands it was entrusted, was an independent power; it was necessary to prove, that she was able to take care of her own interests, before those of others were entrusted to her. The Noble Lord (Castlereagh) had given a statement of the trade of France, and observed upon the impossibility of her rivaling us; but the statement of the Noble Lord did not relate to the present time, but to the period of the monarchy: the case, however, was very different now, when France had added to her resources and her means beyond all proportion, and when she possessed an extent of coast from Venice to the Texel. It had been stated, that Malta was of no use to us in a time of peace; it might be very true: but it was well known, that it would serve as a dépôt of provisions for the use of our troops, and that it would serve to protect us from the French expeditions, whilst it would also protect our blockade of Toulon. In viewing the merits of this treaty he would ask, had we obtained what had been so triumphantly asserted to be the object of the war, indemnity for the past, and security for the future, which were the only grounds on which this country ought to make peace? Had we obtained either of those objects? With respect to indemnity, were we to look for it in the advantages of Europe, with whom we had made a common cause? Were we to look for it in the indemnity given to our good allies? Let us look at the King of Sardinia: was he named at all in the treaty? With respect to the Queen of Portugal, her integrity had been broken through; and so subservient was Portugal to France, that he believed our ambassador there had been sent home for instructions with respect to an insult which this country had received there. Had we left Naples independent? The isle of Elba would sufficiently testify to the contrary. Last, though not least, was the Prince of Orange: if ever less indemnity was offered, if ever an insult was offered to any ally, it was to the Prince of Orange: we allowed the revival of the old dispute relative to his title, and we had said that he should have indemnity; but we had not said when or how. If any evidence was wanting against the treaty, it was that of the Noble Lord (Hawkesbury), who had declared the peace to be insecure: let them look even at the address moved by the Noble Secretary of State, and they would find that it recommended the keeping up a war establishment in time of peace: in this point of view the peace was insecure. As to our trade, he should say very little upon it; but it was of importance to consider the means which France now possessed of extending her trade, and of shutting many of the ports of Europe against us. With respect to the Cape, he should say nothing, as the subject had been so ably discussed by the Right Hon. Gentleman (Mr. Dundas) on a former evening. He could not help observing, however, that we had given up to France every establishment connected with our East India possessions, where they might make, undisturbed, whatever arrangements they chose for the purpose of annoying our trade and attacking our power. It had been said, that his Majesty's Ministers had given up none of our rights; but how would they justify giving up the honour of our flag, which was the last privilege that ought to have been given up? He wished to ask, who wished for war, his Majesty's Minister, who preserved a sullen silence, and refused to explain any article of the treaty, or those who wished to settle those points by amicable negotiation?

The MASTER of the ROLLS said, he did not rise for the purpose of entering into the details of this question, but should merely confine himself to one or two of the most prominent points. He made this choice, first, because it was not easy to compress the whole into an argument of any reasonable length; and in the next place, because the principal articles of the treaty had been so sufficiently explained by those who had been concerned in this negotiation, as to render it impossible for him to say any thing new upon the subject. He should confine himself to two points: It had been said, that the definitive treaty ought not to have been concluded, notwithstanding the preliminary treaty, on account of the large accession in the mean time made to the power of France, which the Noble Lord asserted had changed the face of Europe. He should not now enter into the peace in detail, because, if the peace was unjustifiable in its principle, it must necessarily be vitiated in detail; nor could any argument be adduced in favour of the details until the principle was justified. A great deal of ingenuity had been employed by his Right Hon. Friend on the preceding evening, about many of whose sentiments, perhaps, there might be little difference of opinion; but he was at a loss to discover how the arguments of his Right Hon. Friend applied in the present case. It had been clearly shewn that France had made many acquisitions, and that she had materially increased her power; but the Gentlemen on the other side had not shewn what part of those acquisitions, or how much of that power, had been the consequence of the peace. It was to the events of the war that France was indebted for that increase of her power. Did those Gentlemen mean to contend, that the war ought not to have been undertaken? He was persuaded, that, bad as was the condition of Europe at the present moment, it would have been much worse, had it not been for the war. It might be said, that there was not a necessity for making peace; it would, however, be recollected, that the dictates of prudence were a ground of necessity to a wise man; and certainly, if there existed no visible means of bettering the condition of a country in a state of war, every thing concurred to induce and to render it a matter of good policy, in that country, to conclude a peace. If his Right Hon. Friend could have shewn how a change could have been effected in the situation of Europe, he would have joined his humble efforts to rouse the country to a continuance of the contest. He would have consented in that case to give up all the chances which might have been expected from pursuing that line of conduct; but before they induced him to support a continuance of the war, they must point out to him some method of successfully effecting any good by continuing the war: for instance, while we had allies upon the continent, there was a chance that the balance of Europe might be restored; such was the period when we rejected the first overtures of Buonaparté. We might then, perhaps, have obtained more by a treaty of peace; but we gave up whatever compensation we might have obtained, for the chance of gaining every thing. A treaty of peace, therefore, such as this, could not be consented to at that period, when there was the chance of getting more than by any treaty of peace. In alliance with the powers of the continent, we might attain the object that was sought for; but certainly we could not by ourselves. We could with the greatest certainty ascertain the utmost limits of our efforts, and we could know, that at the end of three or four years, the effect of these efforts would be still the same. What could we have done to prevent France from gaining the great accession of power which she had acquired upon the continent, to have prevented her from obtaining an influence in the Italian republic, or from obtaining from Spain the cession of Louisiana? It might be said, that if we did not persevere in the war for the sake of Belgium and Holland, it was no reason why we should not renew the war for the purpose of endeavouring to prevent the influence of the First Consul over the Italian republic. It might be said, that we might as well continue the war for one object as for another; but a country must draw a line for itself. It was not to be said, that a country was to continue a war for the purpose of preventing this or that particular object from being carried into execution, but to preclude a dishonourable peace. It was not that we were to fight for one object or another; but whether in either case it would have been of use, or on the other hand unavailing, to continue the contest. The question resolved itself into this: whether the war could have been continued with any prospect of diminishing the resources or contracting the power of France? It had been said, that the treaty ought not to have been broken off; but that we should have insisted upon a compensation for the increased power of France: in this the Right Hon. Gentleman (Mr. Grenville), and the Noble Lord (Temple), had differed from the Right Hon. Gentleman who had opened the discussion, who conceived that the treaty ought to have been broken off after the conduct which France had displayed in the Italian republic. With respect to compensation, was it to be taken out of the territories in our possession? He wished to know whether any islands that we possessed at the conclusion of the war would serve as a counterbalance to the power which France had acquired on the continent of Europe? It was not the power attained by preserving those islands in our possession that rendered us capable of contending with France, so far as regarded her continental power, because it was not exactly of the same sort. France had acquired a power by which other powers were less safe, but which she had rendered safe by rounding her territories; but would the possession of the West India islands have the same effect with respect to this country? So far from increasing the means of this country, it brought with it rather weakness than strength; it divided our means and our resources, and certainly the acquisition of those resources we should acquire afforded no new means of defence, nor any means of counterbalancing the advantages acquired by France in India. This was felt at the negotiation at Lisle, in which it was fully understood that the West India islands could be no counterbalance to the power of France. If we had possessed the means of counterbalancing the power of France by means of our West India islands, then it must follow that Ministers were highly to blame in giving up those means; but it had not been proved that we possessed them. It was also to be recollected, that whilst we possessed no means of controlling France upon the continent, it was only by means of the West India islands, to which she would direct her attention, that we had any means of influencing her, through the medium of the trade which she would establish and carry on in those islands. He had heard no definite proposition made as to the propriety or expediency of continuing the war: it seemed, according to the arguments of Gentlemen on the other side, that we were to carry on the war merely for the purpose of taking the chance of whatever might occur; they did not state a probability of effecting a change in the state of Europe, but they were contented with a bare possibility. According to those arguments, we were to continue the war for the mere purpose of not being at peace. We were to go to war merely for the possibility of a change in the affairs of Europe; and if this did not happen soon, we might exhaust our resources before it did happen; and supposing it did not happen in any reasonable time, we should be under the necessity of making peace upon terms much less honourable and advantageous to this country. There were Gentlemen on the other side of the House who thought it was right to make peace; but contended that the peace shewed that we had completely failed in all the objects of the war. A failure on our part there had been none: the object of the war had always been stated to be, to provide for our safety: we had not failed; so far from it, we were then in that House, after escaping from the revolutionary furor to which almost every power which had come into contact with it, except ourselves, had fallen a victim. Here we were in the midst of our ancient constitutional rights. We had been engaged with Europe, in which we could only assist; but it was never imagined that we were to overcome the enemy by dint of our own strength. They all remembered the time when the dread of French principles was so great, that Mr. Burke said it was better to be conquered by any other nation, than to yield to the principles of France, who had voluntarily torn herself from the civilized world, from which it was evident they meant to keep no terms with society. Surely, then, it was a consolation that France had now shewn a disposition to enter into the pale of society, into which she was proceeding as fast as circumstances would admit.—If Buonaparté had taken measures to extirpate jacobinism, whatever might be his conduct on other occasions, he had certainly done a real service to mankind. The conduct of Buonaparté in this instance was certainly founded on good policy, as, if jacobinism should be established in France, no other government could enjoy repose; and if jacobinism should be established any where else, it was clear that no government could exist in France. If Buonaparté wished to extirpate jacobinism, it was certainly sound policy, as, whilst it was suffered to exist, there was no security for the existence of government there or any where else. With respect to the cession of Louisiana to Spain, the value and the importance of that cession had been only discovered within a few nights preceding; and he believed that the question had not been overlooked before, not only by them but by their ancestors. It was formerly in the possession of France, when France was perfectly alive to her own interest; but she had not been able to draw from it those advantages which it was contended might be derived from it. Louisiana was ceded to them by the treaty of 1763. His Hon. Friend had said that Spain would feel a rankling spite against this country, for agreeing to the cession of Louisiana; but for this he could see no reason; it was the voluntary cession of Spain. With respect to danger arising from it, he could not perceive that degree of injury to this country which had been portrayed. It was ceded to France at the peace of 1763, and no danger was then apprehended from that cession, though the Ministers of that day were fully competent to discover that danger, if it really existed. The only danger likely to result from it that he could discover, arose from bringing France in contact with the United States of America. It might happen, in the course of ages, that some danger might result from this connexion, but it would not soon be so. He had much doubt whether the treaty of Utrecht, alluded to by the Hon. Baronet, would have prevented the cession of Louisiana by Spain. All that treaty declared was, that Spain should not cede any of her territories to France; but, Louisiana having been ceded to France by the treaty of 1763, it became a question whether the cession of it now again to France was a breach of that treaty. With respect to the non-revival of treaties, he was of opinion, that those Gentlemen who had brought forward arguments against this omission in the definitive treaty, had argued against themselves. They had brought forward claims on the part of France, which they admitted were utterly destitute of foundation. They had assumed an injustice on the part of France, and proved that former treaties ought to have been revived by the very same arguments which would render those treaties absolutely nugatory; for if France disregarded treaties for the purpose of reviving former claims which had been settled by those treaties, then all treaties with her would be useless. If this was the character of the French government, we ought to be constantly at war with her, and publicly to state the reason of it. Confidence begot confidence; and if we entertained these opinions of France, we should be acting in the same manner as the French Directory, who received every declaration of ours with a declaration on their side that they doubted our sincerity. It was certainly not fair to put into the mouth of France claims and pretensions which we ourselves reprobated and condemned. With respect to the general ground of the revival of former treaties, he was not disposed to admit the propriety of it; but he supposed that some motive which he had not been able to discover, had induced the renewal of former treaties in other negotiations. There were some instances at least, in which, as in the present case, if former treaties were renewed, they would be renewed without an object to refer to. France had generally begun in former treaties with the renewal of the treaty of Westphalia, and proceeded forward from thence. It was asserted, that we had in this instance departed from the established law of nations; but respecting the practice, it was not so uniform as it seemed to be supposed. Treaties had been before made with France, in which no mention was made of former treaties: in the treaties of Ryswick and Utrecht, for instance, no mention was made of former treaties; yet Europe stood as before. There were several treaties between this country and France, which, if now renewed, would not only have no object to refer to, but would be absolutely contrary, in their operation, to the present situation of affairs. In adverting to the renewal of former treaties, it should have been stated for what purpose they ought to be renewed; for unless Gentlemen could shew him some benefit to be derived from that renewal, he could see no reason for it. One effect was stated to be the consequence of this omission, which was, that all treaties, not renewed, fell to the ground: there were some of which he thought it was of little consequence whether they fell to the ground or not. For instance, if a cession was made, it became absolutely part of the dominion of the country to which it was ceded; it was of no consequence that the treaty was not renewed in the event of a war and a subsequent peace, as the territory ceded could not revert back to the party ceding. Thus, with respect to the Bay of Honduras, which had been alluded to, it was said to be doubtful whether our right to cut log-wood there was not done away by the non-renewal of former treaties. In the first place, however, it was not very clear that we derived our title to it from a treaty; and, in the next, we were in possession of the right of property at the commencement of the war, which we had retained, and still held at the conclusion of the war. The right of property, therefore, still remained in this country, and there could not be a clause inserted in the treaty to give us that which we had never lost; we merely restored what we had taken possession of: what we had before possessed in our own right, must remain vested in the same manner, without any necessity for its being so stipulated by treaty. With respect to these treaties, the ground on which Gentlemen contended was, that we were left in that quarter of the globe without security or safety against the claims which France might set up against us. It was a singular circumstance, if the treaty set aside all claims, that we should still be subject to them. We had got into a whimsical debate upon the subject. They all agreed that there was no doubt as to our rights; yet they were discussing among themselves whether France might not dispute those claims with us. It seemed we were to implore France to negotiate with us on a subject, in respect of which we said there was no dispute. The offer ought to come from her. No, it was said, they must go to France, and state to her certain claims which we requested her to give up; and it was perfectly natural to suppose that France, finding she had such claims, would demand a compensation for giving them up: this was a complete inversion of our situation; we were to ask her not to attempt what she had not attempted. The definitive treaty gave France nothing but the factories and possessions which she had at the commencement of the war. Under the treaty of 1783, she might claim, according to the provisions of that treaty, various rights with respect to trade, founded upon ancient documents: but we now gave her nothing but what we had taken from her during the war. He should like to know whether a question could be set up as to her claims of rights of trade under that treaty. He should have thought, that France, if she set up any claims, would do it under the convention of 1763, that being in his opinion the only plausible claim which she could make. By saying that we gave her factories, it was a question which might be started, whether we gave her these rights of trade which she formerly enjoyed, whether these rights were restored as they existed before the war, or whether France only received her possessions according to the letter of her treaty? But in all his readings, he had never met with the question which was now started, that France might pass by the commencement of the war, and mount up to any indeterminate period, for the purpose of establishing claims. He had never heard any such question arise out of a treaty; the single question was, whether she acquired only by the treaty, or received the privileges which she enjoyed at the commencement of the war? If the latter was to be the case, as Gentlemen on the other side contended, and that a nation was to acquire that which she had not gained by conquest or concession, but merely because she was conquered, whilst the conqueror lost something, it was one of the most whimsical arguments he had ever heard adduced. If this doctrine of claims which were not claimed, was to be set up, it would be necessary to bring all the exertions of imagination, and the superinduction of every probability, into a negotiation, and to choose a person of the most lively fancy to assist every ambassador; he must retire to his closet, and invent and contrive every thing that his imagination could suggest, that might be made the subject of claim or dispute by the adversary. Then, let all these be inserted in the treaty. He would not trespass any further upon the House: he trusted that the peace would stand justified; and that, whilst they should prove themselves fully capable of preserving its blessings, they would be ready, if war became unavoidable, to meet it with firmness and with energy.

Dr. LAURENCE said, it was with surprise and regret that he perceived how different the conclusions were which his Right Hon. Friend, who had just sat down, drew from the same facts, to those which he inferred from them. His Right Hon. Friend had, in concert with Gentlemen of the same opinion as to the treaty, put the question, how far this or that particular island would be a justifiable cause of war—and how far any event which had occurred in the interval between the signing the preliminaries and the conclusion of the definitive treaty, would be a good ground for breaking off that negotiation. It was the custom to put this question on each of those islands or events separately, without considering the joint effects of the whole; and still more, whether Ministers might not have concluded better terms? It was rather remarkable, that the negative of this latter question was uniformly assumed, without the least evidence being adduced to shew that many of the disadvantages of the treaty arose, not so much from the want of skill and judgment in Ministers, as from the peculiar circumstances of the times. Gentlemen, in touching on the subject of Louisiana, seemed to keep aloof from any allusion to the Floridas, though they were also ceded to France, and were known to have many excellent ports and other important advantages. The Noble Lord on the Treasury Bench had observed, that Louisiana was before in the hands of the French, and that it never was deemed of much consequence in value or produce; but the true reason of that was, that the French then turned their attention to Canada, and neglected the cultivation of Louisiana. If, however, the strength of France was such at present, that it would have been criminal in Ministers to delay the definitive treaty, on account of this or that particular place, how far would that argument go; and how far was it likely to operate upon us, when the strength of France should be increased by the consolidation of their resources? The Noble Lord had observed, that during the negotiation of the peace of 1763, the French privately ceded to the Spaniards this settlement of Louisiana: but that case bore no analogy to the late clandestine proceeding; it was not known until after the treaty was ratified; and the reason of the surrender was very well known—it was given over to the Spaniards as a purchase for Minorca, which the French were to transfer to us. The Learned Gentleman endeavoured to place the arguments of Lord Hawkesbury in a different point of view from that in which they had been considered by others. He was quite dissatisfied with the arrangement respecting Malta; that island should have been a grand barrier against France; it should not have been neutral, but ought to be a naval station well fortified, and able to assist us in interrupting the progress of any fleet that France might send out to attempt a passage to our Indian possessions. France professed, five years ago, when she sent her first expedition to Egypt, that her principal object was to extinguish the system of its government and religion, as it was said, by the then governors of France, to be the centre of superstition and aristocracy; and they could now boast of having accomplished their object—for the new organization of the constitution of Malta left scarcely a vestige of the venerable old system; it innovated upon all that time had consecrated; and the island itself, instead of being under one influence, was placed under a pie-me guarantee; the whole of this plan being prepared and carried into effect without the consent, or, in a great degree, the knowledge, of the Knights of the Order. He would not plead for the indiscriminate renewal of all our political and commercial treaties; but there were some which he thought it would have been wise to renew, and not to rely solely on the treaty before the House, in which nothing definitive was to be found, and yet it was to form the basis of the future system of Europe; the principles and practice of all former statesmen (some of whom were as wise, at least in their own presumption, as the Noble Lord) being totally rejected. The vessel of the State was to be thrown afloat on the ocean of politics and commerce, with no rudder but the very distinct and comprehensive treaty on the table. As to the commercial treaty of 1787, the Noble Lord last night stated, that this treaty was inconsistent with the alien bill; if so, we were the aggressors in the war. But that assertion was directly in the teeth of the arguments employed by his Right Hon. Friend behind him, when he proposed that law to the House before the war. He contended, on the whole, that Ministers gave up more for the hollow-armed truce which they had obtained, than they should have done had the war been unsuccessful throughout. Certainly it had been productive of much expense; so much indeed, that when Gentlemen adverted with any pride to the amount of our exports and imports, it would be curious to inquire whether that amount was equal to the interest on the national debt created by the war. Among the faults of omission, he reckoned as extremely culpable the state in which our merchants, who had settled in the ceded colonies, were left, as to the removal of their property. If that had been judiciously provided for, according to ancient custom, we should now, without augmenting the miseries of the slave-trade, be enabled from these colonies to furnish a sufficient number of negroes to cultivate our newly-acquired island of Trinidad. These were the points to which the address referred; and surely a large and respectable body of the country was discontented with the loose conditions of the treaty. It would be a good opportunity of putting the sincerity of France to the test, by proposing some arrangement on those topics, before the restitutions should be made. It had been often said in that House by the advocates of the peace, that it was called for by the public opinion—that the late Ministers advised it, and that the country received it with joy;—but he had no hesitation in stating it as his firm belief, that if a list of the concessions to be made to the enemy had accompanied the first news of the peace, instead of being the subject of exultation, even with the common people, the peace would have been received with strong murmurs of discontent. The people of England required to be led;—they were influenced by the character of those above them; and that formed not the least part of their praise: they were capable of great exertion, and patient of suffering; they combined in their character the extremes of the good qualities of other nations; they were constant in their fortitude, loyal in their sentiments, and elevated in their spirit; they were above the idea of submitting to any peace that was dishonourable or disadvantageous, and they had too much good sense to value one that was insecure. If, from the imprudent temerity in which this treaty had been concluded, and the loose terms in which it is drawn up, hostilities should soon recommence, the fault will not be in the circumstances of the period at which the negotiation commenced, as asserted—not in the conduct of the predecessors of Ministers, but in the Ministers themselves, who entered upon the negotiation, and followed it up almost to a termination, without resorting to Parliament for counsel in any step of their progress in this very important undertaking. The consequences would be attributable to them, should those apprehended arise from a peace which left so much open for discussion, constituting so many grounds of dispute and discord.

Mr. BOND said, he could not at that late hour of the night enter at large into the subject now before them, which had been so ably treated on that side of the House, particularly by his Noble Friend last night, and on that by his Right Hon. and Learned Friend, who had displayed every thing which ingenuity, learning, information, talents, and eloquence could furnish. It was impossible for him to say that he could add any thing to what had been said already upon that side of the subject; it would be the extreme of arrogance in him to suppose that he could do so: he only begged leave to call the attention of the House to what he considered to be the real question. Gentlemen on the other side of the House, and his Learned Friend who had just spoken, had displayed great ability; he would not say, whether they had, or had not, produced much effect upon the public, by the manner in which they treated the subject: he would not impute to his Learned Friend, nor to any other Gentleman on that side of the House, any intention of making unfavourable impressions upon any persons who heard him, or upon the public, by the observations which they made; but certainly such was the tendency of their arguments: it was true indeed, they professed to have no intention to censure any body; but, notwithstanding their professions, it was impossible not to perceive that the effect of all their observations was to convey censure both upon the peace, and upon the Ministers by whom it was negotiated. He wished to know whether there was any fact by which it could be fairly concluded that better terms could have been obtained than those in the treaty now upon the table? If there was not, why should the treaty be disapproved of, or its authors be deserving of censure in that House, or elsewhere? He was aware that there could not be found matter of complaint either against the treaty or its authors: it was true, indeed, that the treaty could not be declared to be perfect—no treaty was ever so: nothing could be easier than for speculative men to form expectations in their closets; but to bring them into active life and reality, was often found impracticable. Such was the case in the present instance; innumerable difficulties must occur in the course of such a negotiation, many of which were incapable of explanation, from their very nature, but a bare reference to which would be sufficient for the common sense of that House. He then proceeded to observe upon some of those difficulties; and said, that he was very far from intending to insinuate that the spirit of the people of this country was broken; but it must be admitted, that, from the circumstances of the war, they had wished for peace; nor was it unnatural that they should do so. The great load of the national debt could not be forgotten; the pressure of several which we had endured, in some instances bordering upon famine, and hardships which must have an effect upon the public. From the consideration of this, it was the business of every good administration to enter into negotiation; not that he meant to allege that peace was a matter of absolute necessity, but it certainly was a matter of prudence. Ministers, in concluding peace, had therefore, in his opinion, done every thing that prudence could dictate. That, however, was but half their work: the remaining part was to preserve entire our resources; and to preserve as much as possible, by wise measures, the spirit of the people, in order that, if ever the evil hour should arrive, we should have the ability and disposition to oppose, with effect, the ambitious projects of our rival. It was by such preparations alone that the prosperity of this country could be secured, which he heartily hoped, and confidently trusted, we should long continue to enjoy.

MR. WILLIAMS WYNN expressed himself dissatisfied with several parts of the treaty of peace, although he did not wish that the good faith of it should not be preserved. In his opinion, the House ought to adopt the address moved by his Right Hon. Friend.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that in this exhausted state of the House, and, he could add, the exhausted state of the question, it would be unpardonable in him to ask the attention of the House for any considerable length of time; but there were some points to which he felt it his duty to call the attention of the House. He concurred with his Right Hon. Friend in opinion, that the turn of the argument of the Hon. Gentleman on the other side of the House, amounted to this—That the definitive treaty now upon the table was such as ought not to be approved of. He concurred with his Learned Friend (Mr. Bond), whom, for the first time, he had the happiness of hearing in that House, and whom he hoped he should often hear, that the tendency of the arguments of Gentlemen on the other side went to censure the peace, and to censure also those who advised his Majesty to enter into it. He hoped therefore he should be pardoned, if, notwithstanding the disclaiming of Gentlemen on the other side, and particularly a Right Hon. Gentleman who spoke towards the close of last night's debate, the tendency of the arguments, whatever the intention might be, was to bring the peace into disrespect, as well as to censure his Majesty's Ministers. His Right Hon. Friend, from whom the address proceeded, he was free to acknowledge, made his proposition from genuine principles (for they certainly were genuine), by which he had been influenced, not only in that motion, but during the course of the contest in which we had been engaged. He thought he perceived, from the proposition of his Right Hon. Friend, the same disposition which led him, some time ago, to declare in that House, soon after the preliminaries, his disapprobation of the peace altogether. That disapprobation he expressed in terms almost unqualified—he had declared his opinion against the power of France, and the usurpations of that power; and by the manner in which he made that declaration, he must have censured the peace itself, as a death-blow to the prosperity of this country. He was truly convinced that his Right Hon. Friend, if he entertained the same sentiments, which he could never disguise, nor even attempt to disguise, these sentiments went the length of considering that any peace with the present government of France was inadmissible. That he had signified when the peace was made, and before he knew the terms: he had then considered the peace itself as a death-blow to the prosperity of this country; this had always been the opinion of his Right Hon. Friend upon the subject; and that it was his opinion still, he thought was pretty clearly expressed by the motion he had made upon the subject. Other Gentlemen, he was persuaded, who concurred in the opinion that the peace was not such as this country had a right to expect, did not concur, however, with him in saying that peace ought not to be made at any rate; but his Right Hon. Friend had always gone the full length of saying, that any peace with France in its present state was inadmissible. He said this the more readily, because the principles and the motives which actuated his conduct were truly honourable; and he could not help adding, that if the principles of his Right Hon. Friend, as expressed by the motion now before the House, were adopted, they could not fail, but must inevitably lead to a speedy renewal of the war. The question, however, now was, not whether a definitive treaty ought not to be concluded, but whether, being concluded, it was or was not a proper measure? He could not help observing, however, that, although Gentlemen on the other side of the House had not said that this subject ought to have been discussed by piecemeal, yet they certainly conducted themselves on that principle, and had objected to the treaty by piecemeal; but Ministers had laid their claim to discuss the subject all together, and that was, in his opinion, the wiser mode: it was, therefore, by no means his intention to enter into the minute particulars of the definitive treaty, he should rather take a short review of its general effect; indeed there was not much necessary to be said by him; he would rather refer the House to what had already been said by his friends to-night, and upon the former occasion. They had treated the subject with so much knowledge, so much talent, so much information, and so much cloquence, that little need be said in addition to what had been said already. He was ready to rest the defence of the measure upon what had already been said: he admitted that circumstances of a very great and important nature had taken place before the signing of the definitive treaty, and between the signing of the preliminary and that of the definitive treaty, points which required explanation; and there were differences between the preliminary and definitive treaties, which it would be proper for him to explain; and yet, having made all these admissions, he did not hesitate to ask the House this question, Was it or was it not a treaty which, under all the circumstances, was fit for his Majesty to engage in? Was it or was it not, under all the circumstances, a treaty which it was wise in his Majesty's Servants to advise his Majesty to assent to? Having said this, there were two or three points which he should proceed to explain, in the course of which he should have to solicit the attention of the House. On the subject of Louisiana, he should say no more than appeared to be necessary, by way of answer to the danger which had been talked of by Gentlemen on the other side. In 1762, both Canada and Louisiana were in the possession of the French, when Great Britain had large possessions in America; and the possession of Louisiana and Canada was not enough to prevent Great Britain from being more than a match for France. Canada certainly being important, and Louisiana being now said to be so, they were nevertheless unable to make a stand against Great Britain. What was said to endanger us now, was the power of France in that quarter, but which was not equal to our own possessions and strength; and with the friendship, for this purpose, at least, of an independent, and now become a powerful and populous country, namely, the United States of America. But with respect to another point, namely, the hazard to which our commercial interest was exposed in this quarter, as had been stated; thus stood the fact: there was a difference stated to exist between Louisiana and Fort Hillsborough. There was not in Louisiana a single port wherein a ship of the line could enter, and in the other a ship of the line could not anchor without taking out her guns. Nor was there any danger to our commerce in that quarter, from the cession of this place to France. The improvement which had taken place in making copper bottoms to our ships, and other circumstances, gave us other great advantages in that quarter, by enabling us to alter the course of our navigation, by going through the Windward Passage, instead of the Gulf of Mexico, so that we should never be annoyed in that quarter by the French, in the manner in which the Hon.

Gentleman had stated it. With respect to the difference between the definitive treaty and the preliminary articles, it was a question which he would himself ask the House, Whether, under all the circumstances, they were not satisfied that this definitive treaty was a fair execution of the preliminary articles? He admitted that they were not strictly the same; and indeed if they were, there would have been no occasion for preliminary articles, because they might as well at once have been made to assume the form of a definitive treaty. There were five articles in the definitive treaty modified from those of the preliminary articles; first, the article respecting prisoners; secondly, that respecting Newfoundland; thirdly, that of the state of Portugal; fourthly, that of Malta; and, fifthly, that of the Cape of Good Hope. Now, undoubtedly, with regard to three of these articles, they were revived in the definitive treaty, and finally settled in a way that was advantageous; he meant those articles which related to the prisoners, Newfoundland, and Portugal: it was therefore only as to Malta and the Cape that any doubt could arise any where, as to the difference between the preliminary articles and the definitive treaty. Now, with respect to Portugal, he was really astonished that so much had been said on the other side of the House, after so many explanations had been given of that subject: he would not say that Gentlemen had a wilful misconception on that subject; but he really knew not how Gentlemen could state the objections they had stated so often, after the explanations which had been given to them upon that subject. He now averred again, that the treaty of Badajos was known to his Majesty's Ministers previous to the signing of the preliminary articles; and communication took place between us and the court of Lisbon on the subject of the limits of Portuguese and French Guiana; we were given to understand the limits of Portuguese Guiana, and this created a determination in us to afford them every protection possible: there was an apprehension that they would not meet their danger as danger ought to be met; and that therefore they might be induced to accept of terms still more disadvantageous than those which were included in the treaty of Badajos. What was the conduct of his Majesty's Ministers? From an understanding which Gentlemen might comprehend without calling for particulars, it was stipulated on our part, that the treaty of Badajos should be in force only in a particular manner, as far as it related to the limits of Portuguese Guiana: and it was stipulated that a subsequent treaty entered into, or which might be entered into, fixing the limits more disadvantageously to Portugal, should be null and void, as far as these limits were concerned. The treaty of Badajos, in consequence of the dissatisfaction of the French, was not ratified; but the treaty of Madrid was ratified, in which the terms were much more disadvantageous to Portugal than those of the treaty of Badajos, as far as respected the limits of the Portuguese Guiana. The House would recollect the explanation of his Noble Friend upon that subject, by which it appeared manifestly, that we had acted generously towards Portugal in this respect; and this was so far supported by the best evidence, that no objection was made to it on the part of the court of Lisbon. On the subject of Malta, he would, after so much had been said already, say no more than that the Noble Lord (Lord Temple) misconceived the thing, if he thought the accounts to which he referred described the whole of the Order of Malta, in point of revenue, for it related only to that part of the revenue which grew out of the customs. It had been asked, whether the King of Naples acquiesced in this matter? To which he answered, that the acceptance of the King of Naples had been signified in this particular, and therefore all objection on that article was done away. Austria had also accepted the guarantee. Having thus gone through all that appeared to him to be necessary to particularize, after what had been urged from other quarters, he would ask, whether this was or was not, under all the circumstances, fit to be entertained by the House, and worthy of its support? He was not desiring that it should be praised. He had never thought of this treaty, nor of the preliminary articles, with any sentiment of exultation; he had satisfied himself, and he remained satisfied, that it was that which, upon the whole, was the best measure that could be taken; he had never endeavoured to paint it in false colours; he had never attempted to apply to it any epithets of praise; he was content with the reflection that he had not tarnished the honour of the country by the measures he had adopted; he had long been of opinion, and he trusted he should never change it, that there was no extremity of distress which the nation would not rather suffer, than that its honour should be tarnished; for honour was another word for the strength of a nation; but if he were asked, under such circumstances, and after an additional proof of the ambitious views of France and of its power by the transaction of Lyons, if this country had abstained from making remonstrances, or from taking any step to signify to our adversary the feelings of his Majesty on that occasion? he would answer, that Gentlemen who argued a case like this had many advantages over a person in his situation. They would easily put questions to him which it was impossible for him to answer; and they might state obstacles which it was difficult, if not impossible, for a Minister to remove in the way of argument, in a manner that was at once satisfactory to those who made the objection, and consistent with the duty of the Minister. He would only say, that it was matter of great satisfaction with him and with the rest of his Majesty's Ministers, that they were determined, in the event of the failure of the negotiation, to have laid before the House every document which they possessed upon the subject, and possess the House of complete information upon it. He thought, after this, it would have been almost tautology in him to say, that he was at least satisfied it would appear by this information, that the honour of the country was not tarnished by any thing that was done by his Majesty's Ministers in the course of this negotiation: he trusted it would have appeared by those documents, had it become necessary to shew them to the House, that his Majesty's Ministers had felt as they ought to feel as British Ministers, and that their conduct was such as would have met with the approbation and support of that House. But if the question was put to him, he would answer it, not by any particular statement, but relying on what had been said already by his friends, who had stated the case in terms that were very forcible, that an attempt on the part of Great Britain to maintain alone the contest with France until her territorial power in Europe were abridged considerably, was an unwise measure. That the extent of that territorial power was matter of regret, was unquestionable. It could not but be matter of regret, but it was a lot which we had not the power of controlling; we were not to presume to say the bounty of Providence was to be dispensed in the way that was most consonant to our wishes. We ought to be contented with the conviction that we had abundant means of providing for our own security in a separate state and condition; but we were not able to provide for that security on a large scale which connected us with the security of other powers; that depended upon events over which we had no control. He could only say, he was astonished that his Right Hon. Friend (Mr. Windham), whose heart, he was persuaded, was deeply interested in these things, and who even now cherished the hope, perhaps, of recovering all that had been lost in the contest, should not long ago have been satisfied with the arguments, or rather that his own enlightened mind should not have anticipated the arguments by which the expediency of making peace was demonstrable; and that even upon the very principle of his Right Hon. Friend himself, which was this, that if ever Austria and Prussia, and other powers, should recover the power, and regain the inclination, of obtaining what they had lost in the contest—he was not saying that such a course would be advisable, but he was astonished that his Right Hon. Friend, who had this so much at heart, could not see that the only way to render this country able to give vigour and energy to such a principle was, to preserve the resources of this country from waste, and that nothing was capable of doing so, in an effectual manner, but peace. To a mind less capable of seeing the bearing of things upon one another than that of his Right Hon. Friend, it might have appeared that peace was the only means by which we could become able to accomplish what he desired. He should rejoice to see the resources of this country economized, as he hoped they would be by peace. "God grant," said Mr. Addington, "that peace may be preserved! It is not only my wish, but it is my earnest prayer, that we may long enjoy the blessings of peace; and that the conduct of France may be such, and that she may not use her power in such a way, as to compel us to arm against her; but if war should again take place in two or three years (and I hate to state the supposition), I would say, however, that it will even then be matter of great consolation to every man in this House who has done every thing in his power to avert the calamity of war, that he had done so. I am well persuaded, however, that, whatever may happen, it is the wisest course for us to preserve our resources at present, as much as possible, that we may the better be prepared, if that should be our lot, to exert ourselves with energy and effect: but I will go further; I do not know whether it will be satisfactory to my Right Hon. Friend or not. I will say, that if war be his object, we are pursuing the best course for it, by preserving our resources at a period when we have the opportunity of doing so; and, what is better with me, and which I own is my object, I know of nothing so likely to prevent a war, as the being prepared to meet it; nothing is so likely to keep other powers from molesting us, as the knowledge that we possess the means of vindicating our rights. I think, therefore, that we should take care not to exhaust our resources when there is nothing to be gained by it. I think it would be very unwise to go on with a contest, when there is nothing to contend for that would be worth the gaining, and where there is much to be lost. Let it not be supposed, that, because I say this, I am of opinion that the resources of this country have been imprudently employed; I am so far from thinking so, that I believe the very means by which we have obtained peace have arisen from the vigour with which we prosecuted the war. On this subject I should have been sorry to have been misunderstood, and therefore have said this to avoid it." Mr. Addington then proceeded to observe, that neither himself nor any of his colleagues had any plea of inadvertency for an excuse, if any part of the definitive treaty was defective in its provisions. He should think it highly unworthy to urge such a plea if he had it; but he said there was no such plea, for they had been guided in drawing the treaty, and all the provisions of it, on our part, by Lord Eldon, whose knowledge, diligence, talents, and other excellent qualities, were too well known to render an enumeration of them necessary in that House. The treaty, therefore, on our part, had all the advantages which belong to consummate understanding, and the habits of professional accuracy in the construction of written instruments. He was thoroughly persuaded, also, that in another branch of the negotiation he should be without excuse if the treaty was defective; for there never was a period when the business of the office in Downing Street was more ably conducted than at the present moment. He knew that some insinuations had gone forth upon the subject of the conduct of the negotiation. He knew there were some who had doubted the propriety of that selection, to whom he would say, that the able person here alluded to not only conducted himself in a manner which conciliated affection, and attached personal respect, but shewed great wisdom, and exhibited a fresh and additional claim to the many that he had before exhibited, for the affection and gratitude of the public. He said, he felt great anxiety to be spared the necessity of dwelling long on any of the particular topics before the House; for which reason he referred to what had been said by his friends on the subject. As one of these topics, he begged to consider the point of the supposed growing power of France by way of commerce, and its becoming our rival in the way of trade. Upon this he could not do better than rely on what had been said to-night by his Noble Friend behind him (Lord Castlereagh). He should observe, however, in general, that Gentlemen who had spoken against the treaty, had taken the parts of it which appeared to them to be objectionable, without touching those which they themselves must admit we beheld with satisfaction. They had forgotten that the preliminary articles were the result of the negotiation before the fate of Egypt was known and, therefore it had so much the more merit. He was not disposed to enter at present into a comparison of power, and the probable result of it, as between Great Britain and France; but he could not help saying, it excited his astonishment, that Gentlemen, in discussing these topics, made no difference between the probable effect of power acquired by violence, and that which was the effect of virtuous exertion. He knew that language had been held, the effect of which (although not intended) was to create in the minds of the people, sentiments that were very different from what they felt. Some Gentlemen affected to say, that they believed the people of this country had altered their opinion in a great degree on the subject of this peace. He believed that the speeches and conduct of Gentlemen in that House had affected the inhabitants of the metropolis in some degree, and that this had appeared at both ends of the town, in St. James's Street, and at the Stock Exchange. He did not make it a matter of charge against these Gentlemen, but this was certainly the effect of the manner in which they had treated this subject. He did not believe, however, that any effect was produced on the mass of the people of this country; he believed they hailed the peace as a blessing; and he doubted very much whether if the arguments of his Right Hon. Friend (Mr. Windham) were understood in the way he applied them, they would have produced the effect that they had produced. He believed the public at large agreed with his Majesty's Ministers upon the propriety of peace, because there was no proper object for the continuance of the war, and that the people therefore earnestly wished for peace. Some felt a pressure on account of taxes, and were impatient for the peace, under a delusion into which they had been led, that peace would immediately lessen the pressure of those taxes. Many things had been attributed to the war of which it was not the cause, and among these was the high price of provisions, of which the war was very slightly indeed, if at all, the cause. "With these feelings," said Mr. Addington, "I am convinced that the language held out by Hon. Gentlemen in this House (from a sense of their duty, I have no doubt) may have an effect, for a time at least, on the people, to disincline them to the peace, and may have an effect on the continuance of it, unless counteracted. I should, however, be grieved if that were to be the effect of it. I am sure I speak the sentiments of every individual in his Majesty's service, when I say, it is our earnest wish that the blessings of peace may be continued, and we wish to take every measure consistently with the honour of his Majesty's Government, and the safety of the country, to preserve these blessings; and I am impressed with a thorough conviction, notwithstanding what has been said, that the probabilities of the continuance of the peace now concluded, are not less than the probabilities of the continuance of the different pacifications which have taken place at the various periods of the last century: I mean, if the country should be disposed to make provision for its own security, without which peace cannot be lasting. We must not suppose that France is free from the disposition of taking advantage of our weakness, if we should appear at any time to be weak; but let us guard against weakness, and take care to give to ourselves the security which we have the means of giving. By this course, we shall at once inspire ourselves with confidence, and discourage those who may incline to be our enemies. If advantage they can, advantage they will take: but I know nothing in the circumstances of the present time, I know of nothing in the disposition of the government of France, nor in the disposition of the person at the head of the government of France, that warrants any apprehension that the peace now concluded may not be lasting. If this country be true to itself, I think a just expectation may be entertained that it will be lasting. This country is now in a state of acknowledged strength and in disputable power. It is on an eminence, and may continue so, by a fixed determination to pursue a right course; which is, not to invade the rights of others, nor to suffer others to invade its own. By adopting the sentiment expressed in very correct words by my Noble Friend (Lord Hawkesbury) on a former occasion, that is, by a system of conciliation and firmness, I am confident peace may be maintained, and the pre-eminence of this country preserved as high as it is at present. I can hardly wish it to be higher, but I trust it will never be lower. It is the wish of my heart, and it shall be my constant unremitting endeavour, to preserve, as much as I am able, the happiness of this country, which now is the admiration of surrounding nations."

Mr. SHERIDAN.—"Sir, at this late hour (about two o'clock) it is with extreme reluctance that I rise to address the House, and to trespass on your time and patience. I shall not be singular to-night in the professions I make you of avoiding details; but, Sir, in one respect my conduct will differ from any other Gentleman's who has addressed you. I will keep my word.—(A laugh.)—If I feel repugnance to rise at so late an hour, I feel equally strange with respect to the unpopularity which I fear I must experience. It is natural to every person to have pleasure in voting in a majority, though to that pleasure, I believe, I have long been a stranger. Among the strange things we are continually witnessing, is the strange division of parties at present in this House. Sir, I have heard it said that there are about twelve or thirteen different parties among us; nay, some carry the number much farther. Now I scarcely expect a single vote with me beyond that little circle of a constitutional party who have for the last ten years been the objects of so much unqualified abuse; but those men who have so often been held up to public opprobrium are the very same whose every prediction has been fulfilled, and every fear realized. The discussion of this necessary but disgraceful treaty of peace to-night, is a confirmation of the propriety of their political conduct during the whole course of the war. My friends must feel poignant shame and deep humiliation at the situation to which, by these terms, this country is reduced, but which they have laboured steadily to avert. Those who oppose this peace have been arraigned by the last Speaker as aiming at a censure on the issue of the negotiations, and on the Ministers themselves; and certainly, Sir, their object is to condemn the peace, and to cast a slur on the abilities of his Majesty's Ministers. But, in this conduct of theirs, they have at least the merit of being consistent. I support the peace, because I feel confident that no better terms, considering all circumstances, could be obtained. Their predecessors had taken care of that. They had left them no choice, but between an expensive, bloody, and fruitless war, and a perilous and hollow peace. They have chosen the best of the alternatives. Now, says the Minister, they who oppose me, depress the country. I thank these new Oppositionists for their manly firmness in coming forward, and opposing, upon their own principles, this degrading treaty. Let the people of this country be fully aware of all the circumstances of the peace. They have done their duty, then, in thus publicly discussing them. But a Right Hon. Gentleman, not here this evening, an Ex-Minister too, suspects something more. If he has not altered his opinion since yesterday, he suspects their motives. "They," says he, "disapprove the treaty, and attack Administration, because they wish to drive out Ministers, and succeed to their places; and for that purpose they have formed a confederacy." Truly, Sir, a heavy charge! But I must declare that they have never veiled their opinions. Some of them especially have been at all times very open; and I conceive that it would be high injustice to suspect them, upon slight grounds, of a dirty cabal to turn out the present Ministers.—Says the Right Hon. Gentleman, "Upon their principles, they would never have made peace." Why so? we have always said. It is now therefore confirmed, that a leading part of the late Ministry acted upon such principles. But as the Right Hon. Gentleman (Mr. Dundas) yesterday denounced their foul ambition, and their design to trip up the heels of their successors, another great discovery is now made—These persons' principles were such as rendered a peace impossible, and yet the very men who say so have just been thanking them all, as the saviours of the country!!! Can the Right Hon. Gentleman account for this inconsistency? I should think not; and yet he looks so confidently, that I almost think he could. He thought I was cheering him, as if I did not suppose him a constant supporter of the war; and he assures the House "he was a steady friend to it!" But he has now found out that it was necessary to stop. Pray, why not have stopped a little sooner? why not before you were so much exhausted? For instance, when Buonaparté made you an offer? Now, however, he finds the necessity of peace. But is this such a peace as will give us real repose? Consider your debt and taxes, and the necessity which seems to be at length coming upon us of keeping up a peace establishment unknown in this country. It is lamentable to see you all split into miserable parties, when your great enemy is uniting every possible means of extending his power!—You are squabbling about the measuring of ribands and tapes, and the paltry revenues of Malta, when much greater objects are before you! The events of every day seem to call more and more for the expression of a public feeling, that the time will come when the French encroachments and oppression must cease, and when the voice of this country must be clearly raised against their atrocities and tyrannical conduct! The Right Hon. Gentleman says, "We have preserved our honour!" Honour depends more on the manner of doing a thing than on the thing itself. We had a great armament at the time of negotiation, but I don't hear that it carried any point whatever! "This," says he, "is a peace in which we relinquish nothing, and gain much!" Will any man of common sense undertake to prove that? I defy him to name the single object, ever varying, ever shifting, unrelinquished. What did we go to war for? Why, to prevent French aggrandizement. Have we done that? No. Then we are to rescue Holland! Is that accomplished or relinquished? No. Brabant was a sine qua non! Is it gained? No. Then come security and indemnity! Are they obtained? No. The late Minister told us, that the example of Jacobin government in Europe, founded on the ruins of the holy altar, and the tomb of a martyred monarch, was a spectacle so dreadful and infectious to Christendom, that we could never be safe while it existed, and could do nothing short of our very last effort for its destruction. Now, Sir, let us see what we have laid out for all these fine words, which at last gave way to security and indemnity. Why, near 200,000 lives, and 300 millions of money! And we have gotten Ceylon and Trinidad. I should propose, that as we have given to our heroes titles from the places where their laurels were won, our St. Vincents, Nelsons of the Nile, &c. so we should name Ceylon, Security Island; and call Trinidad, the Island of Indemnity!!! Now, if we look at the state of Europe, we find that the Noble Lord opposite has a most curious and convenient epithet, which he applies to what is rather a disagreeable object to him! (Lord Hawkesbury.) He talks of its being in an uncomfortable—was it? oh, no!—unsatisfactory state. Germany, Holland, Italy, they are all in an unsatisfactory state; and so I suppose is Switzerland, which now seems likely to undergo a division among her powerful and generous neighbours. That innocent and virtuous, suffering, venerable country is now, I suppose, in an unsatisfactory state. But Great Britain is all this time far from languor. She is in a satisfactory state. However, a grave and learned Gentleman (Master of the Rolls) tells us for our comfort, that notwithstanding all that has happened, here we are all debating and doing business, in all the old forms and customs of the House. Pray, now, could not this have happened, supposing we had never gone to war? I think he should have made that out before he congratulated us so warmly upon our present debate under all the old forms of the House! The Minister, too, goes on acceding to old forms; he has his majorities according to custom. Prussia can go on too in its old forms! Is this armed repose, this hollow peace, then, the fruit of our long and glorious war? A great deal too has been said to be gained by the disposition of France to lay aside Jacobinism. But the grand consolation of all is, in looking to Buonaparté as the extirpator of Jacobinism! A Learned Gentleman, however, states to this House, that it is the nature of Jacobinism, if driven from any country, always to look with pride and ambition to a settlement in the place where it had birth, and to fix itself there. So now this "Child and champion of Jacobinism," as he was styled, is to become a parricide. The child of Sin is to destroy his mother! As this Jacobinism is by the late Minister stated to be a vice never, to be eradicated from the bosom when it has once been implanted, all Europe will doubtless look to this Great Consul for its destruction. Indeed, he seems very desirous of extending his care to his neighbours! Suppose you make him King of Europe at once, and he will soon extirpate all the Jacobinism that infests it. My alarms begin when the alarms of some persons cease. The great question about the dangers of the French revolution were always upon the degree of the danger to be apprehended. Some danger was always allowed; but to suppose the people of this country so miserably infatuated as to fall in love with dirt, and blood, and guillotines, with all the atrocious deformities of the system of Robespierre; and that now, when France is "covered with glory," though certainly without liberty, or any thing that much resembles it—there should be nothing to dazzle and captivate, is out of my comprehension. If there be in this country men of dangerous ambition, Buonaparté is the man to hold out to them, by his ambitious and successful conduct, an example! an example much stronger than any thing that could attract the people in the exhibitions of riot and murder, unsociality and ferocity of manners! But they say—He has begged pardon of God and man by his piety and penitence!!! Yes, the pious, prostrate Buonaparté has begged pardon of God for making a tool of the Sovereign Pontiff, by bringing back the prelates of the Gallican church, and constituting them, with the salaries of curates, spies and informers. How has he begged pardon of man? By coming down on that honest, simple, hospitable people, the Swiss, and destroying the independence earned by the bravery of their ancestors. How has he acted to us? Why, by condescending to receive our humiliating submission of every thing you had acquired by the prowess of your army and navy! I must trust to our valour to defend us against his armies; and I pray Heaven to protect us against the effects of his penitence and piety! I must confess, that nothing has been stated against this peace unaccompanied by proofs. I would rather have given to France Malta, and taken the Cape, than have made this absurd arrangement! If the late Secretary for the war department were here—who is perhaps (Looking at Mr. Pitt) by proxy—he might have made a whimsical charge against the present Ministers. He (Mr. Dundas) said, that "the Minister, who should give up the Cape would deserve to lose his head!!"—There sits the Minister, however, with his head safe upon his shoulders. I have almost a mind to attack him on the authority of Mr. Dundas! Malta would have been a great acquisition to us; and therein I agree with the War Secretary. It would have stood, with the British standard flying in the centre of the Mediterranean, "like a great sea-mark, saving those that eye it!" Ministers say, the Emperor of Russia would not take care of Malta. If they will tell me so upon their honour, I will believe them; otherwise, upon my honour, I won't believe any body that says so. That did not appear to be Paul's idea of it. Perhaps he was mad! There was, however, some method in his madness: but, Sir, there's a message which Buonaparté has sent to his Tribunal concerning some Russian soldiers, who are to go and take good care of the republic of the Seven Islands! and they may probably be intended for Alexandria, and may be connected with some plan against Turkey. Sir, if any thing in the shape of a statesman will say in this House, that he looks at that power, "at which the world turns pale," without apprehension, as the Minister seems to tell us to-night, I must say he has a prodigious stock of courage; but I cannot give him credit for wisdom as a statesman. But he has found an excellent reason for not being afraid of Buonaparté. He says, colonies will give him commerce, and that the enjoyment of trade and wealth will divert his mind from war, and be a pledge of future peace. Sir, I do not know what France will be; but I do know that she is now a hard iron republic. Buonaparté, from his military education, and the sort of company he has kept, they allow, is as yet a little rough; but then, if we could only catch him and clap him behind the counter, he will become perfectly civil and quiet. Sir, when I was reading the treaty, I thought all the names of foreign places, viz. Pondicherry, Chandemagore, Cochín, Martinico, &c. all cessions. Not they: they are all so many traps and holes to catch this silly fellow in, and make a merchant of him! I really think the best way upon such a principle would be this: let the merchants of London open a public subscription, and set Buonaparté up at once! I hear a great deal respecting a certain statue about to be erected to a Right Hon. Gentleman (Mr. Pitt) now in my eye, at a great expense. Send all that money over to the First Consul, and give him what you talk of so much, capital, to begin trade with. I hope the Right Hon. Gentleman over the way will, like the First Consul, refuse a statue for the present, and postpone it to posterity. There is no harm, however, in marking out the place. The Right Hon. Gentleman is musing, perhaps, what square, or place, he will choose for its erection. I recommend the Bank of England. Now for the material. Not gold: no, no! he has not left enough of it. I should, however, propose papier maché and old bank notes! Ministers recommend us to make France commercial for the sake of peaceful habits, and then tell us how impossible it is for her to increase in trade and commerce for want of the necessary credit and capital!

There my prospect was damped! I was going now to India, but I remember I promised to avoid detail. I must keep my word. There was some Northern logic here last night—something specious—a kind of Northern lights—pretty enough to look at, but not very useful, about our possessions having a better security in India without, than with, our enemy's recognition of our rights. This I confess I cannot understand. The Right Hon. Gentleman asks, whether they would have been justified in breaking off the treaty? That's a question between him and those who like the preliminaries; but it is otherwise with those who like neither. The Secretary at War (Mr. Yorke) has said, Buonaparté will look at us with a "soldier's eye." I think he will with that of a statesman! Now the city militia, and some other corps, are disbanded, it is not exactly a spectacle for a soldier's eye. One cannot walk along the streets without hearing doubts expressed of the nature and security of the peace! And the next great inquiry is, "Pray, who is Minister now? Is there, then, an Interior and an Exterior Prime Minister? —one who appears to the world, and another "secret, irresponsible, directing Minister?" Certainly in many respects I have given my testimony in behalf of the present Ministers: in nothing more than for making the best peace, perhaps, that they could, after their predecessors had left them in such a deplorable situation! But the present Ministers continue to identify themselves with the former. They have ministerially supported a refusal to inquire into the state of the country, just as they were about to take the Government; they have passed an indemnity bill, and since that a security bill, in a resolution of thanks; and these are the only indemnity and security acquired!!! The Ex-Ministers are quite separate and distinct, and yet they and the new Ministers are all Honourable Friends! What is the meaning of this mysterious connexion? Why don't the Minister defend his peace on the only good grounds of defence? Does he hold that situation only to make peace, and leave it for his predecessor? Do they bargain for support, on one side of talent, and on the other of power? No Minister of this country ever condescended to act under such an incomprehensible connexion, and to receive such equivocal support! Part of the case is clear. If the late Minister attacked the treaty, the present would turn round, and say, "You brought me into a situation of necessity—You compelled me to sign a disgraceful treaty—You had been arrogant, and I have put up with indignity—Buonaparté, by his Minister Otto, would laugh at me!—This work is yours—You placed us in this sad dilemma!" The Minister takes no strong ground of defence: I won't say he dare not take it.—There he sits to receive the attacks of the new confederacy, who are not great in numbers, but in talents. The Ex-Minister is mounted on a kind of bill fort to fire down on the assailants, but the garrison is all manned with deserters from the principles of the war! I should like to support the present Minister on fair ground: but what is he? a sort of outside passenger; or rather a man leading the horses round a corner, while reins, and whip, and all, are in the hands of the coachman on the box!—(Looks at Mr P.'s elevated seat, three or four benches above that of the Treasury.)—Why not have an union of the two Ministers, or, at least, some intelligible connexion? When the Ex-Minister quitted office, almost all the subordinate Ministers kept their places! How was it that the whole family did not move together? Had he only one covered waggon to carry away friends and goods? Or has he left directions behind him that they may know where to call? The only way in which I can solve this strange division of parts is this: Aristophanes, a Greek author, whom a Noble Lord will understand (Lord Belgrave), but whom I must translate for the benefit of the country gentlemen, tells a story somewhat in point. He says that Nycias sat so long in one posture (perhaps as long as the Ex-Minister sat on the Treasury Bench), that he adhered to the seat; so that when Hercules came to snatch him away, in the sudden jerk a certain portion of his sitting part was left behind him.—(Lord laughing.)—The House can make the allusion. Sir, this is not a noble, manly kind of coalition between these Gentlemen. Of the Ex-Minister I would just say, that no man admires his splendid talents more than I do. If ever there was a man formed and fitted by nature to benefit his country, and to give it lustre, he is such a man. He has too much good sense, taste, and talent, to set his mind upon ribbands, stars, titles, and other appendages and idols of rank. He is of a nature not at all suited to be the creature or tool of any court.—(Mr. Pitt bowed repeatedly.)—But while I thus say of him no more than I think his character and great talents deserve, I must tell him how grossly he has misapplied them in the politics of this country. I must tell him again how he has augmented our national debt, and of the lives lost in this war. I must tell him he has done more against the privileges of the people, increased more the power of the Crown, and injured more the constitution of his country, than any Minister that I can mention. Respecting the resignation of the late Ministry, I don't believe one word of what is said about Catholic emancipation. I could as soon believe that it was because they had discovered the longitude. If they did go out on that ground, they were certainly at liberty so to do. But after they quitted their situations they circulated a paper in Ireland, attributing the failure of an indispensable measure to resistance in a certain quarter (and that quarter was their Sovereign), and directing the Irish Catholics to look to them for hope of relief. If this was short of high treason, how far short of it I cannot define. The non-performance of the promise had, I believe, withheld the heart of the people of Ireland, and might be a reason for making the peace on the terms upon which it was concluded. I consider it fair to those who have entertained the sentiments that I do of the rise and progress of the war, to record the real grounds on which we approve of a peace, the terms of which are so inadequate and so insecure. Supposing that Mr. Windham's motion will be rejected, I have framed mine in such a manner as to come as an amendment to Lord Hawkesbury's; and, according to the precedent of the other, I make it in the shape of a resolution, by leaving out all the words of the address, but that, and then proceed:— "It is the opinion of this House, that the omission of various opportunities of negotiating a peace with advantage to this country, and more especially the rejection of the overtures made by the Chief Consul of France in January 1800, appear to this House to have led to a state of affairs which rendered peace so necessary as to justify the important and painful sacrifices which his Majesty has been advised to make for the attainment thereof."

After some conversation, in which Messrs. Tierney, Grey, Hobhouse, and Lord Hawkesbury took part, Mr. Sheridan's amendment was rejected, and that of Lord Hawkesbury adopted.—For the address as it finally stood, see Register, vol. i. p. 187.—For the names of the minority on the original address, as moved by Mr. Windham, see vol. i. p. 592.

OBSERVATIONS on two Articles in a London Newspaper, called THE TIMES, by Count Dietrichstein-Proskau, Knight of the Military Order of Maria Theresa, Chamberlain of the Emperor of Germany, and formerly Major-general in his Service.

Extract from the Times of the 18th Dec. 1799 } "THE upper circles of the political world have been astonished at the appearance of a letter written by Count D—— to M. de Chateler, the Austrian commandant at the siege of Turin. In this letter it is recommended to the German general not to press the siege till the total departure of the Russians out of Italy. There can be no doubt but that the cabinet of Vienna will punish the writer of this perfidious letter, which fell into the hands of Marshal Souworow, while before that city, who forwarded it to his Sovereign at Petersburg. The worst enemies of the house of Austria cannot believe it would have rewarded the successes of the allies, for private motives either of envy or ambition. But it owes its wounded honour to make an example of the person who has thus committed both its honour and its interests, to the despicable gratification of some private intrigue."

From the Times of the 23d Dec. 1799 } "We are warranted, by assurances the most positive and unequivocal, to declare our conviction that such a letter was never written by the

"Count D——; that M. de Chateler neither was a commandant, nor possessed the rank which entitled him to the command of the army before Turin; and, consequently, that there could not be an object to write to him to protract the approaches for the alleged, or for any other purpose; and, finally, that this gallant officer, whose fame has been thus sported with, had been dangerously—we fear, mortally wounded, and conveyed to Vienna, some weeks before the commencement of this siege of Turin, &c. &c."

Extract from the Times of the 23d Dec. 1799. } "A Sunday paper of yesterday, apparently with no other view than to make a paragraph, has taken upon itself to contradict the article inserted in the Times of last week, respecting the letter of Count D—— to Count de Chateler, commanding a detachment of the Austrian forces in Italy, which letter fell into Marshal Souworow's hands, and was transmitted by him to Petersburg. Nothing is more probable than that the Editor of the Sunday paper should be ignorant of the fact related, which is known to every diplomatist in London; and, from the treachery of the transaction, has naturally been the subject of general conversation."

Observations of Count Dietrichstein-Proskau, &c. &c. } HAVING not been acquainted with the English language before my arrival here in June last, and the papers on the continent that I saw having not copied the paragraphs in question from the Times, which is very little circulated there, I had at that time but a very imperfect knowledge of that libel; besides, having never been suspected by my august Sovereign, whom I acknowledge solely for the judge of my political conduct, and with whose justice and most flattering and precious marks of kindness I never ceased for an instant to be favoured; having consequently not been under the necessity of justifying myself, these impertinent trifles soon slipped my memory, and it is only in London, that, having called it to mind and satisfied my curiosity in that particular, I thought to do justice to it, if not "make it an example," and to do homage to truth. My observations will not be without some interest for "the political world," and will not fail to throw some light

* The Observer, in receiving my acknowledgments here for his good intention, will permit me to observe, that the Marquis de Chateler was not wounded until a month after the surrender of the citadel of Turin; at the siege of Alexanaria, the 21st July; as likewise, that I do not conceive how the honour of that officer could be sported with, or touched in any way by a letter received.

† Men are not agreed among themselves upon the most simple things. It was a point in dispute, whether the year 1800 began the 19th century, or closed the 18th. I expect then to be censured by some for having taken back my property where I found it; for having vindicated my unjustly insulted honour, at least as much as in my power has lain; but as this is strictly personal to myself, they will allow it to be highly proper, that, in this case, I choose to consult my own feelings.

upon the noble and honest means that have been employed to disseminate discord and mistrust amongst the allies, by rendering their agents suspected. By it the game of the enemy has been well played, and has served him better than his own armies.—It is doubtless myself that is meant under the name of D——n, these being the initial and last letters of my name.—The reduction to the absurd is a good demonstration in geometry; it is equally good in history, when facts and dates are brought in question, without speaking of moral absurdities; but this last sort of absurdities would not serve to convince those who pretend to have seen men, governments, or cabinets,—for we are not to forget that governments or cabinets are composed of men—who, thinking to make up for strength by craft, instead of deserving, through confidence, the protection of their defenders, mistrust them, and, by seeking to disunite them, are become the prey of the common enemy; of people that, whilst usurping a power which did not belong to them, wished to bear absolute authority over those that were at least their equals; of agents who, from prejudice, from error, credulity, vanity, spleen, or obstinacy, have adopted personal friendships or dislikes, and have sacrificed to these the greatest and dearest interests of their constituents. Most certainly I shall take care how I make mention of absurdities moral or political, as you please, to people who have seen them of that force; and resume my subject*.—The Austrian army in Italy, of which the Marquis, “not the Count,” de Chateler, was quarter-master-general, and “never was commandant at a siege or of a detachment there,” had opened brilliantly the campaign of 1799, by the three battles won by General Kray, upon the 26th and 30th of March, and the 5th of April. At the end of April the auxiliary Russian corps arrived, in the maintenance of Austria, and composed according to the old treaties existing between the two Imperial courts, with Marshal Souworow, who, in his quality of marshal in the service of Austria, took command of the army. I had left the auxiliary corps under General Rosen-

* I hope it will be found that I have not deviated widely; however difficult this may be, for a person not quite un instructed in the train of events, talking of a particular epoch of this unhappy contest, by not enlarging upon what preceded or followed it; but we must be careful not to encroach upon the task of the historian, who, in the course of half a century hence, will be enabled, without suspicion of partiality, to put together the facts which we have been witnesses of. That will be the period when many a reputation will be placed back to its just level, and when multa renascentur quæ jam decidere videntur quæ nunc sunt in honore; when they will judge neither with a view to favour, or the contrary, of men, concerning the results which they have not been the cause of, whether efficient, immediate, or voluntary, and which they could neither foresee, create, nor hinder.

berg, upon the frontiers of Galicia, ready to enter upon them still at the beginning of October 1798, when I returned from Russia, after having been charged with the affairs there to the satisfaction of my court during an absence of fourteen months that the ambassador Count de Cobenzel made to Vienna, Udine, Campoformio, Rastadt, Seltz, Dresden, and Berlin; he returned in the beginning of the year 1798 to Petersburg, from whence I departed a few days after his arrival. I returned there in 1799, in the suite of H. R. H. the Archduke Palatine, but having been informed of the uttered and undeserved opinion which, doubtless, very atrocious calumnies had given of me to Paul the First, I went from St. Petersburg the tenth day after my arrival, without seeing that monarch, though my presentation to him depended only upon myself. My manner of thinking did not allow me to yield to the representations which were made to me against my resolution.—It was on the 4th of June that the taking of the town of Turin was known at Vienna, and consequently that the works for the siege of the citadel were going to begin; on the 12th, it was known at Vienna that the disposition for this had been hastened; they began effectually the 10th, and on the 20th the garrison capitulated, which was known at Vienna on the 3d of July.—Employed as I was then in the foreign department, can it be supposed for a moment that I did not know it was Lieutenant-general Kaim, and not General Ghateler, who commanded at the siege of Turin, or that I was ignorant of Macdonald's then advancing from the south of Italy to join Moreau? that Marshal Souworow had marched on to meet him, accompanied by M. de Chateler, leaving Lieutenant-general Kaim at the siege of Turin, and Lieutenant-general Bellegarde at the blockade of Alexandria and Tortona, making head against Moreau?—Will it be credited, in calculating the distance between Turin and Vienna, and the time necessary for the couriers—supposing that I had the power to send off any—will it be credited that I could be ignorant of the skilfulness, activity, and ardour of the Austrian engineers, and that I could believe I had time to stop them in their operations by my letters from Vienna? A major-general myself, as well as officer of engineers, is it probable that I could wish to stop the works of so interesting a siege, and give the enemy time to come and cause it to be raised? Could I have that intention in the position the Austrian army then was, divided and scattered in Piedmont, at the siege of Turin, before Mantua, Alexandria, and Tortona, and against the army of Macdonald?—It had been another thing, if, upon knowing the auxiliary corps was going in a short time to leave Italy, I might have had an opinion about some enterprise that I should have believed to be hazarded or dangerous, considering the diminution of the forces which must have taken place very soon, or before the finish of such an operation. But had I the power to stop a siege? I was neither minister of state, nor president of the Council of War. Would an Austrian general suffer himself to deviate from his duty at the instance of a private letter from a comrade or friend? Besides, was not Marshal Souworow the person who was charged with the command, and the responsibility annexed to it? Would he not have remarked delays in the execution of his orders? Who would have dared to retard it, and, I repeat it, upon a private letter?—Marshal Souworow had gained, on the 17th, 18th, and 19th of June, upon the Tidone and the Trebbia, that famous battle which lasted three whole days, and which decided upon the success of so many enterprises going on at the same period, whilst General Bellegarde, after his gallant behaviour against superior forces in the Grisons, where he had been much weakened by the great detachments he was obliged to make successively from his corps, to the right and left, sustained himself on the two sides of a river against treble the forces under Moreau, covered the flank of the grand army, and maintained the blockade of Alexandria, by abandoning, for an instant, that of Tortona.—But till when did I wish to retard the conclusion of the siege of Turin? “Till the total departure of the Russians out of Italy.” When did they go out of it? Could I have the will and the power to make this siege hold on for three months and longer? Let it, however, be remarked, that, to affix this term to my designs, it would be requisite for me to have known that the Russians were to go out of Italy: when had I the knowledge of this project? I could know nothing of it before the end of July, or the beginning of August; for it was not till then that this departure was determined on, and that the court of Vienna consented to it, upon the desire which the court of London had manifested to that of St. Petersburg, of seeing the Russian auxiliary corps belonging to the Austrian army of Italy joined in Switzerland, under Marshal Souworow, to the auxiliary Russian army paid and maintained by England. It was not till the 1st or 3d of August that I arrived at the head-quarters of H. R. H. the Archduke Charles, bearer of the Emperor's orders respecting this, which intimated “that H. R. H. was to give place to the “auxiliary Russian army, according as they “should arrive in Switzerland, and not to expose them to any danger.” I know the many silly discourses which have been held on this subject; they have gone on even to advance “that the Archduke resisting the orders “of his august brother, given in conformity “to the desire of the allies, I had ventured to “reimind him of his duty.” Certainly that Prince would have esteemed me the more for so doing; if he had reduced me to act so, and in that case I myself should have done no more by it than my own duty required of me; but one must be very little acquainted with the Archduke, and injure him deeply, to believe him capable of it.—I will acknowledge on this occasion, that, in a military as well as political point of view, my weak discernment has never allowed me to perceive the advantage that could have resulted from such a crossing over before the enemy, in the middle of a campaign, to replace, as we would relieve a sentinel, an Austrian army in Switzerland by a Russian one, containing an enormous number of horses, and as much strangers to the language as to the manners of the nation, and to the kind of warfare which the country required; to cause this army to arrive by the longest distance from Russia to the line of operation; to make it traverse Bavaria and Suabia, so many times exhausted by the armies of friends and enemies; to cause it to cross and absorb the Austrian supplies of provisions; for it is to be noted that this army, which was announced to have brought with it all it stood in need of, was obliged to come to a stand-still more than once, in want but of every thing, and ever ending with having recourse to the Austrian magazines which were laid open to it; but not without great embarrassments to the Archduke's army, and this not so much from the consumption, as by reason it had not been foreseen that it ought to have taken place upon the Austrian magazines.—Before the Austrian evacuation, such a measure necessarily heaped together, for some time, two armies in one of the smallest and poorest countries in Europe, at least in forage, after what she had been furnishing to two armies, Austrian and French. I have never conceived why they did not cause this Russian army to arrive three months sooner, without losing that time in waiting, to no purpose, for the unlikely accession of Prussia, through Franconia upon the Rhine, and allow the Austrian army to fortify and concentrate itself upon the Upper Rhine and in Switzerland, and to complete the conquest of that country, so gloriously commenced already by the German hero?—I know that my court had no more conceived this than myself; it only consented to it through complaisance to its allies, and against its own opinion.—In a conference which I had at Berlin, in March 1799, with Mr. Thomas Grenville, at Count Panin's, and before that Minister, who was of my opinion, I added to all these arguments this: if they still flattered themselves, that Prussia might be brought in, a Russian army in English pay, and placed between the Austrian and Prussian armies, would be of great help to do away all influence to that pretended rivalry existing between those two armies. I do not call to mind that Mr. Grenville then made me any other objection than: “That this measure had already been adopted “and announced by his court.” Every military man will agree, that the measure which I had proposed, to have Korsakow's army arrive upon the Rhine towards Mientz, was equally agreeable to all circumstances; but it is difficult to imagine what success, and what greater effect upon the whole of the operations of the war, the English expedition to Holland might produce, and in the season when it was undertaken without the concurrence of Prussia; whilst this expedition, directed to Britany or Normandy, might have been probably more efficacious; or, if this should not be thought meet, English forces carried into Italy, at the time of the siege of Genoa, would have done more service to the common cause.—The object of my mission to Berlin was to do away the difficulties which that court might have, relatively to that of Vienna, to join itself to the coalition. This object was perfectly fulfilled; but the court of Berlin remained not the less firmly for it, as I had foreseen, in its pacific system; the reply that its ministry then made me, about the 19th or 20th of April, I believe, was frank, and, at least for that epoch, positive. I consoled myself for it, by reflecting how very few coalitions that are too complicated had had success at any time. I do not know if, since my departure, that court has let any farther probability be seen of its entering the lists again: of this, indeed, I much doubt, and very well recollect, that they flattered themselves much less of it in Russia than in England.—But, I repeat it, it was only when this army, then commanded by General Korsakow, was no longer very far from arriving at its destination, towards the end of July, or beginning of August, that I could know, and that I came to the knowledge, of my court having yielded a second time to the wish of England, by consenting for M. Souworow, with the Russian auxiliary corps of Italy, to join, which I could not have possibly foreseen at the beginning of June.—H. R. H. the Archduke, while I was with him in Switzerland, sorry for the delays this change had produced in the operations, resolved, upon the arrival of the head of the Russian vanguard, to save the little cantons, and deliver the greater part of Switzerland, by a vigorous and sudden diversion: this Prince desired to pass the Aar at Dettingen, with fifty thousand men, of which the Russian vanguard made a part. All those who, like myself, witnessed this attempt the 17th of August, know the natural obstacles it met with, and which determined H. R. H. to send directly nine battalions of supplies into the little cantons.—I left the army the 19th of August, in order to return to Vienna; that is to say, before Lord Mulgrave, who went from England the 9th of August, to repair to that army, had come to it. My researches led me to find this information in The Times, of the 12th of August 1799; and I make this remark, from knowing that it has likewise been fabricated that I had thwarted the object of his mission. How could that have possibly been, if I had departed from head-quarters before he arrived there? I had announced to the Archduke the arrival of this British commissary. I have heard it said since, that he had brought projects quite contrary to that which had been proposed to the court of Vienna, by the courts of Petersburg and London, but did not believe it; for, if the British Ministry had suddenly abandoned an adopted, announced, and, during six months, firmly maintained plan, they would doubtless have perceived, that it was at Vienna and Petersburg where that sudden and unexpected variance ought to have been announced, and the consent of the two Imperial courts negotiated, at an epoch which still allowed the preventing of the above-mentioned determined change, by seasonably dispatching fresh orders to the Archduke, Marshal Souworow, and General Korsakow.—According to what had been agreed between the three allied courts, one ought to be surprised at the refusal of General Korsakow to relieve the left wing of the Austrian army in Switzerland, and, by so doing, to effect a junction with the troops arriving under Marshal Souworow, of which the Austrian brigade of Strauch composed the vanguard; one ought to be so at Marshal Souworow's not arriving himself more speedily with his troops; for it is false, absolutely false, that he had experienced in this any obstacles from the Austrian army, which, besides the before-mentioned brigade of Strauch, and a good number of staff-officers, which the Marshal had asked for, had furnished him what he could of cannon and mules, not to say that the horses of the Cosacks, useless for any other purpose in Switzerland, might, from the first instant, have been turned into packhorses. Victory remained with the Austrian army after the departure of the Marshal; witness the action of the 16th of September, and the two battles won on the 31st of October, and the 4th and 5th of November, upon the Stura.—It might be possible that this great warrior, when just upon entering Switzerland, had foreseen the obstacles which nature was going to present, for the first time, to a Russian army, and which he encountered as valiantly as against those which the enemy put in his way. He would have triumphed over it, but for the déroute at the Limmat. Be it as it may, the Archduke, before hastening to succour Philipsbourg, which he delivered, and to Mannheim, which he took on the very first onset, covering himself with glory there, and, consequently, before hindering the enemy, by advancing anew into Germany, to menace the flank of the armies of the allies, and to deprive them of the resources already become very scarce by the aforesaid countermarch and incumbering of armies, was willing to try a general attack, which General Korsakow thought proper to decline, for reasons which are not come to my knowledge. The Archduke, at parting, left, besides the brigade of Strauch, accompanying Marshal Souworow, Lieutenant-general Hotze, with a considerable corps in Switzerland, and the Lieutenants-general Nauendorf and Kienmayer, with their divisions at hand, to support the Russians, inasmuch as I am tempted to believe, that the number of Austrians then employed in and for Switzerland, was at least equal to that of the Russians, especially in infantry. Every military man, who knows the position of the Limmat, has it still to conceive how an army, so brave as the Russian, could possibly be driven from it: it can only be attributed to the negligence or ignorance of some subaltern general. These facts are known by every ocular witness, and might have equally been so in Russia at that time by reports which arrived there with incontestable proofs.—Having consigned here all that could nearly or remotely refer to the objects in question, I leave to the public the following decisions:—I. What are we to think of those who have fabricated such an absurdity? who have published it? or who, too much enlightened to believe it, have affected to believe it, in order to give it currency?—II. What is to be thought of those who, without examination, against plain sense, against any likelihood, all consideration, and combination of dates, facts, and individuals, have been the dupes of it, whether simple individuals, military men, or “diplomats in the upper circles of the political world”?—Perhaps the public will judge like myself, that “their worst enemies” could not do a grosser injury to the character of the first, than by suspecting them of what they have forged, and to the common sense of the second, than by attributing to them that silly credulity. Perhaps the public will find, too, that the first deserve the most marked contempt, and that the second are really to be pitied.—I embrace this occasion to assure them for ever of those sentiments on my part.

Will of Prince Henry of Prussia, bearing date the 25th February 1802.

I WILL be left in the place where I may be, whether in bed or in a chair, till no doubt shall remain of my death; but while even uncertainty remains, the drawers and closets in the chamber where I perform the last act of life shall be sealed. When it is certain that I am no more, my corpse shall be laid on a simple tent-bed. I will not trouble my domestics to adorn me; but since custom, however, requires it, I will be dressed in my oldest regimentals; and, should my legs be swelled, my boots shall be cut open; it does not signify, so they are only fit for a dead man to wear. Besides those who place a real interest in my loss, no one shall be permitted to see me. I will not tend to an odious and disgusting spectacle, by being exhibited to the public.—Count Reeder shall announce my decease to the King; at the same time telling him, that Count de la Roche Aymon, being charged with my last will as to my interment, shall afterwards discharge a private commission, and deliver him something from me. He shall tell him that, according to this will, I am to be interred at Rheinsberg; that that same desire stood in my testament, which I request him to open speedily; that my burial-place was tolerable, and that I made an epitaph upon myself, which must remain on the stone that is to be placed at the vault on the very day of my interment. That I desire neither flambeaux nor lights around my coffin, it being to be closed as soon as it shall be ready and I put into it, not wishing to stay a moment longer above the earth than is necessary to ascertain my death.—A single person shall guard my corpse, to keep the cats and dogs from it. I do not wish to torment people after my decease, to sit up by an inanimate creature. No cords, no fringe, either in or upon my coffin. The day of interment being fixed, it shall have place at noon, if in the winter; if summer, at four or five o'clock: without any other pomp, my domestics shall carry my corpse down the stairs, and through the saloon of yellow marble, to the residence of my dissolution, which is not far off: as soon as the coffin is put in there, the tombstone, which I have had engraved, shall be placed at the entrance by the architect Reinert; and this having occurred, all is done. I belong no more then to the kingdom of the living.—I beseech the Count de la Roche Aymon to summon together the gentlemen who shall have attended me to my death, with the private secretary Le Beauld and the architect Reinert, in an apartment of the castle, after my interment. First, I profess my acknowledgments to the Count de la Roche Aymon, for his tender attachment to me all the time I had the happiness of his company. I request him to tell those gentlemen that I die grateful; that I pray them to protect each other during their lives; this being the greatest evidence they can give the world that my memory has not escaped them.—I also wish the Count de la Roche Aymon to call together all my chamberlains, cooks, musicians, and lacqueys, and to have the politeness to thank them, in my name, for the services which they have rendered me; telling them all, from the first to the last, that I have made a will, by which I have bequeathed remembrances in money or effects; that each, when the King has opened it, shall know what my friendship or gratitude bequeaths; but that it is natural, without disrespect to any one, for me to estimate those who, in my opinion, have been sincere and open, and most truly attached to me; and therefore, by favouring the one more than the other, I have only followed the impulse of my heart. That I, moreover, being only able to dispose of a part of my property, have not had it in my power to do more than it will be found I have done: but that I requested every one to be satisfied; and the property that he got, to consider as the property that I wish to all; I dying in the hope, that there can no greater proof of attachment be given to my ashes, than that no one murmurs at the little or the much of the distribution. Moreover, I have recommended those who have served me, to the King and my heirs, not doubting but that act of my last testament will be executed.—The sword which I wore in the seven years war, shall be delivered to the Count de la Roche; and I request him, after my interment, to repair to the King, and assure him of my last wishes for him and the state; at the same time handing my sword to him, with the prayer, in my name, to have it preserved in memory of the faithfulness with which I have served my country. Thus is the last act of my life terminated.—Eternally farewell!

PUBLIC PAPERS.

Pope's Brief to the Archbishops and Bishops of France, preceded by the accompanying Letter of Monsiegnor Erskine.

ILLUSTRIOUS AND REVEREND SIR,—In conformity with the orders I have received from our spiritual father, Pope Pius VII. I communicate to you the pontifical brief which you will find attached to this letter. I pray you to acknowledge the reception of it without delay, and to transmit me a suitable answer with all convenient dispatch. —His Holiness has omitted no effort for the preservation of our see; but he has beheld with the liveliest regret, that the urgency of circumstances renders your resignation indispensable. This is required equally for the sake of unity, of peace, and the re-establishment of the Catholic religion in France. His Holiness has given me in charge farther to assure you, that he has in the warmest terms recommended your person to the regards of the Chief Consul; in the first place, with the view of inducing him to fix his choice on you in the nomination of a person to fill the vacant see; or, if that request should not be attended to, at least to prevail on him to make some provisions for your support. Such is, Monseigneur, the desire of St. Peter to contribute to your consolation and relief in every possible manner, that he will lose sight of no favourable opportunity to alleviate the weight of misfortune which presses upon you, and to provide for your personal accommodations. —Having thus fulfilled the commands entrusted to me by the sovereign Pontiff, it now only remains for me to tender you every service in my power, and to assure you that I am, Monseigneur, &c.

THE POPE'S BRIEF.

Pius VII. to his venerable Brethren the Archbishops and Bishops of France, bearing the Communion and Favour of the Apostolic Chair.

VENERABLE FATHERS,—Health, and the apostolic benediction!—So many and so signal are the services which, both as a general body, and as individuals of the Catholic Faith, you have performed, that on this account you have ever merited from us and from our predecessor, Pius VI. now happily to rest, the highest commendations and the highest praise of your virtue.—But although what you have done for the Church, and for the advantage of the faithful, be very great and highly glorious to you, yet the state of the times forces us to notify to you, that you have not yet fulfilled that meritorious career of glory for which the counsels of divine providence have reserved your courage in these times. Greater sacrifices, O venerable fathers! still remain to be added to those by which you have distinguished yourselves, and you have still to add higher claims to those which you now have to the gratitude of the church. The preservation of the church, the re-establishment of the Catholic religion in France, demand a new example of virtue and of greatness of soul in you, which may teach all nations, that the holy zeal with which you burn for the church has for its object its advantage, and not your own. Your ecclesiastical seats are voluntarily to be resigned, and the same must be freely given up into our hands. It is requiring much of you, venerable brethren; it is, however, equally necessary, both that we should make this demand, and that you should comply with it, in order to re-establish order in France in the affairs of the church. We feel, indeed, how much it must cost your hearts to abandon those flocks which are so dear to you, to the safety of which you have given so much attention, and which, even in your absence, have been the object of your most tender solicitude. But the more bitter the sacrifice, the more agreeable will it be to God; the reward which you will have to expect from it will be proportioned to your grief and to his benevolence. With the whole energy of our soul do we call upon your virtue; we call upon you, by the blessed name of Jesus, to complete this sacrifice for the preservation of unity. A knowledge of the distinguished piety, and of the remarkable virtue which we have ever remarked in you in the most trying circumstances of the church, makes us certain that you will immediately forward to us your voluntary letters of abdication. We cannot entertain a doubt that any of the wise and virtuous pastors of the French church, can for a moment hesitate to comply with our paternal advice, and to follow the illustrious example of Gregory Nazianzen, when he resigned the bishopric of Constantinople. And certainly, in the situation in which we stand, what reason can we have to suspect that any of you would resist our counsels and our entreaties, if he recollects what the church in general has resolved, and what St. Augustine has said,—Contra Crescentium, lib. 2, c. xi.—“We are not bishops for our own sakes, but for the sakes of those to whom we administer the sacraments of the Lord; and, for these, as necessity shall require, we are either to be or not to be, as it is not for ourselves, but for them that we govern.”—For you know, venerable brethren, that many of the most distinguished prelates of the church, that they might conform to this principle of the church and preserve unity, have voluntarily abdicated their seats; and almost 300 Catholic bishops a little before the celebrated collation of Carthage, openly professed themselves to be ready, and thought themselves bound to abdicate their bishoprics, if it should be conceived that their abdication would tend to remove the schism of the Donatists*. Many of you, indeed, venerable brethren, had before your eyes these examples, and adopted similar sentiments, when in consequence of the letter of the 3d May, 1791, of the late Pius VI. of happy memory, our predecessor, you professed yourselves willing and ready to resign your charges, if the good of religion should require it, for which that wise pontiff bestowed on them the greatest praise†. Nor were there wanting some of you lately who signified to us in your letters, that you would cheerfully do the same, if it should seem necessary for the preservation of religion in France. Now since we have arrived at those times, in which the voluntary abdication of your charge is absolutely necessary for the good of the Catholic religion, we cannot doubt that you will yield this obedience to God, by making this new sacrifice, to offer which to him you know yourselves bound, and have already so laudably professed yourselves ready, should the good of the church require.—Confidently trusting, therefore, in consequence of the opinion which we have always entertained of your religion and virtue, that on perusing our letter, both to increase your interest to the church, and to preserve the unity of it in France, you will, without delay, implicitly comply with our exhortation; we first congratulate you on account of that immortal glory which you will obtain from this splendid testimony of virtue, religion and obedience, which you are now about to give to the whole church. This glory, indeed, will be so great as to be far superior to the praises you have already obtained, by undergoing so many dangers and enduring so many calamities with so much constancy, for preserving religion in the churches entrusted to your fidelity.—For, according to what the same St. Augustin writes, in his letter to Castorius, “It is far more glorious to have laid down the burthen of episcopacy, in order to ward off the dangers of the church, than to have undertaken it for the sake of ruling.”—We also congratulate you on those ample rewards to which this sacrifice will entitle you from God, the rewarder of the good. For, as the same St. Gregory Nazianzene writes, “those who abdicate thrones will not lose God, but will acquire a heavenly throne, much higher and safer.”† In the last place, we congratulate you, considering those advantages the whole priesthood will derive from these memorable examples of minds labouring, not for themselves, but for the things which belong to God and the church: these instances of obedience, humility, faith, and of all episcopal holiness; with which you are about to crown the end of your episcopacy—this virtue of yours, indeed, will shut the mouths of those detractors of the priesthood, who calumniate the ministers of the sanctuary by asserting, that they find nothing in them but pride, haughtiness and avarice. This new glory by which you will render yourselves illustrious, will excite an involuntary admiration of your virtue from men who will be obliged to confess, in regard to the church, what the same St. Augustine affirms in the above-mentioned letter to Castorius; “That there are some men in its bosom who seek not those things which are their own, but the things of Jesus Christ.”—We are compelled by the exigency of the times, which even exercises its violence on us, to signify that it is absolutely necessary for you to give a written answer within ten days, and that your answer be transmitted to the person by whom the present letter will be delivered to you, which you ought to testify by an authentic document, that you have received, we must also signify to you for the same urgent causes, that the answer given must be definitive, not dilatory; so that unless a definitive answer be given within ten days, (and that you will do so, we entreat you again and again); if a dilatory answer is returned, we shall be obliged to consider you as having refused to comply with our request.—But, that this you will not do, we have reason to hope, from your ardent desire both to preserve religion, and to promote the peace of the whole church; and from your obedience to us, which is the peculiar duty of children, and from that anxiety which you have always shewn of assisting by your virtue, our infirmity, under that great load of cares with which we are oppressed. Nay, we are certain that, with cheerful and ready minds, you will obey our commands, with which we are obliged to try your virtue, in order to establish the good of the church; especially, since you possess too much penetration not to know, that if you refuse to comply with our request, that no obstacles may be opposed by us to preserving the unity of the catholic religion, and restoring the tranquillity of the church—(we declare with grief, but we must declare, while so much danger hangs over the Gallican church from us) we must necessarily have recourse to that conduct which will remove all impediments, and by which alone the good of religion can be promoted.—By the favour and good will which we have already shewn towards you, venerable brethren, by the opinion we have always had of your virtue, dignity and merits, we flatter ourselves that you are so persuaded that we do not think it necessary to expend many words in assuring you, that nothing has been omitted on our part which could tend to prevent you from being exposed to this bitterness. But it is with great grief we must confess that all our anxiety, and all our labour to resist the necessity of the times has been fruitless. We are compelled to yield, that the Catholic religion may be benefited by this sacrifice. After maturely weighing these circumstances, we should seem to question the sincerity of your religious profession, if we should conclude that you will prefer your own advantage to the preservation and good order of the church, forgetting what St. Augustine said, in the name of the African bishops, to the Tribune Marcellinus, when he declared that those bishops were ready to abdicate their chairs: “Why should we hesitate to make that sacrifice of humility to our Redeemer? Did he descend from Heaven in the human form that we should be members of his body, and shall we fear to descend from our chairs to prevent his limbs from being torn by cruel division? Personally, we are only faithful and obedient Christians. This we always are, but we were ordained bishops for the Christian people. As bishops, therefore, let us do what may benefit Christian people, by promoting Christian peace. If we are useful servants, why should we prefer our temporal grandeur to eternal gain in the Lord? The episcopal dignity will be more fruitful to us, if by laying it down, we collect the flock of Christ, than if we should disperse it by retaining it, for with what face in future can we hope for the honour promised by Christ, if Christian unity is impeded by our worldly honour.”—As we cannot, therefore, doubt, when we reflect on your tried virtue and religion, that you will consult the advantage of the church, and the good of the faithful, while we implore the Almighty God to strengthen your virtue, that with more readiness as becomes willing givers, you may offer to him the gift; and while we promise, as far as in us lies, to take care that you shall be hereafter provided for, we confer on you our apostolic blessing, as a pledge of our paternal love.

the Fisherman's Seal, August 15th, 1801, in the second year of our pontificate. (Signed)—PIUS P. P. VII. * MICHAEL, Patriarch of Jerusalem, Report made to the First Consul of France in Senate, by the Minister for Foreign Affairs.

The First Consul having ordered me to render an account to him, in senate, of the differences subsisting between the republic of France and the regency of Algiers, and of the success of the measures which have been adopted to terminate them.—I shall first advert to the previous situation of affairs.—From the frontiers of Egypt to the Straight of Gibraltar, the North of Africa, is possessed by men ignorant of the public law of Europe. The principles and the manners, which in a great degree, have formed Europeans into one great society, and not only forbid the oppression of, but enjoin them to protect and assist, when in danger, the navigation and commerce of pacific nations— which reprobate all unjust aggression; and require that the rights of humanity be preserved sacred: these are still unknown to the people of those countries.—They acknowledge no other law of nations, than those dictated by their own police, which permits amongst them individual violence, authorizes it with respect to foreigners, and consecrates even acts of barbarity and outrage with regard to enemies—they are ignorant that the law of nations, proceeding upon general principles, abolishes those chimerical rights, which a people too much impressed with their local importance, derive from the licentiousness of their particular customs. It is, however, to the honour of Europe, that in those respects, the supremacy of its public law assigns just limits to the tolerance of particular systems of legislation, and which hereafter shall not be unknown, but in Africa.—The regency of Algiers is particularly remarkable for an audacity, which some events have tended to strengthen.—Charles the Fifth turned his victorious arms against Africa—he wished to free Europe from the incursions of Barbarians, by reducing their power; but the success was not commensurate to the greatness of the design, and fell far short of the magnitude of his preparations.—In succeeding times Louis XIV. asserted at Algiers, the honour of the French flag, and in the interval of six years, that city was three times bombarded by his orders. But the affairs of Europe claiming his attention at the time, set bounds to his vengeance. However, since that period, the Algerines have appeared to respect France, and the peace which was concluded in 1689, subsisted more than a century, when, in the course of the year 7, it was infringed at the instance of the Sublime Porte.—Of all the enemies which were opposed to France, when the First Consul took the reins of government, the regency of Algiers was the least formidable. But the First Consul, desirous that the calamities of war should every where terminate, and learning that the Dey was inclined to pacification, dispatched a negotiator to Algiers. Being preceded by the renown of those exploits of which Italy, Germany, Syria, and Egypt had been the witnesses, the consular envoy was properly received. Peace was determined upon, and even notified to the Divan: but a fresh interference of the Sublime Porte prevented the signature. War appeared to be renewed, but no actual hostilities took place. The French, were permitted freely to retire from Algiers, and to dispose of their properties, and the French agent waited at Alicant until the moment when the negotiations should be resumed.—In short, a definitive treaty which assures to France all the advantages stipulated by the ancient treaties, and which by new articles guaranteed more explicitly and more favourably to France the freedom of commerce and navigation to Algiers was signed the 2d of December.—General peace being concluded, commerce began to take all its accustomed courses.—But we soon learned that the armed ships of Algiers scoured the Mediterranean—desolated the French commerce, and infested the coasts. Neither the flag nor even the territory of the republic were respected by Corsairs of the regency. They conducted to Algiers, transports which had sailed from Toulon for St. Domingo. They seized a Neapolitan vessel close to the coasts of France. An Algerine officer dared to make a French trading captain undergo a most infamous treatment in the road of Tunis. The barques of the coral company, which were, by the terms of the treaty free to dispose of their fish, were violently repulsed from the coasts. The Charge d'Affaires called in vain for satisfaction—they even dared to make propositions injurious to the dignity of the French people—they even proposed—that France should pay for the execution of the treaty.—The First Consul on being informed of those circumstances, ordered that a naval division should be stationed before Algiers.—I transmitted by his orders, the instructions by which the Charge d'Affaires, citizen Dubois Thainville is to regulate his conduct, agreeably to the dictates of prudence, but at the same time with energy and dignity.—The division commanded by Rear-Admiral Leissegues, appeared before Algiers, the 5th of August, and carrying on board an officer of the palace, the adjutant Hullin, charged with a letter from the First Consul to the Dey.—On the 6th of August this officer landed—he was received with distinction, and he presented the letter of the First Consul which is conceived in the following terms:

"Buonaparte, First Consul of the French Republic, to the Most High and Most Magnificent the Dey of Algiers, whom God preserve in prosperity and glory.
"I write this letter directly to you, because I know there are among your ministers some who deceive you, and who induce you to conduct yourself in a manner which may bring on you great misfortunes. This letter will be given into your own hand by an adjutant of my palace. The object of it is to demand a prompt reparation, such as I have a right to expect, from the sentiments which you have always shewn for me. A French officer has been beaten in the road of Tunis, by one of your captains, Rais. The agent of the republic has demanded satisfaction, and has been unable to obtain it. Two armed brigs have been taken by your corsairs, who carried them into Algiers, and retarded them in their voyage. A Neapolitan vessel has been taken by your corsairs, in

* Note of Editor.—The archbishops and bishops, in London, to whom this brief was addressed, wrote an answer to his Holiness, in which they gave their reasons for not complying with his request. This answer shall appear in our next Supplement.

"the road of Hieres, and by this they have violated the French territory. Finally, I still want 150 men of the crew of the vessel that was wrecked on your coast last winter, who are in the hands of the barbarians. I demand of you redress for all these grievances; and having no doubt of your taking all the measures which I would in similar circumstances, I send a vessel to bring home the 150 men that I want. I pray you also to look with distrust on those of your ministers who are enemies to France; you cannot have greater enemies, and if I desire to live in peace with you, it is no less necessary for you to preserve this good understanding which has been re-established, and which alone can maintain you in the rank and prosperity in which you are, for God has decreed that all those who are unjust towards me should be punished. If you wish to live in good friendship with me, you must not treat me as a feeble power, you must cause the French flag to be respected as well as that of the Italian Republic, which has appointed me its Chief, and you must give me redress for all the outrages which have been done to me. This letter, having no other object, I pray you to read it with attention, and to inform, by return of the officer whom I send to you, what you may think proper to do."

Whatever may have been the internal sentiments of the Dey, he shewed only the most lively desire to live in good understanding with the French Republic. "I wish," said he, to be always "the friend of Buonaparte." He promised, and actually gave, all the satisfaction required. In order to shew a particular respect for the First Consul in the person of his envoy, he wished even to deviate from the usual forms, and, contrary to the immemorial custom of the regents, he received in the most magnificent kiosque in his garden the officer of the palace, the Charge des Affaires of the republic, Rear-Admiral Lesseques, and his numerous staff. It was there that he gave to General Hullin the answer which he had prepared for the First Consul, and of which the tenor is as follows:

"In the name of God alone, of the man of God, master of us, illustrious and magnificent Lord Mustapha Pacha, Dey of Algiers, whom God preserve in glory.—To our friend Buonaparte, First Consul of the French republic, President of the Italian Republic.—I salute you; the peace of God be with you.—Hereinafter, my friend, I notify to you, that I have received your letter, dated the 29th Messidor (18th July); I have read it, it was presented to me by the general of your palace and your vekil, Dubois Thainville. I answer you article by article.—I. You complain of the Rais Ali Tatur. Though he is one of my jol dachas, I arrested him in order to put him to death. At the moment of execution, your vekil demanded his pardon in your name, and for your sake I have set him free.—II. You demand of me the Neapolitan polacre taken, you say under the cannon of France. The details that have been laid before you on this head, are not exact; but according to your desire, I have set at liberty eighteen christians, forming her crew, and I have given them up to your vekil.—III. You demand a Neapolitan vessel, which is said to have sailed from Corfu with French property. No French papers were found; but, according to your desire, I have "given liberty to the crew, and I have given them up to your vekil.—IV. You require of me the punishment of the Rais who brought in here two vessels belonging to the French Republic. According to your desire, I have deprived him of his command; but I must inform you, that my Rais do not know how to read European characters, they know nothing but the accustomed passport; and for this reason it is proper that the ships of war of the Republic should make some signal, in order to be known by my corsairs.—V. You demand 150 men, who, you say, are in my dominions: God has willed that these men should be lost, and I am sorry for it.—VI. You say there are men who give me advice, tending to produce a misunderstanding with you. Our friendship is ancient and solid; and all who strive to make us quarrel, shall fail.—VII. You require me to enter into terms of amity with the Italian Republic. At your request I shall respect its flag equally as your own. To the same request, from any other person, I would not, for a million of piastres, have agreed.—VIII. You have refused the 200,000 piastres which I asked in compensation for the losses I had sustained on your account; whether you give or withhold them we shall equally remain in friendship.—IX. I have settled with your agent, my friend Dubois Thainville, every thing respecting Calle, and your people are at liberty to come to the coral fishery as soon as they please. Your African company shall enjoy its old privileges. I have directed the Bey of Constantine to grant it, in all cases, his protection.—X. I have satisfied you to your own wishes, I expect from you the like satisfaction.—XI. I therefore request you to give particular orders that no nations which are at enmity with me, may sail under your flag, or under that of the Italian Republic; and this to prevent all future disputes between us that our mutual friendship may be permanent.—XII. I have given orders to all my commanders at sea to respect the French flag. The first that brings a French prize into any of my ports shall be punished.—Should any future difference arise, write to me directly; and it shall be settled to your wishes.—May God preserve you in health and glory!—Algiers, the 13th day of the lunar month Rabiad Ewel, the year of the Hegira, 1217."

I cannot conclude this report to the First Consul without adding, that Adjutant Commandant Hullin, and Rear-Admiral Lesseques, have executed their commission with dignity, firmness, and moderation.

The Envoys of the Republics, Guarantees of the Independence of the Valais, to the People of the Valais.—Sion, Sept. 5, 1802.

Citizens of the Valais.—The French government, at the first moment of peace, which it had gloriously restored to Europe, occupied itself with the means of making you enjoy its beneficial effects, by putting an end to that state of indetermination among you which is always painful to the people.—The Helvetic Government, animated with the same sentiments, has been eager to concur in it, and that of the Italian Republic, has acceded with an equal sentiment of friendship.—Wishing to consolidate your liberty, by making you enter into relations equally beneficial with the three Republics, by which you are surrounded, the French, Italian, and Helvetic Governments, have concluded between them a solemn treaty which establishes your independence, under the support and guarantee of those three Republics. They have sent us to you to sign and deposit in the hands of your representatives assembled in Legitimate Diet this compact, which is become the foundation and the axis of a free and happy existence to you; and they have directed us to concur, in order that you may have a constitution and a government which shall be the free result of your choice, and which shall make you speedily enjoy that independence which the Helvetic government have just solemnly granted you.—We are come to fulfil this important task; the Republic of the Valais exists, and it is only necessary that her government should be established, in order that she may occupy her station among free nations.—We consummate this work by declaring, in the name of the French, Helvetic, and Italian governments, friends of the Republic of the Valais, and guarantees of her independence, that the Council of State named by the Diet of the Valais, enters from to-day into the full possession of the rights granted to it by the constitution; and we make known to the people the following appointments which the Diet has just made, and in consequence of which we install in the name of our Government, the Citizens—Antonio Augustini, Grand Bailli of the Republic.—Charles Derivaz and Gaspard Stockalper, Counsellors of State of the Republic—Pierre Antoine Preux, Vice-Bailli—Joseph Duray de la Vallaz and Jacques Quartery, Vice-Counsellors of State of the Republic.—May the prosperity of the people of the Valais be hereafter the effect of the wisdom and solicitude of the Government; may it be the consequence of the tranquillity and order which shall reign among you. It is by a total oblivion of past vicissitudes, it is by the silence of the passions which they may have irritated, it is by a sincere return to concord and to fraternal union which formerly constituted your happiness, that you will cement it anew.—You will thus preserve the esteem and good will of our Government; it is with the sentiment of the greatest interest that we come to make you feel the first effects of them, and that we renew the assurance of them.—(Signed)—Turreau, Lamertenghi, Muller Friedberg.

[In the installation of the new government of the Republic of the Valais, which took place by the above proclamation, a trumpeter went first, a standard bearer, dressed in the antique Swiss costume, in red and white colours, which are those of the Valais, carried a red and white standard, with twelve stars on it, which are the emblems of the Republic of the Valais; the garrison lent the sappers which preceded the music of the 87th of the line. Three civil officers followed, in black costume, on horseback. The proclamation was preceded and followed by flourishes of music. When it had been read in all the principal places, the procession returned to the town-house, where the Diet holds its sittings. The colours were suspended from the windows, amidst universal acclamations, which the music alone put an end to. After the proclamation, the Bishop of Sion was invited by the Diet to come among them; a deputation of the Diet went to him, and accompanied him. The Diet then proceeded, with the Bishop at their head, followed by the Council of State, and the rest of the members of the Diet, to the cathedral, where Te Deum was celebrated in grateful thanks, for the restoration of the Republic of the Valais.—The Council of State gave a splendid dinner to the Envoys of the three Republics, the Chiefs, and principal officers of the French military corps, the members of the Diet, and a great number of distinguished citizens, even from the country parts, where several toasts were drank—the first, to Napoleone Buonaparté, First Consul of France, and President of the Italian Republic, Restorer of the Valais. In the evening there were fire-works, illuminations, inscriptions, &c.; and the day concluded with a grand ball given by government, and by feux de joie, in all the mountains round the town, which prove that the town and the country parts are equally satisfied.]

Leissegnes, Rear-Admiral, to the French Minister of Marine and the Colonies.—Toulon, Sept. 26.

“Citizen Minister,—I had the honour to transmit to you the result of my operations at Algiers. This letter contains my operations at Tunis.”—The Admiral proceeds to give an account of his voyage to Tunis, where he arrived on the 26th of August, and went ashore on the 29th. On the next day he was introduced to the Bey.—The following is the account of his interview:—“At nine in the morning, accompanied by the Commissary-General, the Captains, my officers, and the French merchants, I went in ceremony to Barde (the place of the Bey’s residence, about a league from Tunis). As soon as I was introduced to the Bey with my suite, I advanced to him and took him by the hand, which he pressed very affectionately.—Having taken a place by his side, I said to him, ‘that the First Consul had ordered me to anchor in the harbour of Tunis, in order that I might make known to him, that he had been informed, that the Christian slaves who were in the galleys were ill-treated; that several had perished with misery, and by the blows they had received; that he would have me acquaint him that being at peace with the Neapolitan and other powers of the Mediterranean, he desired that, if he continued to make Christian slaves, he would ensure subsistence to them, that they should be treated as prisoners of war, and that care should be taken not to use them ill; that several slaves had been made by his corsairs four years ago, in a descent upon Isle St. Pierre; that these unhappy Sardinians had been taken in the house of the agent of the French Republic; that he expected him to release them immediately; that for the rest, he desired the ancient commercial relations to be renewed between Africa and the French coast; and that he hoped he would protect our commerce, and prohibit his corsairs from insulting the French flag, and the flag of the Italian Republic.’—The Bey replied that he was much flattered by the desire the First Consul had to live upon amicable terms with the Regency; that it was his own greatest desire to do the same, and that what the First Consul wished, being just and reasonable, he adhered to it with great willingness; that, for the rest, he was going to send to Paris an embassy which should be charged to treat with him, and to compliment him on his prosperity.—He then ordered coffee to be served, and took it with us, (which is the mark of the greatest distinction and politeness the prince can shew in audience).—A few moments after I quitted the Bey, and went with my suite to the Prime Minister’s, who had requested me to do him that honour. He received us in a very friendly manner, had coffee served, and ordering some arms to be brought which he used, he presented me with a very fine scymetar, mounted with gold, which he requested me to accept, as a mark of friendship.—Upon my return to the Commissary General’s, I received a visit from the Charges d’Affaires of England, Holland, Spain, Denmark, Sweden, and the United States.—On the next day, accompanied by Citizen Devoire, I returned to the different Charges d’Affaires, as well as to the French merchants, the visit they had paid me.”—The Admiral proceeds to give an account of his having visited and dined with the Prime Minister, to whom he gave in return a splendid dinner on board his ship, and whom he presented with some brocades of the manufacture of Lyons.—On the 11th of September he had another interview with the Bey.—“As soon as I arrived at the Bey’s, I renewed the demand I had made in our former interview. I demanded the release of twenty-two individuals, whose mothers were born in Corsica, and which he granted with some difficulty, making complaint with respect to the slaves whose escape our sailors had occasioned. I made no difficulty in proposing to him the payment of the ransom of all the individuals whose escape had been produced by our sailors.—It was in this audience that the Bey told me, that, meaning to send an ambassador to congratulate the First Consul on his appointment to the Consulship for life, he desired I would give him a passage on board my ship. He added, that he should be much flattered by my doing him the honour to accompany him to Paris. I acquiesced in the demand, and promised to do every thing to his satisfaction that depended upon me. We separated, very well contented with each other.—On the 15th of Sept. I went to Barde to take leave of the Bey. After some compliments on his part, he renewed his entreaty with respect to his ambassador, and I took leave, loaded with marks of friendship and esteem.—The Admiral, after mentioning the arrival of the released slaves, the presents destined for the First Consul, and of the Tunisian Ambassador, says, that he set sail on the 20th September, and arrived on the 27th at Toulon. He adds, that there were not at Tunis, nor in the environs, any symptoms of the plague, nor any contagious disorder, and that he had not lost a man.—He annexes to his letter a list of the slaves released by the Dey of Algiers, and on board of his division; and of the slaves who had taken refuge in his ships at Algiers and Tunis. He annexes also a list of the Tunisian Ambassador’s suite, and of the presents destined for the First Consul. They are:—Six Arab horses, for the first Consul; two mares, three lions, three ostriches, twelve antelopes, (three died on the passage), a young bitch: an Arabian horse for the Minister of Foreign Affairs, and one for the Minister of Marine.

Note addressed by the French Minister at the Diet of Ratisbon, to the Imperial Plenipotentiary, and to the Sub-Delegate for Bohemia, and which had been communicated to him by the said Minister, and afterwards by the Russian Minister.

The undersigned received on the 26th inst. a Note of the Imperial Plenipotentiary and the Sub-Delegates of Bohemia, containing the communication of the same wishes which they made at the opening of the Extraordinary Deputation of the Empire: he finds with confidence, and with the most lively interest, the hope of the approaching co-operation of his Imperial Majesty, in the intention of the mediating powers, and is very far from doubting that his Majesty has not made propositions the most proper, to remove every difficulty. That object may, however, be accomplished, without the deputation suspending its labours, which are too necessary for the tranquillity of Germany, and which at the same time will actuate the moment so much desired by his Imperial Majesty himself.—The undesigned seizes with true pleasure, this opportunity of renewing, as well to his Excellency the Imperial Plenipotentiary as to the Sub-Delegate of Bohemia, the assurance of his high consideration.

Ratisbon, Oct. 30, 1802. (Signed)—Laforêt.

His Majesty the King of Prussia, &c. our most gracious Sovereign, after an examination of the accusations spread against the order of La Trappe, in obedience to an order of the Cabinet, of the 18th ult. has been pleased to allow the monks of La Trappe to remain in the country for the present, and until their further destination shall be arranged, but on condition that they shall neither take novices, nor bring into the country members of any other establishment of monks of La Trappe. They are also commanded, under the severest penalties, immediately to give up their establishment for the education of children, and to restore all their pupils to their parents. All parents and guardians, whose residence is not known, are hereby required immediately to take back their children, and to apply for that purpose to the magistracy at Paderborn, who are commanded to lend them all possible assistance in claiming their children.—Done at Paderborn, Nov. 1, 1802, by his Majesty's special command.—Schulenberg.

Organic Articles for carrying into effect the Concordat between the Pope and Buonaparté.—[For the Concordat itself, see Vol. I. p. 385.]

ORGANIC ARTICLES OF THE CONVENTION OF JULY 15th, 1801.—ART. 1. No bull, brief, rescript, decree, mandate, or provision, or any other act of the court of Rome, can be received, published, or printed without being authorised by government.—2. No individual calling himself a nuncio, legate, vicar, or apostolic commissary, or any other denomination, can, without being authorised in the same manner, exercise in France, or elsewhere, any function relative to the Gallican church.—3. The decrees of foreign synods, even those of general councils, cannot be published in France, before the government shall have examined their form, their conformity with the laws, the rights and privileges of the French Republic, whatever may relate in them to the public tranquillity.—4. No national or metropolitan council, no Diocesan Synod, no deliberative assembly can take place without the express permission of the government.—5. All the ecclesiastical functions are gratuitous, except such oblations as shall be authorised by the ordinances.—6. Recourse shall be had to the council of state in all cases of abuse on the part of superiors and other ecclesiastics. The cases of abuse are usurpation, or excess of power, contravening the laws and ordinances of the republic, breach of rules consecrated by canons received in France, attempts against the liberties, privileges and customs of the Gallican church, and every enterprise and procedure which in the exercise of worship might compromise the honour of the citizens, arbitrarily trouble their consciences, committing any act of oppression or public scandal.—7. Recourse shall, in the same manner, be had to the council of state, if any violence is offered to the public exercise of worship, and to the liberty which the laws guarantee to its ministers.

—8. Recourse is open to every one concerned. In default of private complaint, that office shall be exercised by the prefects. The public functionary, the ecclesiastic, or other person, who wishes to have this recourse, shall address a detailed memoir signed, to the counsellor of state, who shall be charged with all affairs relating to worship, and shall be held bound to examine into the affair without delay; and upon his report, the affair shall be followed up, and definitively determined, or referred as the case demands, to competent authorities.

Of Ministers.—9. The Catholic worship shall be exercised under the direction of the bishops and archbishops in their dioceses, and under that of curates in their parishes.—10. Every privilege importing an exemption from episcopal authority is abolished.—11. The archbishops and bishops, with the authority of government, may establish cathedral chapters and seminaries in their dioceses. All other ecclesiastical establishments are suppressed.—12. The archbishops and bishops are at liberty to add to their name the title of Citizen or Monsieur. All other titles of distinction are prohibited.

Of Archbishops or Metropolitans.—13. The archbishops shall consecrate and install their suffragans. In case of any hindrance or refusal on their part, their place shall be supplied by the most ancient bishop of the metropolitan circle.—14. They shall watch over the maintenance of faith and discipline in the dioceses dependent upon their see.—15. They shall take cognizance of all complaints made against the conduct and decisions of their suffragan bishops.

Of Bishops, General Vicars, and Seminaries.—16. No one can be appointed a bishop under the age of thirty, and unless he be of French origin.—17. Before the decret of nomination shall be expedited, he, or they, who shall be proposed, shall be obliged to bring an attestation of their good life and manners, from the bishop in whose diocese they shall have exercised the ecclesiastical functions; and they shall be examined on their learning by a bishop and two priests, who shall be commissioned by the First Consul, and shall lay the result of their examination before the counsellor of state, entrusted with all matters relative to worship.—18. The priest named by the First Consul shall use all diligence to procure the ordination of the Pope. He can exercise no function before the bull, carrying his ordination, shall have received the assent of government, and he shall, in person, have taken the oath prescribed by the convention made between the French Government and the Holy See. The oath shall be taken before the First Consul; the process-verbal of it shall be drawn up by the secretary of state.—19. The bishops shall name and ordain the curates: nevertheless, they shall not render public the nomination; and they shall not confer the canonical ordination, till after the nomination shall have been approved by the First Consul.—20. They shall be obliged to reside in their dioceses; they shall not have the power of leaving them without the permission of the First Consul.—21. Each bishop may name two vicars-general, and each archbishop three: they shall choose them from among the priests, who have the qualities requisite to be made bishops.—22. They shall visit annually, and in person, a portion of their diocese: and, in five years, the whole diocese.—In case of a legal accusation, the resolution shall be made by a vicar-general.—23. The bishops shall be charged with the organization of their seminaries, and the regulations of that organization shall be submitted to the First Consul.—24. Those who shall be elected to teach in the seminaries, shall subscribe the declaration made by the clergy of France in 1682, and published by an edict of the same year; they shall undertake to teach the doctrines therein contained; and the bishops shall send a formal report of this submission to the councillor of state entrusted with matters relative to worship.—25. The bishops shall send, every year, to the councillor of state, the names of the persons who shall study in the seminaries, and who are destined for the clerical profession.—26. They shall not ordain any ecclesiastic, if he cannot prove himself to possess a property producing at least 300 livres a year, if he has not attained the age of five and twenty, and if he does not unite in himself the qualities required by the canons received in France.—The bishops can hold no ordination until the number of those to be ordained shall have been submitted to and approved by the government.

Of Curates.—27. The curates cannot enter upon their functions till after they have taken, before the prefect, the oath prescribed by the convention passed between the Government and the Holy See. The process-verbal of this transaction shall be drawn up by the secretary-general of the prefecture, and a copy of it given to them.—28. They shall be put in possession by the priest or the curate whom the bishop shall appoint.—29. They shall be bound to reside in their parishes.—30. The curates shall be immediately under the control of the bishops in the exercise of their functions.—31. The vicars and assistants shall exercise their functions under the inspection and direction of the curates. They shall be approved by the bishop, and also revokable by him.—32. No stranger can be employed in the functions of the ecclesiastical ministry, without the permission of government.—33. All functions are forbidden to every ecclesiastic, even though a Frenchman, who does not belong to any diocese.—34. A priest shall not be entitled to quit his diocese to go to serve in another, without the permission of his bishop.

Of Cathedral Chapters, and the Government of Dioceses during a vacancy.—35. The archbishops and bishops who shall be inclined to use the permission granted them of establishing chapters, cannot do it without being authorised by government, as well with regard to the establishment itself, as the number of ecclesiastics destined to compose them.—36. During the vacancy of the see, the diocese shall be taken charge of by the metropolitan, and in default of him, by the oldest of the suffragan bishops.—37. The metropolitans and the cathedral chapters shall be bound, without delay, to advertise government of the vacancy of sees, and the measures which shall have been taken for the government of the vacant dioceses.—38. The vicars-general, who shall govern during the vacancy, as well as the metropolitans, or capitularies, shall not make any innovations in the usages and customs of the dioceses.

and one catechism, for all the Catholic churches of France.—40. No curate shall have the power to order public prayers in his parish, without the special permission of the bishop.—41. No festival, with the exception of Sabbath, can be established without the permission of government.—42. The ecclesiastics shall use in the ceremonies of religion, the habits and ornaments corresponding to their titles: they cannot, under any pretext, or in any case, assume the colour and ensigns appropriated to bishops.—43. All the ecclesiastics shall wear French habits and black. The bishops may add to their costume the pastoral cross, and violet trimmings.—44. Private chapels, and domestic chaplains cannot be established without the express permission of government, granted at the request of the bishop.—45. No religious ceremony can be held without the edifices consecrated to the Catholic worship, in towns where there are temples consecrated to different worships.—46. The same temple can be consecrated only to one worship.—47. There shall be a distinct place set apart in the cathedral and parish churches for the Catholics who fill the civil or military functions.—48. The bishop shall concert with the prefect the most proper manner of calling the faithful to church by the ringing of bells. They shall not be rung on any other occasion without the permission of the local police.—49. When the government shall appoint public prayers, the bishops shall concert with the prefect and the military commandant of the place, the hour, the day, and the mode of carrying the ordinance into execution.—50. The solemn preachings called sermons, and those in Advent and Lent called stations, shall only be delivered by priests who have received the special authority of the bishop.—51. The curates, at the homilies delivered at the parochial masses, shall pray, and order prayers to be made for the French Republic and the consuls.—52. They shall make use of no insinuations, direct, or indirect, in their discourses, against the character of individuals, or the other modes of worship authorised by the state.—53. They shall not bring to the pulpit any foreign publication, with regard to the exercise of worship, unless it shall have been authorised by government.—54. They shall not bestow the nuptial benediction, except on such as shall prove, in due form, that they have contracted marriage before the civil officer.—55. The registers kept by the ministers of worship, being only relative to the administration of the sacraments, can in no instance supply the registers appointed by law, to ascertain the civil state of Frenchmen.—56. In all ecclesiastic and religious acts, the equinoctial calendar, established by the laws of the republic, must be employed; the days shall be designed by the names given them in the solar calendar.—57. The day of rest of the public functionaries shall be on Sunday.

Of the arrangement of the bishops and archbishops.—58. There shall be in France ten archbishops or metropolitans, and fifty bishops.—59. The arrangement of the bishops and archbishops shall be made according to the following table.

Of the arrangement of parishes.—60. There shall be at least one parish in each justiceship of the peace. There shall be besides several subsidiaries appointed, in case of exigencies.—61. Each bishop, in concert with the prefect, shall regulate the number and powers of the subsidiaries. The plans fixed upon shall be submitted to the government, and shall not be capable of being put in execution without its authority.—62. No part of the French territory can be erected into cures or subsidiaries, without the express authority of government.—63. The priests serving as subsidiaries shall be named by the government.

Of the salary of ministers.—64. The salary of the archbishops shall be 15,000 livres.—65. The salary of the bishops shall be 10,000 livres.—66. The curates shall be divided into two classes. The salary of the curates of the first class shall be 1,500 livres; that of the curates of the second class 1,000.—67. The pensions which they enjoy in consequence of the laws of the constituent assembly, shall be reckoned as part of their salary. The general councils of the great communes may give them an augmentation upon their glebes or grants, if circumstances require it.—68. The vicars and substitutes shall be chosen from among the ecclesiastics who receive pensions in consequence of the laws of the constituent assembly. These pensions, and the produce of oblations, shall form their salary.—69. The bishops shall digest the regulations relative to the oblations to be received by ecclesiastics, for administering the sacraments. The projects of regulations digested by the bishops cannot be carried into effect till after they shall have been approved by the government.—70. Every pensioned ecclesiastic shall be deprived of his pension, if he refuse, without a legitimate cause, the functions committed to him.—71. The general councils of the departments are authorized to provide convenient dwellings for the archbishops and bishops.—72. The gardens and tenements not alienated shall be restored to the curates, and to the substitute subsidiaries. In default of these possessions, the general councils of the communes shall be authorized to provide them with a house and garden.—73. The foundations intended for the support of the clergy and the churches, can consist only of rents drawn on the state; they shall be accepted by the bishop of the diocese, and cannot be executed but by the authority of government.—74. Possessions not moveable, except the houses destined for their residence, and the appertaining gardens, cannot be attached to the ecclesiastical titles, nor possessed by the clergy in consequence of their functions.

Of the edifices destined for worship.—75. The edifices anciently destined to the catholic worship, and actually in the hands of the nation, shall be placed at the disposal of the bishops, by a decree of the prefect of the department. A copy of these decrees shall be sent to the councillor of state entrusted with matters of worship.—76. Boards shall be appointed to take charge of the repairs of temples, and the distribution of alms.—77. In parishes where there is no building appropriated to worship, the bishop and the prefect shall pitch upon an edifice suitable to the purpose.

Organic articles of the protestant form of worship.—Title 2.—Art. 1. No one can exercise the functions of worship unless he be a Frenchman.—2. Neither the protestant churches, nor their ministers, can have relations with any foreign power or authority.—3. The pastors and ministers of the different protestant communions shall pray, and cause prayers to be offered up in their service for the prosperity of the French Republic and for the Consuls.—4. No doctrinal or dogmatical decisions, no formula under the title of confession, or under any other title can be published, or become matter of instruction, till the publication or promulgation of it has been authorised by government.

—5. No change in discipline can be made without being authorised in the like manner.—6. The council of state shall be made acquainted with all enterprises of the ministers of worship, and with all the dissensions that may arise among these ministers.—7. A provision shall be made for the pastors of the consistorial churches, but it is understood that the property which these churches possess, and the offerings established by usage and fixed regulations, shall be applied to that purpose.

—8. The dispositions made by the organic articles of the catholic worship, respecting the liberty of foundations, and the nature of the property which can be the object of them, shall be common to the protestant churches.—9. There shall be two academies or seminaries in the east of France, for the educating ministers of the confession of Augsburg.—10. There shall be a seminary at Geneva for educating ministers of the reformed churches.

—11. The professors of the seminaries shall be named by the First Consul.—12. No one can be chosen a minister or pastor of the church of the communion of Augsburg, unless he has studied for a determinate time in one of the French seminaries destined to the instruction of the ministers of that communion, and unless he can produce a certificate in proper form, certifying the time he has studied, his capacity, and good morals.—

13. No one can be chosen a minister or pastor of the reformed church, without having studied in the seminary of Geneva, and unless he produce a certificate in the form appointed by the preceding article.—14. The rules concerning the administration and the interior police of seminaries, the number and quality of the professors, the method of instruction and its objects, as well as the form of certificates of studies, good conduct, and capacity, shall be approved by the government.

Of the reformed Churches.—15. The reformed churches of France shall have pastors, local consistories, and synods.—16. There shall be a consistorial church for every six thousand souls of the same communion.—17. Five consistorial churches shall form the jurisdiction of a synod.

Section II.—Of the Pastors and Local Consistories.—18. The consistory of each church shall be composed of the pastor or pastors belonging to that church, lay elders, or notables chosen from the most respectable citizens inscribed in the list of direct contributions. The number of these notables shall not be less than six nor more than twelve.—19. The number of the ministers or pastors in the same consistorial church cannot be increased without the permission of government.

—20. The consistories shall watch over the maintenance of discipline, and the administration of the property of the church, and of the money arising from alms.—21. The pastor, or oldest of the pastors, shall preside in the assemblies of the consistories. One of the elders or notables shall discharge the office of secretary.—22. The ordinary assemblies of the consistories shall continue to be held on the days marked out by usage.—Extraordinary assemblies cannot be held without permission from the sub-prefect, or in his absence from the mayor.—23. Every two years one half of the elders of the consistory shall be changed; at that period the elders in office shall unite to themselves an equal number of protestant citizens, heads of families, chosen from the most respectable persons inscribed in the roll of direct contributions, of the commune where the consistorial church is situated, to proceed to renew the number. The elders who go out may be re-elected.—24. In churches where there is at present no consistory, one shall be formed: the members of which shall be elected by a meeting of twenty-five heads of protestant families, the most respectable in the list of direct contributions. This meeting shall be held only by the permission and in the presence of the prefect, or sub-prefect.—25. The pastors cannot be deposed, unless the motives of deposition are presented to the government, which shall approve or reject them.—26. In case of the death, voluntary resignation, or confirmed deposition of a pastor, the consistory formed, according to the manner prescribed in the 18th article, shall choose by a majority of voices one to succeed him.—The title of election shall be presented to the First Consul by the counsellor of state, charged with all affairs concerning religious worship, in order to have his approbation.—When the approbation is given, he cannot perform the duties of his office till he has taken before the prefect the oath required from ministers of the catholic worship.—27. All pastors at present in the exercise of their functions are confirmed.—28. No church can extend itself from one department to another.

Section III.—Of Synods.—29. Each synod shall be formed of the pastor or one of the pastors, and an elder or notable of each church.—30. All the decisions proceeding from them, of whatever nature they may be, shall be subject to the approbation of gov.—31. The synods cannot assemble without the permission of government. Notice shall be previously given to the counsellor of state, charged with all affairs concerning worship, and matters to be discussed in them. The assembly shall be held in the presence of the prefect or sub-prefect, and a copy of the proces-verbal of the deliberations shall be addressed by the prefect to the counsellor of state, charged with all affairs respecting religious worship, who shall without delay make a report of it to government.—32. The assembly of the synod can last only six days.

Title III.—Of the Organization of the Churches of the Confession of Augsburg.—Section I.—General Dispositions.—33. The churches of the Confession of Augsburg shall have pastors, local consistories, inspections, and general consistories.

Section II.—Of the Ministers, Pastors, and local Consistories of each Church.—34. In regard to pastors, the circumscription and management of the consistorial churches, the same rules shall be followed as are prescribed by the second section of the preceding title for the reformed pastors and churches.

Section III.—Of Inspection.—35. The churches of the Confession of Augsburg shall be subordinate to inspection.—36. Five consistorial churches shall form an inspection or arrondissement.—37. Each inspection shall be composed of the minister and an elder, or notable of each church of the arrondissement. It cannot assemble without the permission of gov.: the first time it is convoked it shall be by the senior minister belonging to the churches of the arrondissement. Each inspection shall choose within itself two laymen and an ecclesiastic, who shall take the title of Inspector, and who shall be charged to watch over the ministers, and the maintenance of good order in the different churches.—The choice of inspector and the two laymen must be confirmed by the First Consul.—38. The inspection cannot assemble without the permission of gov., in the presence of the prefect, or sub-prefect, and after having informed the counsellor of state charged with all affairs relating to religious worship, of the business intended to be discussed.—39. The inspector may visit the churches of his arrondissement; he shall unite with him the two laymen, named along with him, whenever circumstances may require; he shall be charged with the convocation of a general assembly of the inspection. No decision of the general inspection can be executed until approved by government.

The Secretary of State. (Signed) H. B. Maret.

Extract of a Letter from Gobert, Commander in Chief at Guadaloupe, to the Minister of Marine and Colonies, giving an Account of the Operations of the Army in that Colony, from the 6th May to the 5th September.

After detailing the first operations of the army, which had been given in former letters from General Richepanse, it proceeds:—On the 24th of May I encamped at Petit Bourg, and my advanced guard attacked a large body of the Brigands, and killed 150 of them. On the 25th we attacked a large body of them in the woods; they were under the command of Ignace, one of the most ferocious of their chiefs; they set fire to a powder magazine, but the explosion only injured themselves. We made a dreadful slaughter of them.—On the 6th in the morning, Ignace, with 400 men, took possession of Fort Bembrick, in which he was attacked by the troops from Grand Terre and Point au Pitre, but without success. I arrived with a reinforcement of 300 men, and at the same time the garrison of the fort also received a considerable reinforcement.—We then attacked the fort, and having carried it, a horrible carnage ensued; Ignace blew his brains out. On the 28th, an attack was made upon Matouba, the last and strongest refuge of the brigands, which was carried, after a desperate resistance. After the taking of Bembrick and Matouba, the fate of Guadeloupe was decided, and the remainder of the brigands retired into the woods, and are now considered in the same light as the ancient Maroon negroes, who only appeared in the night for the purposes of plunder. They were, however, so annoyed by our patrols, that their chief offered that all the blacks should return to their duty, if some advantages were granted to them. On the 14th of June, I proposed to General Richepanse to terminate the war in this manner; but as he was not accustomed to resistance, he would not listen to the proposal.—On the 27th of June they attacked the post of Banian, but were repulsed with loss.—On the 31st of July I had certain information that the negroes had assembled in the woods of Goyave. They were entirely dispersed, and all their resources destroyed, with great slaughter.—Six hundred blacks, and five of the most formidable chiefs, were soon afterwards induced to return to their duty.—Another assemblage of brigands were attacked in the woods of Capesterre, and entirely dispersed. The wreck of this party took refuge in an old camp of the blacks, called Mondongues, which had existed for more than ten years. This camp was attacked on the 3d of August, and the last refuge of the brigands destroyed.—At present almost all the blacks have returned to their labour, and the inhabitants may rest without fear. Almost all the chiefs, and above all, those who are most feared, are in our hands. Doubtless, however, we must still be watchful.—Grand Terre enjoys a profound tranquillity, which appears to be well established.—Our greatest enemy is disease; but the sickness is now sensibly diminished. The troops have not lost more than six men in more than three months by the hands of the brigands, but their imprudence frequently costs them their lives.—He concludes his letter by paying compliments to several of the officers, few of whom have been spared, he says, by disease.

ticles of any kind that are prohibited at this present moment, or that shall hereafter be subject to the entrepot, the unloading of these shall be effected in a peculiar circuit fixed upon by the Director of the Customs.—That place or circuit destined for the entrepot shall shut with two keys.—III. At the time of unloading such goods, produce, or staple commodities, pointed out in the preceding article, they shall be examined, weighed, and numbered, and subject to a storage duty. All produce, staple commodities, and goods coming from foreign countries, not liable to the real or fictitious entrepot, as before stated, may enter the port of Marseilles, and be exported again, free of all duties and charges.—VI. The Ministers of the Interior and Finances are entrusted, every one, in what concerns them, with the execution of the present decree.

Isle of France, to General Buonaparte, First Consul of the French Republic.—Isle of France,

General,—The satisfactory accounts brought to these colonies by the Themis frigate have excited our joy and gratitude.—The proclamation which is announced to them as speedily to take place on your part is expected with impatience, and will be received with enthusiasm.—Your glory, your discretion, and the new benefits which you promise to these colonies, give you a perfect assurance of their admiration, their affection, and fidelity.—If at periods when a prey to all the alarms and vicissitudes of their situation, their sentiments and their actions have been regulated according to the dangers which menaced them, the confidence which has now succeeded to a state so painful and of so long continuance, was a conquest which you only were capable of effecting. The more difficult it was to obtain that confidence, the more sincere is it, and the greater will be its durability.—All hearts are expanded anew, and give a free course to the feelings of happiness, peace, and concord.—The clouds which may have preceded so fine a day are dissipated.—The past is forgotten; the present is happy, the future cannot but be equally so; and all this has been effected by you.—It is with the liveliest satisfaction that I announce to you so favourable a state of things; and I have every reason to believe, that henceforth I shall only have to send you accounts equally calculated to please you.—(Signed) Magalon Lamphere.

All blacks or mulattoes who shall be introduced after the publication of the present decree, on the continental territory of the republic, without being furnished with the authority pointed out in the preceding article, shall be arrested, and detained until their transportation.—4. The Minister of Marine and Colonies is charged with the execution of the present decree, which shall be inserted in the bulletin of laws.—(Signed) Bonaparte.

The Captain-General, Commander in Chief, decrees,—I. That the catholic religion, roman and apostolical, is the sole religion of which the public worship shall be authorised in St. Domingo.—II. These are charged to present to the General in Chief proper candidates for the offices of cure and vicar, and they are to suggest such regulations as they shall deem proper for the object in view.—III. There shall be one curé in the communes of the chief places in each quarter; the other communes shall be supplied with vicars.—IV. They shall also be inserted in the Official Gazette.—The Captain-General, and Commander in Chief,—Leclerc.

Charles Henri Bertrin, Counsellor of State of the French Republic, Colonial Prefect of Martinique and its Dependencies, to the Minister of the Marine and Colonies.—Saint Pierre, July 19, 1802.

I have the honour to transmit to you annexed, Citizen Minister, a duplicate of the letter which I addressed to you on the 9th inst. and sent by a packet-boat which was then immediately getting under sail for London, by which I was prevented from giving those lengthened details which I wished.—I proceeded to St. Pierre with the civil and military officers, on the 14th inst. to meet Major-General Keppel, governor of the colony for his Britannic Majesty.—As soon as the corvette le Berceau, in which I sailed, was perceived in the road, the French flag was saluted by a discharge of fifteen pieces of cannon from the forts, to which I returned an equal salute; the forts then fired a second discharge, which the corvette returned as soon as she had cast anchor. I landed soon afterwards, under a discharge of artillery.—The whole of the shore was covered by an immense crowd of the inhabitants and people of colour.—The English officers and a detachment of their troops waited to escort me to the government-house. The agent of government was received with acclamations and shouts of joy, which proved the pleasure experienced by the inhabitants at the return of the French.—Nothing could be added to the distinguished frank and cordial manner with which I was received by M. Keppel. I found in him the best intentions, and the most marked eagerness to second the views of his government, in delivering up the colony with the greatest order and the utmost promptitude.—After these dispositions, I expedited on the next day the corvette le Berceau to Guadaloupe, whither the Adjutant Commandant Rewbel proceeded with dispatches from me to the Captain-General Richepanse. I address also to you those which I transmitted to him.—Three merchant vessels, of which two were from Bourdeaux, and the third from Marseilles, have arrived here. I obtained permission from General Keppel, that they, as well as those which should come here in future, should be admitted to discharge and sell their cargoes in all the ports of the colony.—As to the English vessels, they will have no duties to pay.—The declarations of the captains will be received by a French agent, in order to discharge the acquits à caution which they have brought from France, when they leave the island, which cannot be before the epoch when the French flag will be flying in the colony.—I continue to occupy myself with the means of procuring for the barracks and hospitals left to us by the English, all those indispensable necessities for our troops, with which those establishments are wholly unprovided. The expense will of course be considerable, but it is necessary.—The officers of engineers and artillery are occupied at present with the inspection of the forts and military establishments. I shall send you an account the first opportunity of the result of these operations.—I have the honour to salute you.—Botin.

R. Lacrosse, Rear-Admiral, Captain-General of Guadaloupe and its Dependencies, to Rear-Admiral Dacres, Minister of Marine and Colonies.—At Basseterre, Isle of Guadaloupe, 5th August, 1802.

Citizen Minister,—I have the honour to inform you that I returned yesterday to Guadaloupe, to resume the government, conformably to the instructions which you sent me. I request you may assure the First Consul of the entire devotion with which I shall execute his orders for the prosperity of this colony, which is at length restored to subordination and tranquillity, by the destruction or expulsion of the rebels, who had given it up to all the horrors of revolt and anarchy.—Health and respect,—Lacroix.

Substance of the Report of the Government to the Legislative Body upon the Situation of the Republic — Milan, Sept. 7, 1802.

The report begins with asserting the necessity of laying before the legislature a faithful picture of the political, moral, and economical situation of the republic; persuaded that nothing is more calculated to maintain a good understanding between two powers, which can only do good by following the same path, and to destroy those fatal errors which evil intentions and ignorance give birth to, and which blind credulity believes.—The report divides itself into four sections. The first relates to External Relations.—Scarcely had the Consulta at Lyons consecrated this new order of things, than a thousand doubts arose upon the effects that were to result from it. Many affirmed, that the new system, so far from being consolidated, would be an obstacle to the general peace, and would light up again the flame of war upon the continent. The contrary took place. The general peace was concluded soon after, and the principal powers did not even wait to be officially informed of the result of the congress at Lyons, before they expressed their satisfaction, pleased to discover in our new constitutional system the basis of our independence, on which principally depends the future repose of Italy.—Already the House of Austria, by means of its ministers, in full and friendly correspondence with the Italian Republic, and under all circumstances, its expressions, and its relations of neighbourhood, leave no doubt with respect to the loyalty of its sentiments. The courts of Berlin, Madrid, Lisbon, Naples, Rome, Florence, Parma, the Porte itself, and the Helvetic, Batavian, Ligurian, and Lucca Republics have explained themselves in the same sense.—If all the formalities have not yet been fulfilled with all powers; if regular and direct communications have not yet been opened with every one, it is easy to see the cause in that crowd of combinations which are connected with the progressive re-establishment of the diplomatic system in Europe; but as all these things belong only to the last effects of political arrangements, and are not of a nature to alarm or injure adopted principles, we cannot reasonably discover in them the slightest subject for apprehension. And this is so true, that the powers with which even our correspondence is not established in the usual forms, have nevertheless received in a friendly manner the notification that has been made to them by the ministers of the French Republic, of the new naval flag of the Italian Republic; the English minister, among others, has recently declared, that orders would be immediately given to cause it to be respected, and to ensure to the ships of the Italian Republic (as is the practice among friends) the succours and protection of which they may stand in need. The government therefore may declare in full confidence and security, that in a short time the external relations of the Italian Republic will be completely established and regulated, as becomes its dignity, and as its interests demand.

Of the Moral Situation.—From the relations of our country with foreign powers, let us turn our eyes to its moral situation. Contrary opinions, the effect of the yet recent effervescence of the passions; erroneous opinions upon public affairs, for want of a rule and point of comparison; indecision and uncertainty, the natural result of the novelty of our position: such is the moral situation which circumstances present to the eyes of the attentive observer.—Reason, indeed, tells us, that the cruel effects of so many long and deep calamities cannot cease in a moment; but passion never reasons. The weariness of past sufferings sharpens the sentiment of present wants; the urgency of the remedy leads men to inveigh bitterly against the delay of it, and the indiscreet hope of a rapid prosperity, which is impossible, prevents them from seeing the effect of slow and gradual ameliorations, because they measure things rather upon the expectation of an imaginary future, than upon the remembrance of the past.—Some have thought that with the war ought to cease all the consequences of a revolution, which, considered by them as the means of conquest, had the usual principles and effects. Others have thought that the war could never end but by establishing the order of things which they had imagined. The course of events has proved to both that they were equally mistaken. But if so solemn a demonstration cannot yet persuade them, how shall we hope in future for faithful and zealous colleagues? how obtain ever impartial judgments among men, some of whom, nourishing regret, live in the past; while others, thrown by their vague disquietude into imaginary space, are continually impelled to the future.—Placed in this difficult situation, the government has made it a law to oppose nothing but truth to error, reason to passions, and the most severe indifference to parties, which it neither persecutes nor patronizes, leaving to Time, that judge whose rights are not to be destroyed, the triumph of true principles, which can alone consolidate the new order of things.—But they must declare to you that to accelerate that happy moment, they stand in need of the assistance and all the zeal of the first magistrates of the republic.

Public Administration.—Under this head the report takes a rapid review of the measures of the administrative system. It states that at the time when the constitutional government was carried into effect, the most contradictory measures were adopted in the different departments—measures compounded of ancient customs and new methods.

Of the Wants and extraordinary Resources for the current Year.—But the consolatory hopes of better days are insufficient for the urgent and imperious wants of the moment.—The government could have wished to have presented you a regular statement of the receipts and expenditure; but how could they establish it upon the experience of the first five months of the constitutional year, when there are not in the past data applicable to the present? If the government have shewn some sentiment of loyalty in giving you an account of the debut of the public administration, they will not evince less frankness and sincerity in acquainting you with what has been received and expended from the day of their installation to the end of the month of July.—This account, in proving to you, that during all that space of time, one farthing of the public revenues has not been sent out of the territory, will inform you exactly of all that has been paid into the treasury, and what has been paid out of it, whether for arrears, or for current services; and in analysing it attentively, you will see that the current receipt has been inferior to the expenditure in the sum of 4,149,222 livres; which deficiency has been covered by 3,299,222 livres, 12 sols, of arrears paid up, and by 850,000 livres, borrowed at interest, viz.

Covered by arrears paid up - 3,299,222

Loan 850,000

However, whatever difference there may be between a regular and complete statement, and a partial account, such as that placed before you, though besides that account leaves some uncertainty upon the precision of the results, it seems, nevertheless, that we ought not to doubt that the probable revenue of the year will not balance the probable expense.—Yet we ought to reflect that the diminution ordered by the decree of the 8th Ventose of 1,150,000 livres in the contribution of each month for the French army, which could not have produced its full effect in the months that have elapsed, will yield all its advantages in those to come; above all we ought not to forget, that from what we know of the paternal intentions of our President, we may hope for successive reductions in the contributions for the army; and that, if he has acquired in war so many claims to our gratitude and admiration, he will not in peace acquire less by his generosity and by his conduct.—The report then touches upon the circumstance that the greater part of the expenses occasioned by the installation of the new government remain to be defrayed, that the organization of the diplomatic part is quite imperfect; that a body of gendarmes is to be formed; that the political importance of the road of the Simplon demands the resumption of the works which have been suspended; that fortifications, foundries, manufactories for arms, &c. are all indispensable.—The report proceeds to enforce the necessity of paying the public creditors, the religious bodies, and the indigent. It then takes a view of the resources by which the expenditure is to be met. They divide themselves into three sorts—loans, taxes, and sales.

LOANS.—An infant state cannot have recourse to loans, because it has no right to expect good terms.

TAXES.—Indirect taxes are hazardous, because the details are not yet known. Recourse must then be had to direct taxes, and to the national property. It is from these two parts that the government proposes to raise the extraordinary charges, by re-establishing the tax of six deniers taken off last year, for the service of the current year, and by suffering the government to have recourse to the national property for the remainder of the sum required.—After having provided for the exigencies of the moment, the government deem it their duty to communicate to you what they intend to do for the future. To equal the taxes, simplify the distribution and collection, improve the produce, encourage industry, break the chains of commerce, protect agriculture, are the means upon which they rely to increase the national wealth and maintain the public prosperity.—But it is reasonable to foresee that the peace lowering the price of articles, the direct impost will appear too great. On that account it is impossible to dissemble that the revenue will not be sufficient for the expenses of the first years of the republic, there remains no other mode to be adopted than that of seeking in the increase of the indirect taxes the relief of the proprietor, by establishing a juster proportion in those two branches of the public revenue.—It is with these views that government propose new regulations upon the law of stamped paper, and a duty of registration.—The report next declares that government have established an office of general liquidation of the public debt; that they mean to propose the consolidation of the public debt liquidated, and assign for that purpose a fund destined to the payment of the annual interest and the gradual extinction of the capital.—The report concludes with expressing the regret of the government at being obliged to demand fresh sacrifices from the nation, but they say, “The time is no more in which the Italian nation could find in the repose of a long peace a reward for her political nullity.” Since the armies of Europe have again learnt the road to Italy, it is proper to recollect also, that Italy one day learnt her soldiers all the roads of the known world.—“Posterity alone is capable of judging properly that genius who has set us the first example of a conqueror, establishing a nation in the midst of the din and shock of arms, and creating a power which he launched into space, like a new planet abandoned to the course of its illustrious destiny. This same posterity will judge us also; us who have so essential a share in this great work; us whom ignominy awaits, if we have not the glory of completing it.”—(Signed)—Melzi, Vice-President.

The Minister of the Interior to Citizen Douleget Pontcaulant, Prefect of the Department of the Dyle.

The government is possessed, citizen prefect, of letters addressed by commercial houses of Ghent, to merchants of Antwerp, and other places, offering to smuggle contraband merchandise, sugar and tobacco.—Such speculations deserve all the rigour of the laws, and have fixed particularly the attention of the first magistrates of the republic.—The government is determined to take up and punish severely the individuals who dare to conceive plans so fatal to our industry. Yet before they adopt these measures of rigour, they wish to give this notice to the trade of Ghent, which, if they neglect, will deprive it of every kind of excuse.—I request you, therefore, to give the greatest publicity to my letter, in order that the merchants may abandon speculations which can only dishonour trade, and personally expose the authors of them to all the severity which so criminal a conduct will infallibly draw upon them.—I salute you.

An Arrêté of the Consuls, considering that the re-establishment of order at St. Domingo, Guadeloupe, and its dependencies, and the interest of trade and cultivation, depend principally upon the presence of the proprietors on their property, requires that the said white proprietors should return thither without delay, under the penalty of remaining under sequestration.—Persons under 18, widows and their daughters, the infirm and the old, soldiers under arms, and public functionaries, are excepted. No one is to receive a dispensation from personal residence, or have his sequestration taken off, unless represented by an European manager, capable of well managing a habitation in which he shall actually reside. Every proprietor is also, in order to have his sequestration taken off, to produce proofs of non-emigration, erasure or amnesty.

1. To the 23d of December, 1806. Debtors and their security are forbidden to be prosecuted for the payment of debts anterior to the 1st January, 1792, caused by sales of habitations, houses, and negroes, at St. Domingo, as well as for advances made for cultivation in the said colony.—2. During the same delay, the creditors of the colonists of St. Domingo, for every other cause than those specified above, shall not prosecute for the payment of their demands upon property situate in the colony.—3. In case the creditors of any colonial person, for other causes than those expressed in the 1st article, shall make demands or institute actions against the property of the said persons in France, the prohibition declared in the said 1st article shall be taken off, and all the creditors shall exercise jointly their rights upon the property situated in France.

R. Lacrosse, Rear-Admiral, Captain-General of Guadeloupe and its Dependencies, to the Minister of Marine and Colonies.

Basle-Terré, Sept. 11, 1802.—Citizen Minister,—I have to announce to you the death of General

*Richepanse, which happened on the 3d inst. after an illness of sixteen days.—The loss of this officer, so distinguished for his courage, his talents, and his success, has excited the regret of my self, of the army, and of all the inhabitants who have had time to appreciate his worth.—The last honours rendered to his remains were accompanied by all that could add to funeral pomp.—The grief of all the inhabitants, and the tears of the brave men whom he constantly led on to victory, accompanied his funeral, which the ceremonies of religion rendered still more impressive. His remains were interred in the great Bastion, and a monument erected to his memory.—The present situation of the colony enables me to restore it to its natural organization, and to the regime of the just distribution of powers. I am hastening to put an end to the state of siege, and I am entirely occupied in fulfilling the intention of government, in imposing upon me the task of restoring the prosperity of this important island.—The remnant of the rebels who fled into the woods, and prevented the army from reaching them, is composed of some hundreds of fugitive negroes, of whom the half only are armed. Their number is not greater than that of the maroons who formerly infested the colony. Their expeditions are ordinarily confined to thieving excursions in the plain, to the carrying away cattle and manioc: they are repulsed as soon as they are perceived, and only make their appearance when pressed by hunger.—I have discovered their retreats, and hunt them down. This system of war was adopted by Gen. Richepanse, and executed by Gen. Gobert with the greatest success.—That general officer being obliged to return to France for the benefit of his health, the command of the troops has devolved upon the Adjutant Commandant Mesnard, chief of the etat-major of Gen. Richepanse.—The army has been reinforced by a detachment of 400 men expedited from Holland, who disembarked here on the 4th inst.—The sickness which has afflicted all the American Colonies has been felt at Guadeloupe: but I have the satisfaction to announce to you, that it is diminished, and that we have now more convalescents than sick; but the convalescencies are slow and tedious, and I cannot dissemble, that in chasing the Maroons, the soldier forgets too often the orders given him for the preservation of his health, and abandoning himself too much to the impetuosity of his courage, he incurs fatigues beyond his strength.—For myself, citizen minister, I hope to be enabled to consolidate the tranquillity of the colony, and render its inhabitants happy.—Health and respect.—*R. New Regulations in the Government of Russia.

*St. Petersburg, Sept. 28.—*The important changes which have taken place here are the general topic of conversation. The paternal and patriotic views of the monarch, and the unwearied care with which he labours for the public good, are so evident that there is only one opinion on the subject. The universal love of his people is the reward of his indefatigable activity: equally great is the admiration excited by the young monarch, who, from the beginning of his reign, conceived in secret the great plan, but with true wisdom deferred putting it in execution till after long consideration, and having made himself acquainted with all the abuses that had crept in, and the means of remedying them. The continual labours in which the Emperor was employed with a perseverance, which even gave rise to fears for his health, had long afforded reason to conjecture that some great plan was in agitation, and this plan neither related to conquest, increase of dominion, or the imposition of new taxes, but has for its sole aim the happiness of the people. The acts by which this wise plan has been carried into execution and published to the empire, are an ukase, giving a new organization to the Senate; a manifesto, in which the powers, the business, and the duties of the new ministers are defined; and an ukase, by which the power hitherto enjoyed by the Governors-General is limited, and a remedy provided against the abuses in the administration of the governments.—The first ukase was published by the Senate on the 22d instant, and contains in substance the following articles :

1st, The Senate is the supreme tribunal of the empire, to which all other courts of justice are subject. The Senate, as conservator of the laws, watches over the observation of justice in all courts, has the superintendence of all the imposts and expenses of the state, provides means to alleviate the wants of the people, for the preservation of the general peace and tranquillity, and for remedying all illegal proceedings in inferior judicatories. The supreme revision of all civil and criminal affairs belongs to its impartial justice. 2d, The power of the Senate is limited only by that of the Emperor; it has no other superior. 3d, The Emperor alone, in person, presides in the Senate.—4. An ukase of the Senate must be executed as well as one of the Emperors. The Sovereign alone, or his ukase, can stop the orders of the Senate.—5. Every ukase in the Emperor's name, except those which demand particular secrecy, must be delivered to the Senate by those to whom they are addressed.—6. The Senate appoints to offices, and bestows promotions, according to the ukases of Dec. 16, 1799, and Aug. 1, 1801.—7. All colleges, governors, and tribunals, immediately dependent on the Senate, are to apply to it by means of reports, in all cases of doubt or difficulty, as the procurators, or intendants to the procurator-general.—8. The ukases, designed as reprimands, are to be published by the Senate only, after complaint has been made of the government courts. The Senate itself cannot interfere in any law-suit till it is submitted to it in the regular order of things.—9. Should an ukase appear, the execution of which presents great difficulties, which is contrary to the laws, or not clearly expressed, the Senate is at liberty to make representations on it to the Emperor; but should no change take place in consequence, the ukase remains in force.—10. The Senators have a right to make the express ukases public.—11. A Senator is bound to make remonstrances concerning such mischievous events in the empire, or violation of the laws, as may come under his knowledge. When in the course of a process, he perceives a deviation from the legal order, be it even in the chancery of the Senate itself, he is bound to lay it before the Senate, that the full power and efficacy of the laws may be employed against the guilty.—12. We do not expect that any member of the venerable assembly of the Senate will allow himself to go beyond the duty of a Senator; should such, contrary to expectation, be the case, the Senator can be judged only in the general assembly of the Senate.—13. In the general assembly of the Senate, the final decision is regulated by a majority of votes, consisting of two-thirds; but in the separate divisions, or committees, unanimously.—14. When there are various opinions in the divisions, should only one Senator be against the opinion of all the rest, and the procurator-general cannot bring them to unanimity, the affair shall be brought before a general meeting of the Senate.—15. The registered vote of the Senator who differed from the rest, suspends the decision in the division, though he shall in the mean time have left his office or have died. The affair must be brought before the general meeting, and the opinion of the said Senator then heard.—16. Affairs decided in the division by the unanimous concurrence of all the Senators, without opposition from the procurator-general, shall be regarded and executed as finally decided, without being brought before the general assembly.—17. In the division, when the procurator-general, or chief procurator do not agree with the Senators, they must lay their reasons before the Senate in eight days. If the Senate does not then agree, and if the procurator persists in his opinion, the business must be laid before the general assembly of the Senate. Should the procurator-general, after the affair has been heard, agree with the opinion of the general assembly, it is considered as finally settled. If not, he must give his reasons in writing; and if he and the Senators still persist in their several opinions, it must be referred to the Emperor, one or two Senators being chosen to explain the grounds which hinder them from renouncing their opinions.

Manifesto published the 22d inst. concerning the new Formation of the Department of Administration.—St. Petersburg, Sept. 28.

We, by the grace of God, Alexander the First, Emperor of all the Russias, &c. &c.—The welfare of the people, whom an all-wise Providence has entrusted to our care, was the first and most sacred aim we proposed to ourselves, when we took upon us the burden of governing the immense extent of the Russian empire—an empire as various in its climates, local advantages, and natural productions, as its inhabitants to religion, privileges, languages, and manners.—Inflamed by the most ardent wish to discover and to employ all means that can contribute to the easier and more speedy attainment of this object so dear to our heart, we have directed our attention to all the causes and circumstances which may obstruct or promote it; and after a scrupulous examination and comparison of them with each other, we have fully convinced ourselves that the happiness of the people rests upon a solid and durable foundation, only when the administration has in its hand the means, not only to correct all such evils as are evident, and shew themselves by their destructive consequences, but more especially to extirpate them by the roots at their very origin; to remove all causes that might give occasion to the disturbance of public or private tranquillity, to discover and remedy the wants of the people, and with prudence, zeal, and activity, to promote in all things the observation of uninterrupted order, and also the increase of the riches of nature and productions of art, which serve for the foundation of cities, and for the strength of the empire.—The examples of ancient and modern times convince every one, that the more suitable the means applied, and the more the maxims of the administration are in consonance, the more harmonious, solid, and perfect will be the whole body politic, and the more content and happy every member of it.—We, therefore, in pursuance of this rule, and the emotions of our heart, following the great genius of Peter the First, who gave Russia a new face, and bequeathed to us the traces of his wise plans, which his worthy successors have strove to continue; have thought fit to divide the affairs of the empire into several parts, according to their natural relation to each other; and for their better administration, to entrust the superintendence of them to the ministers whom we have appointed; having given them the leading rules by which they are to be guided in the execution of every thing that their duty requires from them, and what we expect from their fidelity, activity, and zeal for the public good. On the directorial Senate, whose duties and supreme power we have confirmed by our ukase of this day, we impose the important duty peculiar to this supreme tribunal, to superintend the conduct of the ministers in all the branches entrusted to their administration, and after comparing them with the ordinances of the empire, and the reports delivered directly to the Senate from the court, to form their conclusion and make their report to us.—Having established the administration according to these rules, we cherish the flattering hope that it will assist us in establishing the public tranquillity, the solid and indestructible bulwark of the sovereign and the empire, to the maintenance and increase of the general welfare, and in giving to every one his just due; in animating labour, industry, and commerce, in the encouragement of arts and sciences, so absolutely necessary to the happiness of nations; in short, to bring all branches of the government into a regular durable order, adapted to the end we have in view.—All these branches, in their natural connexions with each other, all objects appertaining to them, and the first duties of the ministers, to whose care we have entrusted them, are accordingly defined and laid down in the following articles:—I. The administration of the affairs of the empire is divided into eight branches, each of which comprehends every thing that by its nature appertains to it, and constitutes that particular department, under the direction of its peculiar minister, whom we now appoint, or shall appoint in future.—These branches are, 1. The land forces; 2. The marine; 3. Foreign affairs; 4. Administration of justice; 5. Internal affairs; 6. The finances; 7. Commerce; 8. Public instruction.—II. The three chief imperial colleges, i. e. of war, of the admiralty, and of foreign affairs, are each under the direction of its minister, who superintends all courts, and all business dependant thereon: with the last is also united the office for the regulation of ceremonies.—III. As the duty of the minister of justice will be particularly defined in the code of laws which is now preparing, We hereby command him to be guided, till that shall be published, by the instructions of the attorney-general, (procurator-general).—IV. The minister of the interior is bound to watch over the universal good of the people, the security, tranquillity, and good order of the whole empire.—Under his direction are all the branches of public industry, except the mines; farther, the erection and keeping in repair of all public buildings in the empire. It is also his duty to use his utmost efforts to prevent all scarcity of provisions, and of all the more absolute necessities of life.—And in order to furnish him with all the means and occasions to attain this end, which we proposed in the erection of this department, We do hereby command, 1. All governors, military and civil, to instruct this our minister, respecting all affairs touching the administration, police, &c. of their departments, and in the same manner to transmit to us, through his hands, as well the usual reports as those relating to extraordinary occurrences.—2. The chamber of finance to report to him, through the governors, on every thing relating to the public buildings and their support, and also give him information respecting the amount of the population.—3. All marshals of the nobility and government to make representations concerning the general wants and general good, not only to the governors, but also immediately to this our minister.—4. We confide to his immediate superintendence, 1st. The college of manufactures, excepting the office for the preparation and preservation of paper for bills of exchange and stamped paper; 2d. The college of physicians; 3d. The chief salt-office, with all places depending on it; 4th. The general post-office; and 5th. What relates to the economy of the empire. The college for the administration of foreign colonies, and of agriculture, what concerns matters of finance, and the printing of bills of exchange, are excepted.—With respect to the minister of finances, the administration of the revenues must be upon such principles as may at the same time prevent the oppression of the people, and be advantageous for the crown, tend to augment the riches of the empire, and provide that the sources of public wealth may never be dried up; but, if possible, rendered more productive. To the jurisdiction of the minister of finance are subordinate—the mines, the mint, the forests, the imperial banks, &c. At the end of every year, the minister must draw up a statement of the public expenses for the year following, and present it, together with a general view of the revenue of the ensuing year, to the Emperor, for confirmation. The functions of the imperial treasurer remain as before, till farther notice. Those of the minister of commerce, who is at the head of all officers of the customs, remain upon the basis of preceding regulations.—Under the jurisdiction of the minister for public instruction, are the academy of sciences, the universities, all schools, and similar establishments, except those which are particularly under the care of the Empress-mother; also the censure, the publication of the newspapers, and all periodical works, the public libraries, &c. Five of these ministers have a colleague or adjunct minister. All places and departments send in weekly to their minister memoirs concerning the things in course. In all difficult points

the minister makes a report to the Emperor, who lays these reports before the senate. Every minister must at the end of the year deliver to the Emperor a memoir, in writing, concerning his administration. The senate examines this memoir in the presence of the minister, and then delivers it to the Emperor, with its opinion concerning his administration, and the state of the affairs entrusted to the minister. If the senate discovers any abuses, it demands an explanation from the minister, and, in case of need, presents a remonstrance to the Emperor. All ministers are members of the council, and have a seat and vote in the senate. The ministers must each, on appointed days, give audience to all those who have any representation to make them. The ministers enter upon their offices immediately. The colleague of the minister takes his place on all occasions, but is only answerable for what he has himself signed.

Rear-Admiral Villeneuve, Commander in Chief of the Naval Forces stationed at the Windward Islands, and at Cayenne, to the Minister of Marine and the Colonies.—On Board le Jemmappe, in the Road of the Fort de France, 22d September, 1802.

Citizen Minister,—The expedition destined for Martinique, quitted Brest the 14th Thermidor: it arrived in this road the 12th of September. The captain-general, Villaret, landed the 14th; the colony was delivered up; and the following day he appointed me to the chief command of the naval force in these seas. The flags of the Republic were displayed on all the forts, and salutes were given, as well by the shipping, as from the artillery on shore, and the commanders of the English division. In short, all the proceedings observed on similar occasions duly took place on the part of the respective nations. The reception given, by the inhabitants of the colony, to the representatives of the French government, was such as we could wish. Satisfaction was general, and the people appeared impressed with gratitude for the conduct of the government towards these colonies, in securing, by wise and strict laws, their lives and properties. They already seem to feel the advantages which French connexion would secure to them, and to keep in remembrance the efforts made by the mother country, and the blood shed by her sons, in endeavouring to re-unite them. We have found here twenty-four French trading vessels, come from the principal ports of the republic, and laden with all sorts of provisions, and articles of manufacture, which has reduced the prices to a rate equally advantageous to the colonist and to the merchant.—The usual disorders have made some ravages in these countries, but their force is now nearly exhausted, and it is universally expected that no traces of them will remain after the winter season, which will here terminate about the 15th of October.—I have lost but five men, of whom three perished in consequence of drinking rum to excess. I have, in all, twenty-four men at the hospital.—

Until this period, the necessity of being near the town, in order to disembark the troops, stores, and provisions, has detained me in the road. By the 24th of December I expect to depart for the Trois Islets—a proceeding adopted by the English, who, during the winter season, repaired to that quarter, for the three days preceding and following the full moons. In pursuance of your instructions, I shall send to you a plan, accompanied with observations upon those anchoring places.—The captain-general, wishing to make known to the governors of the English islands his arrival in these parts, and to begin that course of civility and good neighbourhood, which formerly existed between them and the French governors, I have dispatched the incorruptible frigate to Dominique and Antigua, and ordered her to deliver, as she passed Guadaloupe, your dispatches to the captain-general. I expect intelligence from that colony every moment respecting the state of our naval and military affairs in that quarter. I have the honour to salute you.—Villeneuve.

Citizen Minister,—The division destined to take possession of Martinico, anchored in the road of Fort de France, after a passage of forty days.—Our troops began to disembark on the 12th September, and on the 13th we took possession of the city and the forts, and at the same time General Castella took possession of Saint Pierre with 200 men. The inhabitants displayed the most lively joy. The Fort de France and Saint Pierre were spontaneously illuminated by the inhabitants. Eight years of submission to a foreign power have not made them forget their mother country, nor the wisdom of the colonial system which the French government have adopted to bind Martinico for ever to France. The ministers of the catholic religion exerted all their influence for the attainment of this object. On Sunday last, Father Archangel took the oaths of fidelity prescribed by the constitution. On Sunday next I shall go to Saint Pierre to receive the oaths of Father Trepsac, formerly a Dominican friar. After the installation of the new tribunals, the subjoined proclamation was published, and also one respecting the situation of the blacks. A crowd of negroes accompanied the officers when they were making this proclamation; they made the air resound with cries of “Long live the Republic.” This is the manner in which they received the law for the continuation of slavery. If the reception I met with upon this occasion is compared with that which I received at Saint Domingo, when I proclaimed liberty to the blacks of that colony, it will not be difficult to set a true value upon the theories and the eloquent declamations of their friends.—This colony is now in the highest state of prosperity. The magazines are filled with colonial productions. Thirty interchant vessels, which sailed from different ports of the mother country have arrived here. Be assured that I will neglect no means of increasing a prosperity which depends so much upon the wisdom and firmness of the administration. Government may depend upon the spirit with which the troops are animated, upon the unanimity which prevails among the inhabitants, upon the vigilance of the magistrates, and upon the fidelity with which I shall execute its wishes. Health and respect.—Villaret.

St. Cloud, Oct. 4.

The Consuls of the republic, on the report of the minister of the colonies and the marine, the council of state being present, decree.—I. That all contravention of the laws and regulations respecting foreign commerce, &c. in the colonies, shall be proceeded upon, and judged, in form as follows:—The proceedings and judgment in the first instance, shall appertain to the ordinary tribunals, with a power of appeal, in all cases, to a special commission, which shall ultimately decide. The informations shall be made summarily, and in the way of simple memorials.—III. In the district of each captain-general, the commission shall consist of the captain-general, the colonial prefect, the commissary of justice, or the grand judge, who shall reciprocally act for each other in case of the inability of either to attend. In other places, the commission to be composed of three members of the tribunal of appeal, selected for each particular case, by the captain-general.—With respect to the island of Tobago, the commission of appeal shall consist of the captain-general, the colonial prefect, the first officer of justice, or of three members of the court of admiralty, at the option of the captain-general.—IV. In case of a difference of opinion, that of the president shall preponderate.—V. The inspector of the marine, or the person executing the functions of that officer, shall, in virtue of his situation, officiate as public agent in the said commission of appeal.—The functions of Greffier shall be performed by a secretary specially appointed by the captain-general.—VI. Notwithstanding the above, the ancient laws shall be administered in every thing not affected by the foregoing regulations.—VII. The minister of the marine and the colonies is charged with the execution of the present decree, which shall be inserted in the bulletin of the laws.

Victor Hugues, Commissary of the Government at French Guiana, to the Minister of Marine and the Colonies. Dated Cayenne, Oct. 12, 1802.

Citizen Minister,—I have the honour to forward to you, accounts of the exports and imports of Guiana; the former amounting to 1,461,243 fr. 35 cent. and the latter to 3,021,684 fr. 10 cent.; the balance is therefore in favour of the colony to an amount of 1,560,449 fr. 75 cent. This commerce employs fifty-six vessels, of which twenty-two French vessels are destined for the mother country, and fully laden; eight have sailed for the other colonies, after disposing of a part of their cargoes; and twenty-six foreign ships, for the most part Anglo-Americans. If you compare these statements with those which were made previously to the revolution, you will see the capabilities of this colony, with the means of culture and improvement. The advantages possessed by the colony will farther conduce to those of the mother country, when the government shall have given the orders necessary for our encouragement, and suppress a few monopolizing houses here, which hold the rest of the inhabitants in dependence on them, by means of their ability to raise or lower the prices of commodities of their pleasure.—When a ship comes here to dispose of her cargo, those persons arrange matters so well, that she must have recourse to them to transact her business. This is one of the numerous abuses which it is necessary to destroy; but I think I have succeeded in obviating it. Besides, several French commercial houses of respectability appear determined to make commercial and agricultural establishments in this colony. I have in consequence made certain concessions, which I doubt not will be attended with the utmost success.—Health and respect.

Victor Hugues.

The Moniteur of the 15th Oct. contains a very long arrêté issued by the French Consuls on the 4th, relative to the formation of a municipal guard at Paris. The articles of the first title,

—I. There shall be raised a municipal guard for the service of the city of Paris.—II. The municipal guard of the city of Paris shall consist of 2154 infantry and 180 cavalry.—III. The infantry of the municipal guard shall form two regiments; the one to be employed in the service of the gates, and grand barriers, and the other in that of the interior of the city.—IV. The first regiment shall be divided into two battalions; one especially appropriated to the service of the gates, and the other to that of the grand barriers. That destined to the service of the interior of the city of Paris shall likewise be divided into two battalions.—V. The cavalry of the municipal guard of Paris shall form only one corps, to be distinguished by the name of squadron.—VI. None can be admitted into the municipal guard of Paris, unless he be above 30, and under 45—unless he be 1 metre 651 millimetres, or 5 feet 1 inch, old measure, in stature—unless he has served five campaigns in the war of liberty, has a military furlough in regular form, and a certificate of good behaviour—unless he can read and write—and unless he shall engage to serve ten years in the said guard.—VII. No person can be appointed a subaltern officer, unless he has occupied the same rank in the troops of the line, and proves that he has honourably served during five campaigns, as required by article 6.—VIII. No person can be appointed a superior officer, unless he has obtained at least the rank of captain in the troops of the line, and proves that he has served, with distinction, during five campaigns, as required by article 6.

The expense of the municipal guard is estimated at 1,268,000 francs for the infantry, and 236,000 for the cavalry. The charge is to be defrayed by a rate to be levied on the department of the Seine. The subsistence, clothing, and equipment are the same as that of the troops of the line. The men are in like manner subject to military discipline. In addition to the ordinary service of the police, they are to do duty at the theatres, and other places of public amusement, and, upon application to the police, to attend as guards at private balls and entertainments.

Paris, Oct. 15.—Consular Decree of the 11th Oct.—There shall be levied in future upon woollens in imitation of cottons, from the Levant only, an import duty of one franc.—There shall be levied in future an import duty of 100 francs per quintal upon foreign sword cutlery.—The wines of Corsica are put on the same footing as those of the departments of the Bouches du Rhône, of the Var, and of the Maritime Alps, and shall pay upon their exportation to a foreign market only 1 franc 50 cents per hogshead.—The duties of importation and consumption fixed by the Tariff, No. 1, annexed to the decree of the 24 Thermidor, upon raw sugars, coffee, cocoa, and pepper, shall be levied in one nett sum. The tare to be deducted shall be for clayed sugars, in casks 15 per cent. for raw and loaf sugars, coffee, cocoa, and pepper, also in casks, 12 per cent. There shall be only 3 per cent. upon coffee, cocoa, and pepper, in bags.

CONDUCT OF MR. C. J. FOX.

The following two Letters are copied from the Morning Post. They contain some excellent remarks; but we cannot insert them without observing, that we dissent from almost every word, that the writer has uttered in FAVOUR of Mr. Fox, in whose life, moral or political, we have never discovered any one act worthy of praise.

TO MR. C. J. FOX.

SIR,—“A letter to Mr. Fox,” when not a personal lampoon, has usually been little more than a convenient form and title, for some political effusion, which has been thus dedicated to you ex officio, as the nominal leader of the opposition. I hope, Sir, to have at least this one advantage over your former public correspondents, that while I address you exclusively on subjects of national interest, I shall yet scrupulously confine myself to actions and speeches, which are your's, and your's only. In common with the majority of our countrymen, and, I would fain believe, with all whose minds have not been distorted by political alarm, or sicklied by religious cant, I have felt you, Sir, to be a genuine Englishman. We know that the original web of your character is English, notwithstanding some foreign fancy-patterns, which you may have incautiously suffered to be worked upon it. I have attributed to you, in an eminent degree, a healthy understanding, with healthy affections—if I may dare address so bold a Latinism to you, Sir! from the influence of whose future writings I hope and expect, that a pure and native English will once again become the taste and fashion of English writers. Your honours and your occupations, as the statesman, and as the leader of a party, have never over-stepped and stifled your plain sense, and plain feelings, as a human being. Nature appears to me to have distinguished you from other men; not so much by rare and splendid faculties, as by an unusual portion of the good, which, in a lesser quantity, belongs to all men. For these reasons my admiration of your character has been without wonder, and, in consequence, accompanied with a proportionably greater confidence. My attachment too has been fervent and sincere, but not blind, not that of a partisan. By the clearness with which I have seemed to myself to detect your errors, and by the pain and sense of reluctance, with which this detection has been uniformly attended, I have given evidence to my own mind, that my zeal has been in the light of knowledge. The most important, as well as the most recent, of these supposed errors will form the subject of the present letter. As an Englishman, &c. I have a right to notice it: in your public conduct all your countrymen have more than a life-interest. As a lover of unsophisticated English liberty, I have a motive to exercise the right. Yet, with how much greater, with how much purer a pleasure could I turn to your enemies, if the occasion permitted it, and recount the instances of your wisdom and integrity!

The French revolution makes it difficult to call up any impassioned attention to the political disputes which preceded it. It has to a wonderful degree diminished the impression even of those, who have been contemporary with it. What a tumultuous interest would not the Irish Union have excited in this country, if it had been attempted fourteen years earlier! The languid interest which it did excite (languid, compared with the importance and magnitude of the event), is a fact, not unworthy the notice of the philosophical historian. I shall confine my letter to that part of your political conduct, Sir, which has an immediate bearing on the French revolution.

You welcomed this stupendous event, Sir! with the spirit of an Englishman; with a spirit which even in its excess was truly English. If you shall ultimately appear to have erred, posterity will add more to your heart on this account, than it will detract from your sagacity. To have hoped too boldly of our common nature, is a fault, which all good men have an interest in forgiving. As far as the final verdict on this part of your character lies with the good, you will be tried, Sir! by a jury of accomplices. I still flatter myself, that, the main source of your common error will have been this—you suffered yourself to forget, that the revolutionists were Frenchmen. You were, however, Sir! assuredly on the further side of an allowable enthusiasm, when you pronounced the first constitution of France, "a stupendous monument of human wisdom and human happiness." The wish must have been indeed "the father to the thought," when you imagined, Sir! that a constitution could receive its final and faultless shape at one cast; that the passions of a newly emancipated people, and that people the French, should run at once into the mould, like melted ores, and hardened in a few hours into perfection.

The first gust of Jacobinism was sufficient to overthrow this stupendous monument. It was overthrown, the Sovereign murdered, and all Europe seemed moving under arms. For your counsels and exertions at the commencement of this ominous war, and during the whole of its continuance, you have a just claim on the gratitude and admiration of your country. Your efforts were proportioned to the awfulness of the occasion, and the melancholy event has demonstrated, that a portion of the gift of prophecy still rests upon the wise and good. We must be compelled to add, that you yourself appear to have been in part the cause of the frustration of your own counsels. History—nay, even the daily experience of our common law-courts teaches us, that, in contests of all kinds, it is by no means necessary, that one party should be in the right. More frequently, both are in the wrong. It had been well for your fame, and well, perhaps, for your country, if you, Sir, had acted on this principle. But no! The English ministry were to be attacked at every movement, and criminated in every measure: and so far, it must be admitted, their own blunders, their own lust of innovation, did but too amply justify you. But this did not appear sufficient, or, perhaps, practicable, to you, unless the French were as regularly defended. Where their conduct was too palpably, too outrageously, bad to admit of direct defence, a palliation was attempted; and you manifested at least a wish to defend. I do not mean to assert, that there were no parts in your numerous orations, which, if extracted, would not appear to contradict this statement—but I do assert, Sir, that such was the general spirit of your speeches, and the fact is notorious, that this was the general impression which they left on the minds of your countrymen. Your language, your sentiments, were felt as Gallican.—If your harangues in the House of Commons, and at the Whig Club, were to be published under any one title, Vindictæ Gallicæ, is that which, to the feelings of a large majority of Englishmen, would best designate their general contents. Your defences, your palliations, your phraseology, would have been plainly impolitic and offensive, had they been just and precise; and being too often incorrect or overstrained, they were injurious to yourself, and to the glorious cause which you were pleading, to the cause of peace, of freedom, and of the independence of nations in their domestic concerns. Others, both in parliament and out of it, took their tone from you. The paper, which is devoted to your party, and which acts in the strictest conformity to its wishes, became, to all intents and purposes, the standing counsel for the French government. The prejudices and the good sense of the country were alike disgusted, and pious and sober men every where alarmed.

Similar praise is due to you, Sir! for your long and manly resistance to the violences which were offered by the late ministers to our laws and constitution—similar praise, and I fear, with similar deductions. I am not disposed to charge you with countenancing the Corresponding Society. But, did you, or your friends, discountenance them? Did you, or your friends, speak publicly and uniformly with due abhorrence of their principles or proceedings? Did no kind of political courtship pass between these English revolutionists, and the friends of reform? It was the policy, let me say rather, it was a trick of the associated Jacobins, or patrons of revolution and universal suffrage, in this country, to represent themselves from the very infancy of their society, as already numerous and formidable. To be thought numerous, they knew, was one way of becoming so. I speak advisedly, and from personal knowledge of the fact. At the time, when their fifties would not have puzzled a New Zealander's arithmetic, when a savage might have counted them on his fingers, without any occasion for repeating the process, it was only in their more modest moods, when their travelling agents represented themselves as below a hundred thousand. I believe, that this advice was early given them by a man, whose talents and attainments ought to have inspired a nobler ambition, than that of becoming the leader and tool-master of a London Corresponding Society. But these men were outwitted, by means of their own contrivances. The ministers, and the agents of the ministry, echoed and re-echoed the lie: what secret committees were eager to hear, and predetermined to believe, spies and informers gained a foundation for relating, confidentem habemus reum. The conspirators themselves admit their numbers, and the extent of the conspiracy. The ministers wanted a pretext for striking a universal panic of property. This vulgar artifice furnished them both with the pretext and the means. The alarm spread; and the nation, then infatuated with loyalty, consented to be clapped under hatches in compliment to the audacious lie of a faction, which was in truth as contemptible in numbers and in weight, as it was abominable in morals and in principle. Of these facts, Sir! you might have easily gained both the information and the proof. Had your eloquence been directed to the enforcement of them, I dare not affirm, that you would have been more successful; but I am sure, that you would have better deserved success. But alas! the general tendency of your speeches, was to invalidate the charges of ministry against the tenets and designs of the English Jacobins, when you should have joined hand and heart with the majority in the admission and the abhorrence both of one and the other. You should have pledged yourself, Sir! to public activity in all legal constitutional modes of suppressing both the men and their measures, if the ordinary constables of the night should indeed be found inadequate to the task. You should have declared, and even to satiety repeated the declaration, that you and your friends were both Anti-Gallicans, and Anti-Jacobins. You should have made your country feel, that you were indeed so. If there were any honest men in this country infected with Jacobinical opinions (and some there were, and chiefly from this cause, that they heard the notorious enemies of all freedom the loudest in the yell against Jacobinism), your speeches, Sir, would have been their natural and certain cure. It would have been policy and humanity to have made them the antidotes to this delusion. With what irresistible strength of argument might you not then have contended, that the Jacobins in this country possessed neither number nor influence; that in England they had never been truly formidable, or if at any time, only during the Jacobinical career of Mr. Pitt's partisans at the close of the American war; and then for these two plain reasons, because the country was unsuccessful and degraded, and because Jacobinism was as yet a mere theory. Let a free country be, or be supposed to be, in danger; and Jacobinism is the necessary consequence. All men promiscuously, not according to rank or property, but by the superiority of popular talents, and the impulse of superior restlessness, will take an active part in politics. And this is itself Jacobinism, a political disease, which, in certain periods of national danger and by a transient operation, may, like other diseases, be even salutary, and sanative. You might have shewn, that even in France the operation of Jacobinism would necessarily be transient. Incompatible with property, and even with personal security, its own absurdities ensured it a speedy and natural death, if only we would abandon it to its own destiny. By attempting violently, and by a war, to precipitate its dissolution, we should unnaturally lengthen out its existence, if our arms were victorious; and if we were defeated, we should transmute this transient fanaticism for visionary liberty into a military enthusiasm, and alarmed by an ephemeral frenzy play into the hands of a never-dying ambition. My language may appear presumptuous, the language of a man ridiculously forgetful of his measureless inferiority to the person to whom he presumes to dictate. But no, Sir! they are the dictates of mere common sense. That your own prudence did not dictate them to your own mind is a matter of regret, indeed, but not altogether of surprize. The plainest rules of the game are those which are the most frequently forgotten by the most skillful adepts, when heated with the play. The great statesman and Roman orator bemoaning his own blunders, adds—a child, who had quietly overlooked the game, might have set me right. The utmost extent of my presumption is to be that child in relation to Mr. Fox.

Not contented with mere omissions, not contented with not being the confuter and antagonist of Jacobinism, you publicly adopted its most offensive phraseology, and declared yourself at the Whig Club an adherent to the doctrine of the Rights of Man. It is possible, Sir, that a very innocent meaning may be attached to these words, laxly used. If we allow a little laxity in terms, to what form of words may not an innocent meaning be attached? But when you avowed your conviction, that all men had political rights, as by an act of courage, and with the avowed consciousness that you were acknowledging an offensive doctrine, you must be understood, of course, to imply that doctrine which had given the offence. Else why avow with so much form and emphasis a tenet which the most infuriate bigots of Monarchy had never controverted? I venture, Sir, to affirm, and if it shall hereafter appear necessary, am prepared to prove, that between the acknowledged truth, that in all countries both governments and subjects have duties—duties both to themselves and each other, that between this truism and the Jacobinical doctrine of the universal inalienable right of all the inhabitants of every country to the exercise of their inherent sovereignty, there is no intermediate step, no middle meaning. But you, Sir, had publicly, and in parliament, opposed the doctrine of universal suffrage. It is true.—You did so, Sir! What will this prove? No more, I fear, than that you have acted inconsistently; or that you uttered words without any previous analysis of their import; or that you juggled with the understandings of the populace, and gratified their feelings by the use of popular words, while in your own mind you had annihilated their obvious sense, and reduced them to a mere truism. Which ever were the case, you spoke unwisely, Sir, and imprudently. Those whom alone a great statesman would wish to conciliate are proud of their rights; indeed, but of rights created by the laws, and modified by property. These men, Sir, would regard the orator who would persuade them to substitute the rights of man for their rights, as Englishmen, in the same light as they would regard a mad metaphysician, who should counsel them to burn the writings of their estates, and rest their claims on the demonstrations of Puffendorf or Wolfius.

But the time arrived, Sir, when all your errors might have been retrieved in one hour, and the memory of them have dissolved away in one general sentiment of regard and admiration. PEACE was concluded with the FRENCH REPUBLIC; and both the spirit and the letter of your predictions received the seal of a complete and final fulfilment. It is natural, Sir, to anticipate the language and conduct of a favourite statesman on the eve of some great occasion—some occasion fitted, and prepared by his guardian genius to call forth the best energies of his understanding and his affections. I looked forward to the debate on the peace with an anxious pleasure. I described you to my imagination, as enforcing, with all your own dignified impetuosity, and with a tenfold weight of argument, the grand principles of your former counsels; yet cautiously abstaining from all allusion to the counsels themselves, and by a generous silence provoking the whole nation to make them the objects of their deepest regret, the topic of their hourly talk, the conversation at the table, the buzz in the market-place! I described you, as evincing that a peace had been concluded at the very first period at which a war had become indisputably just and necessary. I seemed almost to hear you congratulating the alarmists and the crusading Christians on the restoration of religion, and an intense monarchy in France, and then, with an indignation too restless to endure the clothing of irony, portraying the dreadful ambition, and undisguised lust of dominion, before which we had thrown ourselves prostrate. I imagined you, with all your fervid and searching logic, exposing the hollowness of our boasted acquisitions, and bringing into the close view of the terrified peace-makers, the enormous, and compacted empire of the enemy. Yet, nevertheless, you would give your vote for the PEACE.—Even if it continue for a year only, if only for six months, there will be a time in which the true and just motives of war may be extricated from that cant of hypocrisy, and those ravings of delusion, which in the year 1793 had impelled the ministry to rush into hostilities, like madmen, and afterwards conduct them, like men besotted. There will be a time at least for a general forgiveness to pass between all parties. Our mutual errors must needs bring on a mutual amnesty. And if we are compelled to wage war anew, as alas! who can doubt but sooner or later we shall be compelled, we shall wage it with one advantage, of almost incalculable importance, with definite, intelligible, unvarying, and universally admitted motives and objects.

In the same spirit, Sir! did I venture to anticipate your consolations to the friends of liberty, that if France had now for the first time united all sects and all parties in one sentiment of abhorrence and terror, she had now for the first time also lost all the semblances of a republic, and had yielded herself up to an unbridled despotism, without condition or prospect. In the same spirit too, giving you credit, Sir! for language, illustration, and arrangement, far, far beyond the scope of my imagination to shadow out, I still seemed assured, that I had anticipated the meaning and general purport of your peroration. I conceive that it could be no other than a generous exhortation to the ministers and the parliament, to shew both by public declarations, and by measures answerable to these declarations, that the government was no longer jealous of the country, that they abjured all further insult of a loyal people by suspensions of the habeas-corpus act, or inquisitorial treason and sedition bills; that they looked for vigorous and enthusiastic support against the common enemy, chiefly from the spirit of freedom and of free enquiry, confident that the few wretches who dared utter or publish the loose principles and mock-philosophy of these vile mock-republicans, would find their fittest and adequate punishment in the contempt and abhorrence of their readers.

I believed, Sir! and still do believe, that selfish ambition can no longer retain a place in your hopes or wishes, that you have long felt, how possible it is to be a great man without place or office. I imagined, therefore, that you would have concluded with freely offering to ministers your vote and your counsels to preserve the peace, while it was possible; and when war was rendered inevitable, a still higher energy in support of that war, and a concentration of your intellect and experience to spread your own patriotic enthusiasm among the people, and to direct that enthusiasm to the wisest purposes. All this, and more than all this, I expected from you, Sir! Your country expected it. And now, Sir! did you meet these expectations? Did you utter one word of alarm at the atrocious ambition of the First Consul? One sentiment of pity or indignation at the iron despotism, under which this upstart Corsican had reduced forty-millions of your fellow-creatures? Not a syllable! Not a breathing! You exulted, Sir, that the war had ended as it ought to end, gloriously for France, ignominiously for Great Britain! For the spirit of a man and a patriot, you abandoned yourself to the low and womanish tri-per, which finds in a triumphant, " Did I not tell you so, now?" a pleasure that overpowered and sunk into oblivion all the dangers and all the disgrace of a whole nation, and that nation your country! I am at a loss to determine, Sir, which was the greater, the inconsistency or the folly of this speech, the impolicy or the unfeelingness. It was inconsistent, because you had hitherto uniformly contended, that you and your party had spoken the sense of the nation; that the guilt and misconduct rested upon the ministers, their adherents, and their creatures; that every artifice had been used to inflame and delude the public mind, yet that the success had been only transient and partial—that the ministry, well aware of this, had in every sense shunned examination—that they alone were guilty, and in the better days of the House of Commons would assuredly have met with the punishment due to such misdemeanours joined with such incapacity. With what shadow of consistency, Sir, could you then exult in the calamity and prostration of a people, on whose guiltlessness you had grounded, and on which alone you could ground the guilt and punishableness of the ministers? Nor was it less foolish than inconsistent. You must have known, Sir, that a peace which had exchanged liberty for empire, that conquests and successes which had transformed the victors into coaching slaves, with no freedom but to be vicious; no voice but to utter brothelry and blasphemy, could not in the eye of reason be glorious, or matter of a wise man's congratulation. Frenchmen hold it glorious, it is true; and you, Sir, when you pronounced it glorious for France, only proved to your mourning and indignant country, that you thought and felt as a Frenchman! It was unfeeling, Sir! for your country was dejected, and smarting with her wounds; you should have poured oil into them, not corrosives. Lastly, it was impolitic. Such sentiments must tend to alienate from you the affections of your countrymen, of all who love their country. And though I have long held in suspicion those political saints, who deal in no other good deeds than those of supererogation, yet I must doubt whether your sentiments will win for you the suffrages even of our new philosophers, our philanthropists, our citizens of the world. I conceive that even these turn away with disgust from the Land of Promise, from this glorified country, in which the government is all powerful by military violence, but weak and sluggish with the laws, even those of its own making; this regenerated country, in which the public advocates of civil freedom are the most obnoxious criminals, and the criminals not punished, but kidnapped.

Having thus, Sir, publicly expatriated yourself, nothing remained for you, but by some outward act and ceremony, to naturalise yourself in your new country. You went to France. Your ostensible, and, I believe, true motive, was honourable, and at any less inauspicious time would have been adequate. A man must be little versed, indeed, in literary research, who does not understand that no man can examine manuscripts for another, in reference to historical enquiries. The subject of your history (I speak from the general report) is worthy of your intellect, and appropriate to the efforts of your political life.—If you live to complete your plan, I hope and believe, Sir, that your work will instruct and animate your countrymen, when your errors will have an interest attached to them, chiefly in consequence of your literary fame. It has been said, and I think without extravagance, that the History of Thucydides was cheaply purchased by the long Peloponnesian war, which was its subject.—Painful as it will be for me to return from this digression, I cannot deny myself the pleasure of uttering this one heart-felt wish:—may your name be dear in future ages, as the Thucydides of Great Britain! We are proud, perhaps boastful, of the names of Robertson, Hume, and Gibbon; yet I dare avow my conviction, that the true honours of an English historian lie untouched before you. For the annals of our own country this is now especially true. I know few books that have more deeply and extensively injured the principles of Englishmen, whether moral, religious, or political, than that History of England which alone stands in any high reputation. You best know it, Sir, to be a perfidious romance, not a history: the apologist for priest-craft, while it undermines the first principles, even of natural religion; extravagantly sceptical concerning the laws, where they have been wantonly broken by tyrants, and then only decisive and embittered by the breach when the offence has become necessary, and the offenders have been patriots! often false in the statement, and still more frequently attaining the purposes of falsehood by the omission of facts; in reasoning a model of the mock-profound, and in style Irish, Scottish, Gallican—any thing but English. Yet, in very truth, to write the history of that period which you have chosen, without pain and weariness of spirit, it would be necessary to possess, like Mr. Hume, the head and heart of an atheist. For you will be compelled, Sir, to draw into light, in an almost uninterrupted series, actions disgraceful to our country and to human nature. You must exhibit vices struggling with vices, the best ends frustrated by the worst means, dishonoured by the basest agents; lawless and godless tyrants, with the whole regiment of lawyers for their body guard, and the united priesthood of the kingdom for their advanced centinels; and, more humiliating than this, you will be forced to shew the persecuted thirst for the power to persecute, and the partisans of freedom stained so indelibly with treachery, perjury, corruption and hypocrisy, as to yield a semblance of justification even to the oppressions, against which they were struggling. In fine, Sir! you will crowd together, as into one vast picture, demoniaes and lepers, with no Pool of Bethesda in the fore-ground, and with no other saviour than that great educer of good out of evil, whom with a master's licence you might paint with a countenance of angry sorrow looking down on the group from the clouds of heaven. This great history-piece you must teach us to hang up in the temple of national humility. But you will yourself restore us to our self-estimation, as Englishmen, by the courage with which you will adhere to the cause of liberty, and of course to the natural worthiness of the human heart; and by the sagacity, with which you will detect, and the truly British eloquence with which you will heap shame on those sophists, who have developed the vices of individuals, in order to enfeeble the virtues of the species, who have exhibited the depravity of a singularly corrupted age, as the means, not of deterring us from their vices, but of alienating our understanding from the best impulses of our own best affections.

Here, Sir! I would fain close my address to you. But so I should abandon the chief purpose, which induced me to this act of apparent presumption. It is something, however, even to pause, from the painful task of cross-examining the conduct of Mr. Fox. Many men, Sir, think you worthy to hear praise. I think the same, and I think still more: I believe you worthy of hearing the truth; and though this appear as rhetorical common-place, and is suspicious from the antithetical form of its expression, yet it has a meaning for a good man; and if you should condescend to read this public remonstrance, you will feel, that with a zeal, which your habitual enemies have neither head or heart to apprehend. I am, Sir, your friend and well-wisher,

TO MR. C. J. FOX.

Nov. 9. Sir,—Unpublished letters and memoirs in manuscript have hitherto furnished better materials for the sceptic, than for the historian. The writers who have dealt the most largely and ostentatiously in these wares, and whose histories have boasted the thickest appendix of original papers, do not stand in the highest credit among us for good sense or historical credibility. I admit, however, without reserve or scruple, that the examination of the MS. formed a sufficient reason for your journey to Paris; if for a thing so innocent any other reason were requisite than that of general curiosity. But what has the examination of MS. to do with the levees of Buonaparté, or the dinners of Talleyrand? Dissatisfied with the apologies which your friends have made, I have sought for a better motive in the resemblance of the present state of Paris with that of England after the subversion of our commonwealth. For with this era, I have been led to believe, that your history is to date its commencement. The pernicious influence of revolutions upon morals is a fact, which will have therefore become profoundly interesting to you. A general interest it will indeed have excited in every thoughtful mind; but it has become your business, Sir! to understand it in detail. That certain fruits are poisonous, it behoves us all to know. The medical writer must seek to know, what parts the poison specifically affects, whether the blood, the nerves, or the stomach. He must particularise the various appearances which the diseased organs exhibit, and the symptomatic actions of the whole body, both those of sympathy with the part, and those of resistance to the venom. This, Sir! I admit, you could but imperfectly learn from books or records. As we anticipate the future only by the analogies of the past, so can we truly and vividly apprehend the past, only by a close observation of whatever is apparently analogous to it in the present. With such changes and deductions, as with the severest impartiality you must needs make in favour of your native country, your residence in the metropolis of France will have enabled you to paint, from the life, the court, and the factions under our second Charles and James. Thus, Sir! your history, like the prophecies of holy writ, will have a double sense, and a twofold value.

After the failure of mad projects in government, and the usual transformation of popular tyranny into a despotism, our ancestors saw in England, what you have been viewing in France, a truly frightful licentiousness in private life, and among public men the most profligate venality, the most abject prostration. For the fullest survey of domestic depravity any selected or commanding point of view was altogether unnecessary. You might have seen as much as was useful for your purposes, and more than your moral feelings could well endure, and yet have remained at Paris, an unnoticed individual. In the time of a great plague we may examine patients in abundance without the trouble of procuring an admission to the public hospitals. But to understand the complexion and habit of servile and rapacious statesmen, to people and invigorate your imagination with pictures, from the life, of an upstart despot, and his crouching creatures, required more than common opportunities. You thought the knowledge not too dearly purchased by becoming the temporary courtier of Buonaparté, and the visitor and intimate of Talleyrand. You look forward for absolution from the gratitude of posterity.

This, Sir, is the apology for your conduct, with which I attempted to satisfy my own mind. But I fear, that neither you, nor your friends, nor the Public, will admit it either as the truth, or as fit to be the truth. You would condemn a man's religious morals as unwarrantably lax, who should be guilty of idolatry in order to make a drawing of the idol. It is utterly repugnant to the plainness and generous honesty of your nature to receive with every appearance of esteem and gratitude all possible favours and attentions from base men, merely that you might be able more lively to display the colour and quality of their baseness. I must look elsewhere for more justifiable motives. Was it the attestation of the American ambassadors in favour of Citizen Talleyrand's integrity, which induced you, Sir! to honour him with your acquaintance? The purity of his domestic morals was it? or his consistency in his religious and sacerdotal character? Was it the First Consul's ex-

exploit at Jaffa, which has entitled him to the respect of the friend of humanity? or was it the re-establishment of the slave trade, and his truly Corsican faith to the blacks in St. Domingo, which have recommended him by any bond of sympathy to the great friend and advocate of the unhappy Africans? Was it his message to the legislature, his purgation of the tribunate, his terror and hatred of free discussion by the press, his contempt of popular elections and representative governments, his jealousy of trials by juries, his system of espionage, the articles respecting the police in his Milanese code, his deportation (or what in plain English, we should call the kidnapping) of untried patriots, or his incarceration of Toussaint less from political motives than from personal envy to a hero, in difficulty and splendour of exploit, and in true dignity of character, infinitely his superior?—Was it any, or all of these things which have recommended him to the Man of the People? Or was it his ambition, his interference in the governments of Holland and Switzerland, and his desperate attacks on the independence of Germany, which have pleaded his cause with the English statesman? Was it the wish to consolidate his usurped power by giving him consequence in the eyes of a vain and light people? Or was it merely humanity—a desire to alleviate the pangs of the indignant French patriots, by giving them an example of voluntary homage in an English patriot. A free-will offering of penetration from the leader of the English opposition. I take shame to myself for addressing Mr. Fox in a strain of irony. It is indeed the natural language of indignation; and that indignation, Sir, is itself both the effect and a proof of the attachment and reverence with which I had hitherto contemplated you. But I recall myself to a calmer mood; I will attempt, in plain and direct argument, to convince you, Sir, that the reason which has been assigned for your conduct in this instance, and which, I fully believe, was the sole cause of that conduct, is not a sufficient reason that it ought not to have influenced, that it does not justify you.

You had received the most distinguished honours and attentions in France: it was expected by the First Consul that you should solicit a personal interview with him; and you could not endure to inflict pain, or to act with rudeness. According to the customs of courtesy between man and man you could not help doing as you did. This is the sum of the apology, for that your conduct needed an apology, your warmest friends have admitted. Now, Sir, the honours which you received on your arrival in France, and during the various stages of your journey to Paris, were either by the command of the First Consul, or not. If not, you owed the return to the spirit of freedom that still lingers in that unhappy country; and the proper return would have been to have shewn your contempt and abhorrence of the man who had gained his victories by the enthusiasm which the spirit of freedom alone inspired, and then abused the glory and power which those victories conferred on his name, to extinguish that spirit, to subvert that freedom. But, if these honours were ordered by the First Consul, you were assuredly, Sir, blameable in making your purposes so notorious, and in thereby exposing yourself to the difficulty and the dilemma. If you would have felt it painful to have refused the attendance at Buonaparté's levee, you ought to have considered that pain as a fit expiation of the fault and imprudence which alone could have occasioned the refusal to be painful. You complied with the customs of courtesy between man and man, but this was not an affair between man and man. I trust that you would feel yourself humiliated if you believed that Buonaparté had any sincere esteem or attachment for you.—Such attachment for you could only have arisen from his belief that you had been the enemy of your country, and the patron of his ambition. It was a mere trick of policy—a low attempt to persuade Frenchmen that their despot was attached to the cause of liberty by the honours ostentatiously paid by him to its most celebrated advocate; and to win from your homage, an apparent proof, that the most undoubted zealots for the rights and freedom of mankind, regarded him with sentiments of confidence and attachment. We all know the artifices, which impostors use to procure themselves to be noticed in public by some man of rank and character, the importance, which they attach to such notice, and the uses, they afterwards make of it. Would you, Sir! think it any justification to an English nobleman, who should walk arm in arm with a swindler at Margate, or Brighton, knowing him to be so—would you think it a justification, if the nobleman should say, that the man had behaved with laborious attention and civility, and that it would be uncourteous not to notice him; and, that it would wound and mortify the poor man, if he refused to do it? And, what, Sir! is that man, who has availed himself of his military fame, bought for him by the soldiers of liberty with rivers of blood—who has availed himself of his own professions of republican enthusiasm—to institute a military despotism? We will not call him a swindler, Sir! The vocabulary of crimes is too rich in appropriate terms, to lead us into the temptation. But, if you believe of Buonaparté, what ninety-nine in every hundred of your countrymen think themselves justified in believing of him, you must admit the analogy to be strict, whatever becomes of the term. And, if, Sir! you believe otherwise, and have solid reasons for your belief, you will bring home news indeed from the continent; and you owe it, Sir! to peace, truth, and charity, to publish the news as widely and as speedily as possible.

In examining the reason assigned as the justification of any action; the weight, we may attribute to it, must depend on the presence or absence, on the importance or insignificance, of the reasons in the opposite scale. The reason, or apology, which I am now examining, would scarcely produce a shew of inequality; were there nothing to weigh against it. How will it fly up, and strike against the beam, when we put in the counter-weights! I have examined the reason, why you paid; and repeated, your act of homage to the First Consul. I will now enumerate the reasons why you ought not to have done it.

Your absence from the court of our own sovereign is the misfortune of your country, but no dishonour to yourself. But to repay yourself for the deprivation by the honours with which you were received, at the levee of the man, who, a few weeks before, had been the public enemy both of your sovereign and the country—to appear in the first rank of favour at the court of the mock republic of France, when you could not, or would not appear at the palace of the king of Great Britain.—O, Sir! I seem to feel, that this was not delicate, not worthy of Mr. Fox. To compare small things with great, it was in the spirit of Coriolanus, not Camillus; at all events, you should have waited till the ambassador from France had appeared before your sovereign, or some of the generals, or Frenchmen of rank and importance had paid their homage to the representative of the Majesty of our country. Political contests, and personal injuries, may pardonably make a patriot sore and indignant, while he remains at home, may pardonably inspire a certain portion of personal dislike: but, in a foreign land, I have always felt, and always understood, that party animosities cease to have existence in the breast of an Englishman. He no longer knows the names of Whig or Tory. His king becomes an abstraction in his mind, around which his best feelings gather. It is the particular man no longer: it is the majesty of his country. What Mr. Fox could not receive in England, he ought to have been too proud a patriot to have condescended to receive in France.

Secondly, Sir! let me revert to the offensive terms (be they right or wrong, that they were offensive to the country is a notorious fact), permit me, Sir! to revert, however reluctantly, to the effusive words, in which you exulted in the conclusion of the peace, because it was glorious for France, and disgraceful to Great Britain. Had this speech met with nothing in your after conduct answerable to it, though it cannot be excused, it might have been pardoned. A man who speaks with warmth and rapidity, will often express ideas in the very moment of their conception, and will have conceived them in consequence of mere verbal associations. In the minds of wise and good men these Tirades pass for that which they are—a precipitancy of the organs of speech during a momentary lapse of the understanding. Even in this instance your friends might have had the courage, Sir! to interpret your words, as simply signifying, that Mr. Fox had forgotten himself. But you went to France, Sir! and submitted to receive such honours from the recent arch-enemy of your country, as perhaps it did not become any subject to receive in his individual capacity. In the eyes of the world, Sir! you appeared to receive your reward; your hire.—Whatever charitable faith

I may keep alive in my own heart, I confess, Sir! that I have not the courage to maintain against your antagonists, that your intended journey to France was not present to your mind at the moment in which you uttered those words. In England they excited indignation; in France alone they made you popular.—You hastened to the scene of your popularity, even as an actor after a perilous rant turns round on his heel from the persons of the drama, and facing the galleries, received the thunder of applause from that quarter, at whose hearts and understandings the speech had been exclusively levelled. Conscious, Sir! of the incompatibility of such a motive with your real character, you may despise these appearances. But, Sir! in a public man, a contempt of appearances is want of good sense, want of an appropriate virtue. To a certain extent, even our inward feelings have less of reality than our appearances: for they belong less to the external world, and act less upon our fellow creatures. If this be the case with all men, much more then with you. You have lost the right, Sir! to act as a common individual. It is, perhaps, one of the defects of your character, that in your habitual feelings you are not sufficiently aware of your own importance, and of the duties which it imposes upon you.

Sir, it is affirmed, and has remained uncontradicted, that your private intercourse with the First Consul has not been confined to a single interview: and it is, I suppose, not to be doubted that you have more than once attended at his public levee.—This fact, if fact it be, annuls altogether the apology deduced from “the laws of courtesy between man and man.” Your name and your authority have drawn over to Paris, and to the consular levees, a cluster of your parliamentary friends. At least it has embodied them: it has given the form and semblance of a band to a number of gentlemen, who might otherwise have appeared as scattered individuals. This too is only an appearance, Sir! but it is an offensive, an unworthy appearance. It looks, Sir! as if you, and your friends, had felt the want of court favour as a heavy deprivation; as if rather than not receive the caresses of a government, you would condescend to accept them from apostacy and usurpation, from the ex-bishop of Autun, and the grateful élève of the director, Barras. The group of Englishmen who have appeared in their different insignia to do honour to Buonaparte, before any one Frenchman of rank had appeared at the court of St. James’s, and who have contributed their best efforts to confirm the despot in his pernicious; yet plausible faith, that he has humbled the pride of Britain, and decided at length the point of preëminence between the rival countries—this group of degenerate Englishmen (though indeed to the honour of that name the greater number have been Scotchmen and Irishmen), this group, Sir! will derive no authority or sanction from your example; but each component of it will shoot forth his portion of dark rays (the tenebricosi Radii of Paracelsus) to cover you with a baseness not your own. Your country will, I trust, never forget their names. A monarch's favour ought to bring with it new places, and new titles. By what better appellation can the whole party be known, than that of Buonaparté's Courtiers? And you, Sir! you will no longer remain bald of place or title.—You will be his Lord Chamberlain for foreign affairs!—My mind involuntarily reverts to questions which have already been examined even to satiety. But at this moment the reasons assigned for your conduct appear idler to me than the talk of a dream. Good Heaven, Sir! what Circean cup transformed you into the leader of such a pack? And made you first in this vile chace? Was it, Sir! because he was master in the manufactory, in which you were head journeyman, or foreign agent—the manufactory of this gloomy and ominous war-peace? Or rather, was it because this Cæsar in all things, but genius, noble birth, and fearless clemency, had dared take the votes of his soldiery, as an army? Was it, Sir! on this putrid train of old despotism that you opened out? Or was it, Sir! because some of your fellow-courtiers had procured themselves to be presented at St. James's, purposely and solely to enable them to appear at the levees of Buonaparté? And were you pleased, Sir! to see your sovereign degraded thus into a mere gentleman-usher to this low-born Corsican?

You have long been a seceder, though not very strictly or uniformly, from your duties as a member of the legislature. It has been a measure concerning the propriety and good policy of which your warmest friends have been divided. (It required indeed all the warmth of friendship to entertain a doubt on so palpable a point.) Very lately you re-affirmed your intention of persevering in this secession. If you shall hereafter attend your duty in parliament, your character will therefore not stand clear of the charges of lightness and inconsistency.—But attend, Sir! you must. Secession now will be infamy. You have long been styled our Demosthenes. But hereafter, if you withdraw yourself from the public counsels of your country, you will be the Demosthenes of every caricature shop.—O! far worse than that—in the serious belief of all Englishmen, the Demosthenes with the sore throat! Demosthenes, muffled and mute! He could not take any part in the debate concerning the Great King; for the Great King, the enemy of Athens, had become the friend and patron of the Athenian orator and statesman.

With a true and fervent wish, that your return to England may clear away all these clouds that have gathered round your good name, even though your full and most honourable acquittal should bring an odium on myself for the present laid (but Heaven be my witness! most unfactitious) address to you.

I remain, Sir, your humble well-wisher,

RETHEE.

Mr. Fox: having returned from Paris, and taken his seat in parliament, which opened on the 23d of November, made two speeches, one on the 23d and the other on the 24th, in which he made use of the following words, which drew forth the articles, which we here insert from the Morning Post:

"I do not pretend to have any extraordinary means of access to the public mind, but I will not suffer any cry so factitious as that of a coalition of a certain number of newspapers, a cry set up with a design of selling three or four hundred more of their sheets, or for some other equally mean and interested purpose, to impose itself on me as the opinion of the people of England. I do believe the sense of the nation to be as much for peace as it was at the conclusion of the treaty. Peace, it is true, has been often sacrificed to the ambition of individuals; but a war, engaged in for the purpose of gratifying the ambition of newspapers, would be not only unparalleled in history, but founded on the basest cause that imagination can suggest."—[23d November.]

"I again say, that I am as anxious as any man in this House to preserve the spirit of the country, and the best way to preserve that spirit is not to engage in war without necessity, and to avoid those unmanly libels which both in and out of parliament are too frequently levelled at the French government. Those libels, I know, are much talked of and reprobated in France; though I also know there are many philosophical minds, both in that country and this, who look at this war of words with the utmost contempt, but yet I should prefer it to any other species of warfare. Let the Monitor and the Morning Post, the Times, and the Argus, go on in their hostile language, it is easier to be endured than a war of bayonets. Let us, however, consider, at the very moment we have sent an ambassador to the French government, eminently qualified to maintain that honourable character—when the representative of our sovereign may be now, perhaps, making his bow, or performing the accustomed ceremonies in the presence of the First Consul of France, is it decent, is it dignified, that the members of this House should be applying opprobrious epithets to the chief of the French government? Certainly not. It can answer no purpose, unless it is wished to keep up a spirit of perpetual hostility. This I shall ever deprecate."—[24th November.]

As Mr. Fox has gone of England, and owns he has not read many of the London newspapers; and as he has censured them for what they have said respecting France; more particularly as he has censured this paper by name, we hope that an explanation of our conduct and sentiments may be given, without subjecting us to the charge of a disposition to attack Mr. Fox. We must, therefore, state in our defence, that we have said nothing in regard to France which we were not bound to state upon the principles Mr. Fox has inculcated; and that if we are in error, he also is to blame. Ever since the month of August, when we understood an attempt was made by the French government to crush the freedom of the British press in discussing the affairs of France, an attempt avowed in the official journal, the Moniteur, we have been particularly alive to the proceedings of the consular government, eager to assert and maintain this freedom, rather than to yield it up by our practice, by a silence on the ambition and aggrandisement of the Chief Consul, whose conduct, since that period, has but too amply afforded occasions for the exercise of the liberty we possess; so amply, indeed, that we presume Buonaparté foresaw the general indignation his conduct would excite, and was desirous of previously silencing the only voice in the world which dare speak out truths respecting his designs, as a necessary preliminary to their execution. In thus exercising this privilege, we only followed the counsel Mr. Fox gave at the Whig Club last June, when he advised exertions in defence of the declining freedom of the press in this country. But in the discharge of this duty, we have not been betrayed into any calumny or expression upon which we can look back with regret. Knowing the fierceness with which Buonaparté insisted on silencing the English press, and knowing the desire of our government to conciliate the great Consul, as far as decency and the laws would allow them, we have weighed every word we have inserted with as much caution as if it had been said of our best ally, or even of the British government itself; and we have considered what might, and what might not, subject us to a prosecution. Here again we acted on Mr. Fox's authority. At the commencement of the late war, he called most of the monarchs of Europe despots. There were, "the despot of Prussia," "the despot of Russia," and "the despot of Austria." There were, "the crowned despots," "the combined despots," leagued against France, &c. Now, as these expressions were repeated by this paper in the face of the late administration, certainly not the most favourable to the liberty of the press, and as they were used of sovereigns, the allies of this country, fighting in the same cause with ourselves, we have thought it allowable to call Buonaparté a despot also. By a despot, we understand is meant a sovereign whose will is law, or, to use a softer expression, an arbitrary monarch. A despot may be the most amiable of princes, if he uses his power mildly, and for the good of his people. The abuse of his power makes him a tyrant; but we have not called Buonaparté a tyrant generally, though we have said his conduct in Switzerland has been tyrannical, and we leave the world to judge whether the truth of the libel aggravates its guilt. This is the utmost extent of the "libels" we have published against Buonaparté. It is true, we have censured the ambition of France in taking Savoy to complete her natural boundaries, and then in consolidating Piedmont with the republic, though beyond those natural boundaries. Her conduct to Switzerland, to Germany, to Holland, to Toussaint; the ridiculous complexity and mock freedom of her constitution; all these and many more things we have condemned; but in doing so we have not used any expression for which Mr. Fox has not afforded a precedent, nor said one word, that we would not say of any British government that deserved to be so spoken of. We called the Irish government a despotism, and not only a despotism, but ferocious despotism, and this we said during the rebellion. We know that if a spirit of persecution prevailed, the freedom of the press might be crushed; but in its fair exercise, we do not merit the title of "Libellers" for the comments we have made on the French government; and we are sure, if Mr. Fox had read this paper constantly, he would not have cast on us such an imputation. If we were disposed to retort the charge, we might ask, why all this tenderness about France? Why is not France to be spoken of as freely as Mr. Fox spoke of the hereditary monarchs of Europe? France assumes to herself an Imperial station. Buonaparté calls Europe the western nation, and France the great nation of that western nation. With the exception of Britain and Russia, France has, in fact, exercised a sovereign authority over Europe, and her object is to bring this country equally under her controul. Upon the principle, therefore, that it is our duty to examine the proceedings of our own government, it is our duty to examine those of France. Upon this principle we say, even if every man did not feel the welfare of Britain deeply concerned in almost every step which France takes. This, it may be answered, applies to her external relations only, and that we have no right to censure her internal institutions. Here again we have Mr. Fox for our authority in contradicting such an opinion. One of his most favourite toasts at public meetings has been "The cause of Liberty all over the world."—Now surely we are not to understand this toast to mean, the cause of liberty all over every other part of the world except France?—In drinking such a toast an Englishman first looks at home: there he finds liberty, though short of what he wishes to enjoy. Then travelling onward in imagination to go all over the world, the first place he meets is France. Does he find liberty there? No: but then, according to Mr. Fox, we must not look at France for fear of provoking a war. We may travel all over the world without our good wishes in behalf of liberty; but we must not go into France. Prussia is a despotism; Austria is a despotism; Russia is a despotism; but touch on France, and then Mr. Fox says, "look not at her" (we quote his words, used within these six months), "but look at home: it is too much the fashion to rail at every thing in France; but let us look at our own constitution before we talk of the slavery of other countries."—Thus we find this very generous wish for the success of the cause of liberty all over the world, must not travel out of England, for fear it should get into France, and there fall in love with our own institutions. We are desirous of directing the chief attention of the people to the preservation of our own liberties. With that view, we are very anxious they should make the tour of the continent, and, in particular, that they should take a trip into the French republic. Another popular toast some years ago was, "May revolutions never cease till despotism is extinguished."—This toast, we fear, will, in future, be regarded by Mr. Fox as a direct invitation to an insurrection in France. For if it be true that the French government is a despotism, then the wish for overthrowing despotisms, emanating from this country, must fall foul of France first, as she is the first in the way; or, if that despotism must be viewed as sacred, then will it become a bulwark protecting all other despotisms, Russia, Prussia, Austria, &c. against the torrent of licentiousness, which the French papers have lately told us flows out of this country, endangering the existence of every regular government. And then what becomes of Mr. Fox's toast of "The cause of liberty all over the world?" That the French government is a despotism, or something very like one, we think Mr. Fox will not deny. We have heard, and we believe the fact, as it agrees with the language of M. Otto in this country, and of all the members of the consular government in France, that Buonaparté said to Mr. Fox, it was happy for England she could allow of so much freedom, but that a military government was absolutely necessary in France." To which Mr. Fox replied, and the sentiment was such as we might have expected from his manly spirit—"That country is in a most deplorable situation, which finds it necessary to submit to a military government."

From this statement, we contend, that we have said nothing more respecting the late conduct of France than the events that have occurred, and the principles inculcated by Mr. Fox, required we should say; that we have spoken of the proceedings of France in no harsher or more libellous terms than Mr. Fox spoke of our allies in 1793, or than we speak of the proceedings of our own government, which deserves censure [the paragraph said to have stimulated to the assassination of the Chief Consul, did not appear in any daily newspaper]; that if we have libelled the Chief Consul, the courts of law are open to him for redress, and there he may find it, as the kings of England, France, and Russia, have done; that we will not purchase peace, by surrendering the freedom of discussion in this part of Europe, where alone it exists; the more especially, as this is the only weapon that can be wielded with effect, in opposing the ambition and despotism of a man, who aims at the domination of the world, to which the power of this country is the greatest, we may say, the only obstacle. The moment the freedom of discussion is restrained in this country with regard to France, more than with regard to our own and other governments; from that moment we may date the period at which Great Britain becomes a province of the French republic. We write not for Frenchmen, but for Englishmen. Let Buonaparté prohibit the circulation of our papers in France; he has a right to do so if he pleases, and no one disputes his right; but we trust he will never be able to put seals upon the presses of the English newspapers, or to send their editors to Cayenne, without deigning to tell them the reason.

We have said thus much to shew, that if Mr. Fox had been truly informed of the publications in this paper, he never would have complained of them. In our paper of Monday we propose to discuss how far our language has a war tendency; and whether Mr. Fox or the Morning Post be the best informed with respect to the disposition the people of England entertain towards France.

In reply to Mr. Fox's charge, of the libellous and warlike tendency of the articles in this paper with regard to France, we, on Saturday, endeavoured to shew that, in censuring the despotism of the French Government, we acted precisely on the principles of liberty he has inculcated. How it happened that he used a harsh, but just, language, in speaking of the despotism of Prussia, the despotism of Austria, &c. while those states were our allies, fighting with us in the same cause; and that he now uses a mild and conciliating language, when speaking of the despotism of France, suspected of being the most implacable and dangerous enemy of this country, remains for him to explain. We have acted on principles, and principles apply equally to all despotisms, whether crowned or consular.

We are accused of calling for war.—When the terms of the preliminaries of peace were known, we censured them on these grounds:—First, That the objects of the war, as far as related to principles of civil society, humanity, religion, &c. were not obtained; even according to the declarations of the authors of the war themselves, who of course were the best judges. Second, That the objects of the war, as far as related to power and extent of territory, were not only not obtained, but that point was left most alarmingly worse by the peace than it was found by the war. The ministers who concluded the peace, and the majority who voted for it, were the party who supported the war; we, therefore, attacked them, for having held out lofty expectations to the country, and for having abandoned them, thereby avowing, that they had totally failed in their designs, or that the objects for which we had expended our blood and treasure were not worth pursuing. We charged them with having made a peace disgraceful, when compared with their pretensions; and, above all, we charged them with having left France in possession of such gigantic power, that this country could not view it, and enjoy repose of mind. We deplored the terms of the peace on this last ground, and we carried along with us the general sympathy. Mr. Fox, on the contrary, expressed no alarm at the monstrous aggrandisement and power of France. He rejoiced, in a tone of triumph, at the fallen fortunes of his country, and the exalted state of the French Republic. We censured his conduct at the time (October 1801); he himself now censures it. The degree of warmth, of vehemence, with which he on Thursday night denied, in explanation to Mr. Windham, that he did not feel uneasiness at the great power of France, shewed that he had been taught to understand the high offence which his language at the Shakespeare-Tavern, in October 1801, had given to all friends of this country.—Where was the feeling which occasioned that burst of indignation on Thursday night, when he spoke at the Shakespeare-Tavern a year before? That burst of indignation sufficiently indicated the sense of his error, and his soreness when it was touched upon. With regard to the alarming power of France, he will therefore allow that, in October 1801, we understood the public sentiment far better than he did. Such was our conduct on the conclusion of the preliminary peace. Put with whatever grief or disgust we looked at the terms of the treaty, still, under all circumstances, we thought even such a peace was preferable to a war which must have been continued without hope or attainable objects, but not without great sacrifices and imminent dangers. Hence we supported the peace itself, as peace, notwithstanding the censure we cast on the terms of the treaty, and the misconduct of those who had reduced us to such a situation.—We hoped that as France was powerful she would display the spirit of moderation and peace with which she so earnestly declared she was possessed, and that time and circumstances would remedy the evils which formed but too just a ground of apprehension.

But when we found last summer, that, so far from this spirit of moderation and peace being the guide of her actions, she attempted to stifle the freedom of the press in this country; united Piedmont, the Italian Republic, dictated to Germany, to Holland, over-ran Switzerland, and domineered, or attempted to domineer, over all Europe; when we saw her every month adding some new principality to her own enormous dominions, breaking down all our friends (the houses of Austria, Orange, &c. have not been indemnified agreeably to the terms of the treaties of Luneville and Amiens), while she was raising up and strengthening her own dependents; when we saw by the language of her official journal, which, if not official language, is undoubtedly the language of her government, that an attempt was to be made to prohibit the English press from speaking of her rapacity and oppression in the terms which Mr. Fox had taught it to speak of all injustice; when we saw the design avowed of excluding this nation from the Continent, our government libelled in the most outrageous manner, our King accused of assassination! When we saw all this, and much more than all this, were we not bound to speak in terms of indignation of the conduct of the French Government? Were we to kneel down before “the Envoy of God,” shut our eyes to his misdeeds, and lick the dust off his feet, for having given us peace? While the freedom of the press exists, as settled by Mr. Fox, we will never be guilty of such baseness, of such treason to our country. But even of those outrages upon the rights and feelings of this nation, upon the independence of Europe, and the liberties of mankind, we spoke in language not more severe than we thought the law would justify, every word being considered with a reference to a prosecution, and of course many things we rejected. Certainly, we did not speak in language so severe as Mr. Fox spoke of other powers, our allies, fighting with us in the same cause, whose only offence was, that they were fighting against France.

But admitting that the language, though within the law, and justifiable on the authority of Mr. Fox's former speeches, was calculated to irritate France, still we deny that it tended to provoke a war. The English Government cannot prohibit newspaper publications, but by appealing to the laws, and therefore is not responsible for them; while the French Government, by crushing every paper in the least obnoxious to it, without law, but, by a mandate, is responsible for all that appears: hence, whatever might be the irritation of the Chief Consul, he could not blame the English Government, unless he thought it should alter the constitution to please him. But, if the conduct of France, and the paragraphs in the Moniteur, deserve censure, is that censure likely to provoke a war, or to ensure peace? Surely it is calculated to promote peace on the very principle, that to be secure of peace we must be prepared for war. If the assertions of the Moniteur, that the English press is a monster which must be destroyed; that England should have no connexion with the Continent, &c. be tamely submitted to; if France can unite this country and unite that country, can parcel out Germany, and ravage Switzerland with the tame acquiescence of mankind; of course she will be encouraged to proceed in her ambitious career. If she sees that England is not only at peace with her, but that the English people are asleep, will she not “snatch the glorious golden opportunity of accomplishing her designs?” “Contemptible” as Mr. Fox thinks the English newspapers, they may serve the purpose of a scarecrow, in frightening birds of prey from their country. A strong band of thieves is often deterred from committing robbery, by seeing that one weak man has his eyes upon them. A little dog is esteemed the best guardian of a house at night, as, however “contemptible” he may be in point of strength, he has the quickest ear and makes the most noise. All that we wish to do is, to occupy this sort of humble station. We wish to shew France that we have our eyes upon her, and that though we cannot prevent her from pillaging Switzerland for instance, at least we can alarm the neighbourhood, and put them on their guard against thieves. We wish to keep our countrymen alive to their danger, that, by shewing France they are not blind to her conduct, they may deter her from attempting her tricks upon ourselves at least. We made peace because we no longer had an attainable object in the war; because France was too powerful to leave us a hope of making an impression on her European empire, and all other impressions had been made, till we were tired of them; let us now shew France, by the spirit her proceedings have raised in our people, that if she will go on and provoke a war, this country, as one man, will rise with vengeance against her. Let her see that we are powerful like herself, not only in common resources for war, as she may be, but in that source of all other resources, the spirit of the people. The resources of the country, however much they may have been impaired by the war, are still equal to the greatest efforts, should a case of necessity arise. If the people of France had any influence over their government, not to say such an influence as the people of England have, and if they were so fearful of war as Mr. Fox would make us, if they were either asleep, or ready to see Great Britain seize principality after principality, erase nation after nation, divide and tyrannise over the Continent, and tell France one of the most valuable parts of her constitution must be destroyed, as it is dangerous to society, or rather to her views; if she were to say to France, you must confine yourself to your own limits, and not interfere with the rest of the Continent; if this language were to be held, and the people of France were so abject, fallen so low in spirit, so blind to their dearest interests, so lost to all feeling for their future existence, as to submit without even a murmur of complaint being heard in their coffee-houses, or printed in their newspapers; then, we ask, whether the English Government would not say, this is “the glorious golden opportunity” for extinguishing our greatest and most constant rival; we ask, whether such circumstances would not invite England to make war, and whether such a pusillanimous conduct on the part of France would not be the most certain way of losing that peace, for the preservation of which she made such sacrifices? We put this case of the English Government; but let us change it, and put it of the consular government, so consolidated, so armed, so powerful, and so ambitious; when we put it of this military despotism, which has already subdued, and dictates to the continent of Europe!—When we look at the power of France, we fault in doubt, and hesitate what we shall do, whether resistance be not vain, and submission the least painful way of expiring as a nation; till we recollect the great achievements of our fleets, the glorious struggles we have made against united Europe; till we feel and see that spirit rise, to which alone we are indebted for our wealth, liberties, and independence. For that spirit we look round, and when we see it, we exclaim, "we are safe;" this is the spirit Mr. Fox would repress!

If it be true that to insure peace you must shew yourselves prepared for war, the display of this spirit by the people of this country is at this time peculiarly necessary. It is not to be disguised that we made peace, because in reality we were vanquished with regard to the real objects of the war. France finding this country wearied out; exhausted, perhaps, in attacking her, may now think her turn is come to retort the attack. If so, would not her course be to feel her way before she struck a blow, as well as to gather strength and adjust her position? She unites Piedmont, she dictates to Holland, parcels out Germany, attempts to get Malta, &c.—All goes on very smoothly; the English Government submits, the people are tame: Hence France sees how far she has stunned the English by the blow she has given them: in proportion as they are silent, she calculates the extent she may proceed in her ambitious career, and how far, or when the reduction of England herself will be practicable? But she ravages Switzerland; the British government remonstrates; the people exclaim; and France finds this country is not so far humbled and subdued as she imagined: she sees we feel ourselves still capable of renewing the contest with her, and ready to renew it whenever a case of necessity occurs, and we are called upon by the government. Is not this the way to preserve peace? Have we any thing to expect from the forbearance of France? Must we not rely for peace on the capacity we display of making war; and is not this capacity the most powerfully displayed, by shewing that the people of this country feel indignant at the oppression of any other state—Switzerland, for instance:—that they are ready with their hearts and souls, as well as with their arms and money, to check unlawful ambition, and to humble presumption, especially if aimed at the safety or honour of their country? This display of the spirit of the people, too, is not only the most serious menace to France, but it is the least offensive to her, and the least likely under a wise administration, to provoke a war, since it strengthens their hands against France, without implicating them in any suspicion of entertaining a hostile spirit. It has this other advantage too, that it is attended with no expense, and may well be called "the cheap defence of nations."

These are the principles on which this paper has been conducted, these are the views with which we were influenced at the time the preliminaries of peace were published, and more recently when an alarm of hostilities prevailed in consequence of the conduct of France. We never have called for war; on the contrary, we have repeatedly said, that under all circumstances which have occurred, or exist, war would be the height of imprudence. Not because France has not given sufficient offence, or that the safety of this country and of Europe does not require her ambition should be checked and her power reduced, but because there is no chance of effecting those objects at present by a war, however brilliant our naval achievements might be; and that it is better, still, as we thought it was better when the preliminaries were signed, to trust to time and events to remedy our situation, than to renew a contest, which, with a view to the checking of the ambition and reducing the power of France on the Continent, must be hopeless; while its burthens and calamities would weaken the strength we may find it desirable to exert, when more favourable circumstances concur: add to these considerations, that we are not without some hopes, however slight they may be, that France, by a course of moderation and justice, by a disposition truly pacific, may render such a contest wholly unnecessary.

For our own part, we are not sorry that Mr. Fox, by charging us with libelling the French Government, and exciting war by our language, has afforded us this opportunity of explaining the views on which this paper has been conducted since the peace was signed. Some of those who read our paper one day and not another, who see it only once a week, or once a month by accident, who hence necessarily read only detached pieces of a whole; for surely we cannot be expected to repeat day after day, and to post up in every day's paper, as regularly as we prefix the title of "Morning Post," a statement of our sentiments with regard to peace or war!—Some of those, therefore, who read only detached papers, run away with an opinion that we call out for war, because we censure the conduct of the French Government. We censure it because we think it deserves censure, not because we wish for war. That we censure is the fault of the French Government, not a blame due to us as calling for hostilities. We have repeatedly said also that we shall never purchase peace by winking at the ambition or injustice of France, deeply important as they are to the interests of this country; and that from the moment in which it is found necessary for the sake of peace to stop the freedom of the press in this country with regard to France, from that moment Britain becomes a province of the French Republic.

We do not altogether blame Mr. Fox for what he has said respecting this paper, as he owns he has not read it, and we believe he has been misinformed. But having occupied so much room in endeavouring to place our conduct in a just point of view, we are unable this day, to pursue the most interesting part of this subject, namely, an inquiry into Mr. Fox's new French Principles.

OUR RELATIONS WITH FRANCE.

On Saturday we stated how far, on the authority of Mr. Fox, we are warranted in censuring the conduct of the French Government, when that conduct is hostile to the principles of freedom; and on Tuesday we stated the principles by which we were actuated in speaking of the peace that has been concluded with the French Republic, and the proceedings of that Republic, in regard to other nations, since the definitive treaty. So far we have gone in our own justification. We will now endeavour to examine the sentiments of Mr. Fox, in the course of the delivery of which he rendered this justification necessary; particularly his two great and leading sentiments, that in peace we shall only be engaged in commercial rivalry with France, and that, though her power be great and alarming, we should not apprehend any danger from her government or her people.

It is true, Mr. Fox admits the power of France is great, and that it is alarming; but we appeal to those who heard or have read his speeches, whether he does not make this admission as if he himself felt no alarm at it; whether he does not state it as a lawyer, in a law instrument, repeats a number of words not necessary to the meaning, but necessary to prevent flaws. The whole intent and meaning of Mr. Fox's speeches, the impression they were calculated to make, and did make, was, that there was no reason to dread the power of France; that all we had to do was to engage with her in a race of commercial rivalry, in which we were sure to beat her. Mr. Windham answered well to this, that if she was possessed of her present power, and we were likely to beat her in this commercial race, might she not turn upon us, like the wolf upon the lamb, and worry us. Mr. Windham argued on the tendency of Mr. Fox's speech; and Mr. Fox, in explanation, complained he was misrepresented, as he had admitted the alarming power of France. But Mr. Windham argued fairly, not upon the words, but upon the tendency, and as the speeches are to be found in every newspaper, the public can judge whether they had not that tendency; we positively insist they had, and no other. The expressions acknowledging the alarming power of France were put in as saving clauses, merely to stop up the flaws of the general argument, that it might be capable of holding water. The power of France was thrown into the shade, while "the commercial race" was the only object placed conspicuously in the foreground of the picture.

Now here again, as on Saturday, we do not mean to advance any opinions of our own, but to appeal to Mr. Fox's former language and principles, to shew that, in his present sentiments, he is in the wrong, and we are in the right—that we are in the right on his own authority. Yesterday se'night he said the French government and French people had, in his opinion, no wish to enter into any other contest with this country but a commercial contest*. The spirit of the French nation must have been greatly altered by the revolution; the wars and battles, the invasions, victories, plunder, and military life of the French, must have had an astonishing effect in converting them to merchants; their civil wars, proscriptions, massacres, their feuds and crimes of all sorts, stimulated by political fury, must have operated like enchantment in changing Frenchmen into manufacturers; for there was a time in which commerce and manufactures flourished rather more in France, than at present, and the trade of a soldier less, when Mr. Fox entertained very different sentiments. In the debates on the commercial treaty in 1787, Mr. Fox said, "With regard to what the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Pitt) had said respecting the political tendency of the commercial treaty to cement in bonds of peace and commerce the friendship of both countries, and that he conceived it not impossible by these means to destroy that enmity which had subsisted between the two nations, he must beg leave entirely to

Such were Mr. Fox's sentiments with regard to a "commercial contest" in 1787 with France, when her commerce and manufactures were at their height, when "credit, capital, and confidence" existed as well in France as in England, though not to the same extent, when a body, a class of men, born and bred merchants and manufacturers, existed also; and when in fact France did enter into commercial relations highly advantageous to this country. But then, no bonds of commerce could unite in peace and friendship the two countries, France being the inveterate and unalterable enemy of Great Britain; now if we will but enter into a commercial race with her, this, he thinks, is the only contest she wishes to carry on with this country. Now is the time for a commercial race! Has not Mr. Fox heard that she has just refused to enter into a commercial arrangement with this country, though far more advantageous to her than that of 1787? Does he not know the embarrassments she has thrown in the way of our commerce with France, and the continent generally? Does he think that a people, whose manufacturing and commercial establishments have been broken up and swept away, who have gained so little by commerce, and so much by arms; does he think that such a people are more likely to engage in a commercial race with this country than they were in the most flourishing days of Bourdeaux, Lyons, and Marseilles?

* In the debate on the commercial treaty, Feb. 15, 1787, Mr. Pitt having opened the subject in an elaborate speech, Mr. Fox spoke immediately after: in the course of his speech he said, "With regard to what the Right Hon. Gentleman has observed respecting the political tendency of a commercial treaty to cement in bonds of peace and commerce the friendship of both countries, and that he conceived it not impossible, by these means, to destroy that enmity which had subsisted between the two nations, he must beg leave entirely to dissent. France was the inveterate and unalterable political enemy of Great Britain. No ties of affection or mutual interest could possibly eradicate what was so deeply rooted in her constitution. What could demonstrate it more than the invariable system of her policy towards this island? Was not her whole conduct towards this country an unwearied and systematic series of measures, either distinguished for their sinister intrigue, or declared hostility? He did not mean to say this enmity arose from any vindictive principles; it was not that she adopted her measures for our annihilation in remembrance of Cressy or Agincourt; no, her policy of diminishing our power and prosperity arises from her own inordinate ambition of universal monarchy, and thus are we her natural enemies. It is from us she fears the diminution of her powers to obtain this desirable object of her inordinate ambition. From us alone do the other powers of Europe hope for protection, to maintain that balance of power which can preserve their respective liberties from her encroachments. We are therefore not her foe from enmity or ambition; we are only her enemy in her attempts to destroy that system of policy on which the other states of Europe must depend for their liberties, as well as their existence. When she attempts encroachments on the barriers of European liberty, it is then Great Britain is her enemy, and no longer, and while this is the object of her ambition, so we shall ever remain: and when had we not reason to look upon France with this jealousy and circumspection? View the tenor of all our history. While she practised these political intrigues of ambition, we were always the only powerful and ready to check, punish, and counteract her designs.—(Vide Debrett's Debates, vol. xii. page 179.)

* It is my own firm conviction that there is, on the part of the French people, as well as the French government, a strong desire to restore their commerce to new activity, and their manufactures to new life; and this, I believe, is the field in which, if any contest is to be carried on between the two countries, they wish the dispute to be conducted.—(Vide Mr. Fox's Speech, Morning Chronicle of Wednesday, Nov. 24, 1802.)

"So far the commercial race.—Now, as to the ambition and aggrandisement of France, or, as Mr. Fox calls them, her "greatness;" he says, "as the growing greatness of Holland was the admiration of our ancestors, we should not envy the greatness of France; and that if we attempt to diminish it, we shall only reduce ourselves to a worse situation than that in which we at present stand;" that is, we had better be easy, or we shall be ruined quite.* Now, "the spirit of this country should not be damped at the greatness of France, we should admire it as we admired that of Holland;" Mr. Fox dreads that we entertain "a spirit of perpetual hostility" towards France, though in 1787, speaking of her as a nation, she was "the inveterate and unalterable political enemy of Great Britain."—Now he "sees no danger from the government or people of France,"† though in 1787 "their whole conduct was a continued series of hostility or intrigue against the interests of this country."—But why should we compare the ferocious, implacable government of Louis the 16th, with the mild, conciliatory government of Buonaparté? How can we imagine that the compact, condensed strength of the last of the Bourbons, with the enormous population of twenty-six millions, was not far more powerful than the extended, and consequently feeble empire of the Chief Consul, with only fifty millions of inhabitants? Then those soldiers of Louis the 16th, why, they were the soldiers of a tyrant; but these consular troops, these are freemen! Only see how they are giving liberty to Switzerland? Surely we need not dread that they will turn their arms against England, unless to emancipate it? The French are such innocent people, that Mr. Fox "sees no danger from them," though in 1787 they were perpetually intriguing against this country. The French revolution has quite changed them, and made them all honest men! They are not ferocious, deceitful, or corrupt, as they were formerly! Only see what a mild creature the Chief Consul is! Look at that simple, honest, pure man, friend Talleyrand! No, no; it is not in the nature of things that any harm should come from the French government, or French people. Mr. Fox "sees no danger from them."

With regard to the state of the continent, Mr. Fox speaks as if the Chief Consul really had accomplished his object, avowed in the Moniteur; as if he really had succeeded in cutting us off from the continent for ever. Mr. Fox says, "After the experience of the last war, no man could say that we should place much reliance, or that we ought to risk much for any continental connexions. I should be sorry if ministers now looked for such a connexion, with a view to the renewal of hostilities."—To this passage which we take from Mr. Fox's speech in the Morning Chronicle of Thursday, we answer with another passage of a speech of his on the Commercial Treaty, 1787.—"Is this country, then, not in a situation to take part in preserving the liberties of Europe? Is she so sunk in distress, as to consider herself inadequate to the preservation of that to which she owes her existence, and her rank among the nations of Europe? Does the Hon. Gentleman mean to hold this language to the world?"* Such were Mr. Fox's words in 1787. Then he could assert too, that "the existence of Britain depended on supporting the balance of power in Europe, for without that she could not herself prosper." But now he asks, if France overturns Switzerland, "What right have we to interpose?" "Are we to hold ourselves forth as guarantees of the independence of all the nations in Europe?" "Are we to imitate the decree of the French convention, Nov. 19th, 1792, and to grant assistance and fraternity to every people that call for it?" These are the new French sentiments fresh imported by Mr. Fox from Paris; these

* "The growing greatness of Holland was not an object of terror, but of admiration, to our ancestors; and I know not why the greatness of France, arising from the same source, should now be quoted to damp the spirits and to excite the envy of this country. That nation, too, will ere long find her natural level: her ambition will soon waste itself, or her strength will decay. At all events, what can Great Britain now achieve to restrain that ambition? I will appeal to common sense, whether, even though an evil be obvious and severe, we should attempt to remove it by an effort which must aggravate its severity? Such, I think, would be the result of the interference which some gentlemen would recommend to oppose the proceedings of the French government.—(Mr. Fox's Speech on Wednesday, Nov. 25, 1802. Vide Morning Chronicle of Thursday.)

† Trudging the Chief Consul can answer no purpose, unless it is wished to keep up a spirit of perpetual hostility. This I shall ever deprecate. I think the present a most momentous crisis indeed for this country, but I see no danger from the government or people of France. Those who do, must admit that they cannot avert that danger, or soften the animosity they suppose to exist.—(Vide Mr. Fox's Speech, Morning Chronicle, Nov. 25, 1802.)

* In the debates on the Commercial Treaty, February 15th, 1787, Mr. Wilberforce made a speech nearly the same as he made last Thursday, disapproving of continental alliances, and attacking Mr. Fox about his Dutch negotiation. To this Mr. Fox replied and said:—"Was this country, then, in a situation to take a part in preserving the liberties of Europe? Was she so sunk in distress as to consider herself inadequate to the preservation of that to which she owed her existence, and her rank among the nations of Europe? Did the Hon. Gentleman mean to hold out that language to the world? For his own part, he would tell the poorest cottager in the kingdom, that he had an interest in the safety of the state, and consequently in the balance of power of Europe. The existence of Britain depended on supporting that balance, for without that she could not prosper herself; and to the preservation of the public credit, the happiness of the people must, in some measure be sacrificed. Shameful was the neglect which ministers had shewn in the formation of alliances.—Till that unhappy period when we were left without allies, we had always fought successfully.—(Vide Debate's Debates, vol. xxi. page 128.)

were his sentiments fifteen years ago on the policy of the balance of power in Europe, and the necessity of preserving the independence of other states, as indispensable to our own existence. If he were to read this passage he would perhaps say, "Aye, but France is so powerful, it is in vain to inter ere; I lament the fate of Switzerland; but we cannot prevent it. True, we cannot; but must we therefore be silent? Is the British empire so fallen, so sunk down beneath the power of France, that the British people must not sympathise in the sufferings and slavery of a brave and generous nation; that they must not execrate its oppressors for fear of offending "the chief-justice of the peace of Europe?"—Is Mr. Fox afraid that he should issue his warrant and lay us all in the watch-house? We trust, though we are unable at present to make any impression on the European empire of France, that still we are as safe from her vengeance as she is from our power; and safer we think of the two, as the only place on which we can meet is the sea. Does Mr. Fox mean to say, we are never to look forward to continental alliances and connexions, or to the reduction of the present power of France? He admitted in Thursday's debate, that a war for the preservation of the balance of power might be justifiable, and that all the wars undertaken for that object from the revolution to the peace of 1763 were justifiable. Had any of those wars such an object before them as we now have? Was the balance of power ever so unequal? We may say it is destroyed, since the whole continent south of the Baltic is in the scale of France. Would not a war for the recovery of the balance of power be therefore justifiable at this moment? Yes, but, says Mr. Fox, "the occasion must be pressing, and the means equal to the accomplishment of the object." What occasion can be more pressing than the moment when France is consolidating her undue influence? But the means!—There we confess we must stop. The means do not exist on the continent, though this country may be ready and able to play her part. But if the undue balance and the necessity exist, (Mr. Fox admits the power of France is alarming) must the people of England sit down quietly, shut their eyes, and hold their tongues? May they not tell the world they are sensible of the general danger, and shew they are ready to assist in stopping it? Such has hitherto been the freedom of their speech, and of the press. But Mr. Fox says hush! or you'll offend "the Envoy of God!"—"very well," John Bull may answer, "and what can he do?" We, in reply, may say, "nothing more than he does."—Ministers well know what he has done; the commercial negotiation, the imprisonment of Auvergne, the insolence on presenting our remonstrance respecting Switzerland, the annoyance of our trade on the continent, the demands to stifle the British press, and to send away the Bourbon family. The history of these, we firmly believe, would kindle this country into a flame, and display, in the most glowing colours, the insolence and presumption of France. Ministers, desirous of preserving peace, are eager to conceal every circumstance of these transactions, and hence in arguing as we do, we argue without a quarter of the force which all the facts, if public, would afford; while Mr. Fox has the full advantage of appearances,—and much advantage it is! Well might it be asked by John Bull respecting the Chief Consul,—"and what can he do?"—The answer is short; nothing more than make war: he has done every thing else; and he only refrains from that because he would lose by it. Circumstances will probably change the state of affairs. Austria is crippled by a scanty harvest; but we cannot agree with Mr. Fox that though the present moment may not be favourable for war, that therefore ministers should not cultivate alliances with the view of checking the ambition of France, which will too soon come in contact both with Austria and Britain.

The sentiments of Mr. Fox, in 1787, form a direct refutation of the doctrines he now holds in parliament. Those who have leisure and disposition may draw out the contrast. To every reason he now gives for dreaming of no other contest with France, but a commercial race, will be found a direct contradiction in his speeches fifteen years ago, though France was not then more than half so extensive in territory, or numerous in population, as she now is. She is now four times more formidable as a military power, and dangerous from her ambition, and the disposition of her government. But Mr. Fox fears nothing from her government or her people; he thinks the only contest they wish to enter into with us, is a "commercial race!" What infatuation! As we have quoted Mr. Fox's speeches in 1787, which are full of the language Mr. Windham now uses; nay, they are far more Antigallican than Mr. Windham's sentiments; we beg leave to present, as a reverse of them, an extract of Mr. Fox's speech at the Whig Club, on the 1st of June last, which must have been spoken, when he had it in contemplation to visit Paris. The speech at the time made no particular impression, except that on reading it we remember to have been indignant at that passage which directly insinuates there is as little of the liberty of the press in this country as in France, and we were much disposed to censure it; but it was disagreeable publicly to dissent from the opinion of Mr. Fox. This extract of the speech will be read with far more interest than when first published. It was translated, and inserted in the Moniteur, and Mr. Fox went to France with these words in his mouth, that upon a comparison of the state of freedom in the two countries, the French *could retort upon us!

* At the last meeting of the Whig Club, June 1, 1802, Mr. Fox said:—"I trust the peace will be permanent, but it must then be cordial. It cannot be permanent if we allow ourselves to be the dupes of those men who endeavour to inflame our passions against the French Republic and against the French government, in dwelling upon its defects, and triumphing in its hostility to the principles of freedom. Instead, however, of taunting at the supposed slavery of other governments, it would be better to consider whether we have preserved our own constitution unimpaired: the two nations, I believe, are both so thoroughly impressed with the folly of the late war, that they will equally avoid being hurried by animosities, artfully excited, into the dangers from which they have escaped. I should even be still better pleased with the peace, if I saw a spirit of cordiality in the authors of it here; and if, after having concluded peace, they adopted a tone and language more calculated to give it permanence, by discouraging every thing that tended to keep alive the hostile mind. It seems to be too much the fashion of the present moment to turn our atten-

The liberty of the press is the subject on which we feel most deeply, both from the "paltry consideration" of self-interest, and, as we believe it to be the outwork of all our other liberties. It is also the point on which Mr. Fox the most deserves reproach for his conduct. Is it in the spirit of kindness to the liberty of the press that he should attack the newspapers as he has done in parliament, bearing down with the weight of his great abilities, and by foul imputations on their motives, those who have cherished his former sentiments? If we have exhorted the people of Britain to be jealous of the power and ambition of France, we have only repeated the injunction of Mr. Fox in 1787, when France was far less powerful or ambitious; if we have exclaimed against the despotism of Buonaparté, we have only followed the example of Mr. Fox, who, nine years ago, exclaimed against the despotism of other sovereigns, under whose iron rod we were not in the hundredth part of the danger of falling that we now are of falling under that of the Chief Consul; if we have censured the conduct of France in extending her dominion beyond what she calls "her natural boundaries," we have only acted upon the principle of the balance of power which Mr. Fox inculcated fifteen years ago; if we have execrated her seizure and oppression of Switzerland, we have only imitated Mr. Fox, who justly condemned the partition of Poland. On this last occasion we have had these additional inducements for our conduct, that Poland was divided among three states, and something like the balance of power, was preserved in the partition of it, while France takes Switzerland wholly to herself; that France is already far more powerful than any of those states, and should not be further strengthened; and lastly, that, as Mr. Fox said, in 1787, France is the natural and unalterable political enemy of Great Britain, while those states are more often friends than foes. If we have spoken in terms of indignation of the oppression and slavery to which the French people are reduced, we have acted on those immutable principles of justice and freedom which Mr. Fox has so often and so ably applied to this and other governments, and which cannot now be made to bend in favour of France; and if we have spurned at the efforts of the French Government to stifle the liberty of the press in this country, we have only obeyed the injunctions of Mr. Fox, who at the Whig Club in June last said it was in danger, and that we should exert ourselves in its defence. For having acted on his principles, for having followed his advice, is it generous in him to rise in parliament, and make such an attack on the liberty of the press, and particularly on the newspapers, as he has made? To impute to us paltry motives; of only contriving something to make people stare; of calumniating the people of England; of libelling the Chief Magistrate of France; of making a contemptible warfare? Is it in the spirit of kindness and protection to the liberty of the press that men should be stigmatised, merely because they act upon Mr. Fox's old opinions, and oppose his new ones? Mr. Fox seems to have wholly forgotten himself, and by mistake to have taken up Mr. Windham's doctrines respecting the press, instead of his own. Newspapers are so contemptible, they are conducted on such paltry motives, such libellers and calumniators, that Mr. Fox appears to think with some writers in the French journals, that the liberty of the press should not be extended to them—that such a liberty in their hands is dangerous—that it never was meant it should be allowed to newspapers; but that it should be confined to circles above the populace, to the libraries of the learned, to the huge folio volumes, the weight of which would prevent it from circulating mischief.

Indeed we fear Mr. Fox's notions of the liberty of the press have undergone a lamentable change. By The Morning Chronicle we find that on the 1st of June last, at the Whig Club, he desired us not to rail so much at the want of the liberty of the press in France, but to look at the state of it at home. The inference to be drawn from this is, that though it be in a bad state in France, it is not much better in England. We must remind Mr. Fox of what he certainly forgets. At no time, and in no country in Europe where printing newspapers has been allowed, has the press been so completely enslaved as in France, while in England, that liberty is precisely the same as Mr. Fox himself established, or rather declared it. To appoint a censor to the press has been called an act of tyranny. In France the editors of news-

tion to the government of France, as if we had nothing amiss in our own domestic concerns. Are we sure, however, that when we are triumphing over the slavery of others, our own liberties are secure from every danger: while we blame the extravagant adulation that is offered to the first magistrate in another country, is there no adulation ever paid to the chief magistrate at home? If the liberty of the press, that invaluable privilege of a free country, be suppressed in France, do we find that any great degree of boldness of discussion is attempted here? These, and other comparisons of the same kind, by shewing us how the retort may be made, should teach us to correct what is amiss in ourselves, before we arraign the conduct, or insult over the slavishness of our neighbours. I do not know, indeed, that the present is a very favourable moment to attempt the remedy of abuses at home; but surely the state of domestic policy, the situation of liberty among us at this time, is not so very satisfactory, compared with what it has been in former periods, as to induce us to go abroad to discover bad measures to be exposed, and a decay of freedom, on account of which we are entitled to taunt and deride our neighbours. — (Vide Morning Chronicle, June 2, 1802.)

papers pray that a censor may be appointed. They would be happy if a censor were set over them (this we may say from personal knowledge), as then they could rest satisfied that what they inserted would not incur displeasure. But no: no censor will be appointed; and even the most abject flatterer of Buonaparté, is afraid that by an act of flattery he may offend, or by an article of news which the editor may think harmless. By any of those accidents, against which the greatest prudence cannot guard, the editor may draw down Consular vengeance; seals may then be put upon his presses, his paper be stopped, and his family ruined. He may even think himself happy if a troop of soldiers does not convey him to prison; and for a crime, too, the nature of which he may never be informed. Such is the state of the press in France. In England, the law of what is or what is not a libel stands precisely as Mr. Fox placed it by his Libel Bill, and as it has stood for centuries. It is true, that printing presses are registered, proprietors of newspapers are registered, printers must affix their names to the works they print, and certain libels on the King or his government may, on a second conviction, be made transportable offences. These are all restrictions to which we are not friendly, and we were the less friendly to them at the time they were passed into law, as they seemed to originate in a spirit of hostility against the press altogether. But with all these restrictions, the question of what is or what is not a libel is precisely as it was placed by Mr. Fox's Declaratory Bill; and yet Mr. Fox insinuates that the liberty of the press is nearly as much restricted as in France. To prove the freedom of the press does not exist in this country so much as formerly, Mr. Fox asks, if a man writes bold truths against the government, whether he can get any person to publish them, as he formerly could have done? By "bold truths" Mr. Fox must mean "libels." If they be not libels, the publisher knows that a jury will protect him against the vengeance of government. If they be libels, would Mr. Fox have them pass with impunity? Does Mr. Fox think that juries are too ready to convict? Can it be denied that a number of wicked and inflammatory libels were circulated in cheap publications, with the design of stirring up an ignorant populace? Were these the "bold truths" to which Mr. Fox alludes? Do not the newspapers speak "bold truths" against the government? The public will acknowledge they do, whatever may be Mr. Fox's opinion.—The pages of The Morning Chronicle, The Morning Post, and other publications, will answer the question. And yet against these very newspapers, which are the most ready channels through which to convey "bold truths," in the very moment when their appearance may prevent bad measures; against these very channels, Mr. Fox indulges in the severest censure, because they have spoken "bold truths" of Buonaparté! The moment the journalists speak "bold truths" of the Chief Consul, they become "contemptible libellers," "base calumniators," &c. Feeling that we possess the freedom of the press more than any other European nation (though not to the extent we wish), in the daily exercise of this invaluable privilege; feeling all this, and seeing Mr. Fox come fresh from France to attack the press, we should deserve to be put down as "paltry libellers," and "contemptible calumniators;"—we should no longer deserve to enjoy the liberty of the press in any degree, if we did not stand up in our own defence, even against such heavy charges, urged as they are by so great an authority and such powerful abilities, to assert that liberty even in the face of Mr. Fox, and shew the world by our sense of its value that we deserve to possess it.

Some of Mr. Fox's friends are no better friends to the liberty of the press, we fear, than Mr. Fox himself. Because we have presumed to answer the charges of Mr. Fox, because we make a defence, we are accused of abusing him, and threatened with the loss of his friends' custom. This is their liberty of the press! Mr. Fox makes a charge on hearsay evidence, he confesses he has not read the newspapers; he is manifestly misinformed, and on this misinformation he attacks the newspapers in the most unqualified language. The Morning Post takes the liberty of defending itself, and of endeavouring to shew that Mr. Fox, misled, has committed an act of injustice. What is the result? Mr. Fox's friends say they will discontinue the paper, because it abuses him. Are we then to sit down mute under Mr. Fox's unjust, not to say illiberal rebuke? We must be condemned unheard, however conscious we may be of the rectitude of our conduct, or Mr. Fox's friends will leave off the paper! Here is freedom of discussion, and the liberty of the press!—This is true Consular liberty—the liberty of writing and railing all on one side. The moment we dare to question the assertion of Mr. Fox, from that moment we are no friends of liberty. We may speak "bold truths" of the English Government as much as we please, but if we doubt Mr. Fox's infallibility, or defend ourselves when attacked by him, then our paper is not fit to be read, and Mr. Fox's friends turn it out.

Such being their notions of the liberty of the press, when his opinions are called in question, we are not surprised to hear that we are accused of abusing Mr. Fox. Those who think it impossible for Mr. Fox to err, call any inquiry into the truth of his opinions abuse. You must either believe or be de-d; this is the doctrine of these gentlemen. But if ever they should be seized with a fit of candour, we should be obliged to them to peruse again the articles in The Morning Post, and to point out any one passage which can be truly described as abuse. Have we said anything so harsh of Mr. Fox as he has said of The Morning Post? Have we charged him with "contriving something in his speeches only to excite curiosity, from paltry considerations." Have we represented him as a calumniator of the people of England, waging a contemptible warfare? Have we called him a libeller? He has said all these things of the newspapers, and parricularly of The Morning Post; but we have not, in the slightest degree, retorted upon him, unless reasoning to shew that his charges were unjust can be called such a retort. In the course of this discussion, we have introduced nothing for the purpose of attacking Mr. Fox, or that was not necessary to our own defence against his attacks: neither have we spoken of him in disrespectful terms, or with invective.—Mr. Fox's best friends are not those who fawn upon his foibles; and whether it displease Mr. Fox, or his friends, we shall not cease to esteem a man who has so essentially served his country, or to speak out with freedom whenever we see reason to lament his conduct. Under these circumstances we hope Mr. Fox's friends will again patronise The Morning Post, and that they will shew they can endure the liberty of the press as well as applaud its adulation.

Mr. Fox's Definition of a Despot.

The Minister was offended at the expression of German despots; but his honourable friend, who had made use of the expression, had styled these monarchs properly; for they had manifested to the world that their uniform intention was to make the increase of their power the rule of their conduct. Debrett's Parliamentary Debates, vol. xl. p. 405.

Extract from Mr. Fox's Speech at the Whig Club.

A malignant influence unfortunately prevails over the conduct of the national defence; but the inference is not, that we should be slack or remiss, or inactive in resisting the enemy;—the true inference is, that the Friends of Liberty should, with the spirit and zeal that belong to their manly character, exert themselves in averting a foreign yoke; never forgetting that in happier and more favourable times, it will be EQUALLY their duty to use EVERY EFFORT to shake off the YOKE OF OUR ENGLISH TYRANTS.—Morning Post, May 2, 1798.—A few days after the delivery of this speech, Hrs MAJESTY thought proper to mark his disapprobation of Mr. Fox's conduct, by causing his name to be erased from the Council Book.

AMSTERDAM BANK.

The following paper, relative to the bank of Amsterdam, is certainly of considerable importance to the commercial world.—The intermediate administration of the commune of Amsterdam having nothing more at heart than to establish upon solid bases, the well-being of this city, and particularly the prosperity of its commerce, has the satisfaction to make known to whomever it concerns, that the commissioners of the bank of this city have declared to them, by their report of the 19th of July last, that the deficit which was found in the bank, has been entirely filled by the payments made by and on the part of the treasury; and that it appears by the account they have drawn up, and of which they have sent a copy, both the said treasury and the superintendants of the bank, that all the pretensions of the bank, at the charge of the city, have been fully acquitted and replaced by specie; so that at present there is no bank money in circulation which does not rest upon effective and metallic value, in specie, ingots, and monies deposited in the above-mentioned bank: that the bank being thereby radically re-established and restored to its primitive institution, the city has completely satisfied the guarantee to which she is at all times engaged, whilst, on the other hand, there has been taken, both on the part of the administration of the said city, as on that of the commissaries of the bank, the necessary measures and precautions to render in future impossible all attack upon that primitive institution, and to give to all persons interested the most assured pledge of the inviolability of that deposit, and of the unalterable will of the administration, that it shall be sheltered from all infraction.—That the administration of the said city, endeavouring to operate this precious establishment in the most easy and advantageous manner to the person interested, and in order to favour, as much as possible, the circulation of the bank-money, have determined from the 19th of last July, to cause to cease at the opening of the bank, which took place on the 30th of the said month, the imposition of a demi-sol for each hundred florins, stipulated by the resolution of the council of commune, of the 31st March, 1796, upon payments in bank, and to fix it on the ancient footing of three sols for each party written in bank: the superintendants having besides been charged by the said resolution of the 19th of July last, to revise (in concert with the commissaries,) the regulation and ordinances of the bank, to make in them the alterations required by the present circumstances, and to offer them afterwards to the sanction of the administration. That all the regulations, and above-mentioned ordinances being essentially to remain in all their force and vigour until the necessary changes shall have been made in them upon the proposition of the said commission, and being to that effect, and necessarily expressly confirmed and renewed here, the intermediate administration have judged it in all respects suitable and useful in changing what has been ordered and decreed by anterior laws upon the payments in bank to resolve by the present:

Art. I. That the value of every bill of exchange which shall be drawn or negotiated in this city, after the 30th of the month of October, approaching upon places situated out of the republic, and the amount of which shall be 300 florins and upwards, shall be acquitted in the bank of this city.—II. That all bills of exchange upon, or payable in this city, of the value of 300 florins and upwards, drawn from places situated in the French repub. Gt. Britain, Spain, Portugal, and Italy, shall also be paid in bank after the 31st Jan. 1803.—III. That every bill of exchange which, conformably to the Art. I. and II. is to be acquitted in bank, and shall be proved to have been done in any other manner, shall be held to be all paid, and each of the two contravening persons shall pay a fine of 5 per cent. upon the total sum of these payments made out of the bank.—IV. That, as payments of bills of exchange will not be considered good, but conformably to the 1st and 2d Art. the usage introduced for some time of writing in bank to oneself for another, as well as that of regulating the payment of it in current money, shall cease at the periods mentioned in the said articles; the resolution of the council of commune of the 6th Oct. 1796, being in that respect revoked by the present.

AFFAIRS OF INDIA.

Papers presented to the House of Commons from the East India Company, concerning the late Nabob of the Carnatic. Ordered to be printed 21st and 23d June, 1802.

To Lieut. Col. Mac Neil.—Sir, 1. The precarious state of his highness the nabob's health being such as to indicate the probability of his highness's early dissolution, the rt hon. the governor in council has judged it expedient, for the preservation of order, to station a party of troops at the palace of Chepauk; and his ldp, relying on your prudence and discretion, has been pleased to appoint you to the command of the troops. 2. The detail will consist of 3 companies of his majesty's Scotch brigade, 5 companies of the 1st battalion 4th regt of native infantry, a sebaltern, and 30 Europeans, and 1 company of native artillery with 4 six-pounders, and 50 troopers from the governor's body guard. A farther portion of the garrison of Fort St. George will be held in readiness to join you, if occasion should render that measure necessary. 3. The principal object of your care being the preservation of order within the palace of Chepauk, at the period of the nabob's dissolution, the governor in council directs you, after securing the first gate of the garden, to march the detachment to the principal gateway of the palace, and take possession of it. 4. A communication of this intended measure will be made to the nabob sufficiently early, it is hoped, to prevent any alarm in his highness's mind; and the expedition and secrecy with which it will be executed, will probably prevent any opposition or confusion. 5. Having taken possession of the principal gateway, it will be necessary to make a disposition of your force for maintaining that position. 6. In carrying this part of your orders into effect, the governor in council desires you to use every degree of conciliation and respect towards the immediate family of the nabob; and towards the confidential officers of his highness's govt. By an adherence to that mode of conduct, the gov. in council expects that no difficulty will occur; but if, notwithstanding this moderation, you should be opposed in the execution of these orders with respect to possessing the gateway, you will, after making the best explanation of your orders which circumstances will admit to the nabob's officers within the gateway, remain 30 minutes, and if, after the expiration of that time, you shall have received no communication from major Grant, the military secretary of the governor, you will obtain possession of the gateway by force. 7. After having established yourself at the gateway of the palace, you will consider the best means of restraining the intercourse of persons with the interior of the palace; but as it is impossible to describe, with sufficient accuracy, the different passages through the external wall of the palace, I am directed to inform you, that when the event of the nabob's death shall occur, it will be your duty, to the extent of your power, to prevent the introduction of any partizans into the palace, to restrain any apparent commotion, to protect from violence the persons of the nabob's immediate family, and to provide the best practicable means for preventing his highness's property and treasure from being removed from the palace. In executing this part of the order, you will observe that the governor in council does not consider the brothers of his highness to constitute any part of his immediate family; and you will endeavour to restrain them, by force if necessary and practicable, from entering the palace until some arrangement of affairs shall be made. 8. As soon as may be practicable, after taking possession of the gateway, you will endeavour to ascertain what number of armed or unarmed men may be within the walls of the palace, and you will cause that number to be so far diminished as you shall judge necessary to the tranquil execution of these orders; you will particularly endeavour to expel, from within the walls of the palace, all such armed men as may not be in the immediate service of his highness the nabob: upon this point you will make an early report, and it is the intention of the governor in council to furnish you, at the earliest possible period of time after the death of the nabob, with more detailed instructions for the guidance of your conduct.—

9. It will be obvious to you that the governor in council considers the trust now reposed in you, to involve considerations of the greatest delicacy and importance, and his ldp directs me to express his confident expectations, that your conduct in the discharge of it will be such as the nature of the conjuncture, and the situation of his highness's family, demand from the liberality and dignity of the British govt.—10. During this service, you will address immediately to the governor such communications as may become necessary, and obey such orders as you may receive directly from his ldp.—I am, sir, &c. (Signed) J WEBBE, Fort St. George, 5 July, 1801. Chief Sec. to Gov.

To J. Webbe, Esq. Chief Sec. to Government.—Sir, I request you will be pleased to inform the right hon. governor, that, agreeably to his ldp's instructions, I marched the troops placed under my command for the preservation of order at Chepauk, through both the gateways leading to the palace; of these gates I took possession, and I have placed guards at three other gates leading through the exterior wall. The communication which the right hon. governor was pleased to make of his ldp's intentions, seemed to have considerably reconciled the nabob to the measure itself, but he was very much averse to guards being placed within the interior gate. The space there in front of the palace is very small, and the immediate entrance to the palace is quite close to the gate. As there seemed to be no immediate necessity for stationing guards within, and as the nabob was so much averse to any being placed there, I judged it fit to accommodate his highness's inclinations as far as possible: I have therefore placed sentries only at the gate, and the body of the troops close to it on the outside. There is no kind of commotion whatever within the palace walls, and there is every appearance of tranquillity being preserved.—I have the honour to be, &c. D. MAC NEIL, Lt. Col. Chepauk, 5th July, 1801.

To Lieut. Col. Mac Neil, commanding a detachment at Chepauk.—Sir, I have received your letter of this date; and am directed by the rt hon. the governor in council, to express his ldp's entire approbation of your consenting, under the circumstances you have stated, to withdraw the guards from the interior part of the gateway of his highness the nabob's palace. It being the intention of the rt hon. the governor in council, that every degree of attention and conciliation should be shewn to the personal wishes of the nabob, his ldp is desirous that you should be studious to meet his highness's wishes in every point, not involving the security of the great object entrusted to your care.

In addition to the general instructions contained in my letter of yesterday, I am directed to desire that the greatest degree of caution may be used in your communication with the nabob, or with his highness's family and ministers, to avoid the appearance of any concurrence on the part of the British govt in the arrangements which his highness may be desirous of making with respect either to his immediate property, or to the general affairs of the Carnatic; for the same reason you will abstain from giving countenance to any party which may be formed in the palace in favour of any part of the nabob's family, or of his highness's ministers.

It is understood that the principal part of the nabob's treasure is deposited in the apartments of his highness's sister, the Boody Begum; and I am directed to communicate this intelligence to you, in order that your attention may be particularly directed to those apartments, in carrying into execution his ldp's orders for preventing the removal of the treasure from Chepauk. I am, &c.

J. WEBBE, Chief Sec. of Govt.

Fort St. George, 5th July, 1801.

To J. Webbe, Esq. Chief Sec.—Sir, I have the honour of your letter of this date, and I beg leave to assure the rt hon. the governor in council, that every part of his ldp's orders shall be duly observed and executed.

I have taken such precautions as I think will render it altogether impossible for treasure (unless in very small sums, or in covered doolies) to be carried out of any part of the palace. May I request the honour of his ldp's permission to apprise the nabob that conveyances of that description are not expected to be sent from the palace?—I have the honour to be, &c. D. MAC NEIL, Lt. Col.

Chepauk, 5th July, 1801.

To Lieut. Col. Mac Neil, commanding a detachment at Chepauk.—Sir, In reply to your letter of last night I am directed to acquaint you, that until his highness the nabob shall expire, the rt hon. the governor in council does not consider it expedient to impose any restraint on the egress of covered palankeens from the palace of Chepauk; but after that event shall have happened, you will prevent the issue of covered palankeens from the palace, until you shall have received further orders from the governor in council.

In issuing these instructions, the governor in council confines the operation of them to the period of time during which order shall prevail in the interior of the palace; but if any commotion should arise previously to the death of the nabob, you will take effectual measures for restraining the issue of treasure, by any mode of conveyance whatever, until you shall have received the further directions of the governor in council.

If, previously to the death of the nabob, you shall have reason to suspect an attempt to carry treasure from the palace, without his highness's consent, you will also in that event restrain the issue of it, until the nabob's consent shall be obtained for the passage from the palace. I am, sir, your obedient servant,

J. WEBBE, Chief Sec. to Govt.

No. 2. Copy of Instructions to Lieut. Col. Bowser, dated 11th July 1801.

Sir, The rt hon. the governor in council having judged it expedient to assemble a small force, consisting of 5 companies of the 2d batt. 17th regt of native infantry, 5 troops of the 2d regt. native cavalry, and 2 six-pounders with a proportion of artillery; I am directed to inform you, that the rt hon. the governor in council has selected you to command it; you will accordingly proceed to join the detachment which is now encamped in the bed of the Long Tank, and take whatever measures may be necessary for keeping it ready to move at a short notice. I am, &c.

No. 3. Copy of Instruc. to Messrs. Webbe and Close, dated 15th July, 1801; when they proceeded to the Palace of the late Nabob Omdut ul Omrah.

To Josiah Webbe, Esq. and Lieut. Col. Close.—Gentlemen, In consequence of the death of his highness the nabob Omdut ul Omrah, it is my earnest desire, founded on the instructions of his excellency the gov. general, that a complete adjustment of the affairs of the Carnatic should be made with the least practicable delay.

The nature of the evidence which has been obtained of the violation of the alliance by the nabobs Mahomed Ali and Omdut ul Omrah, and the course of reasoning upon the condition in which the family of their highnesses has, by that discovery, been placed in relation to the British govt, are subjects so familiar to you, that any particular instructions from me with regard to the principles, or to the detailed considerations of the question, appear to be superfluous. It will be sufficient for me therefore to state, that the death of the nabob has produced no change in the principles by which it will be proper to regulate the conduct of the British govt towards the family of his highness; but in the application of those principles to the actual state of affairs, I judge it to be of the greatest importance to the national character, as well as to the critical state of our affairs, that the arrangement of the affairs of the Carnatic should be adjusted by an amicable negotiation. I accordingly depute you to conduct this negotiation, and hereby authorize and empower you to exercise your own discretion for the purpose of carrying into effect my intentions, and the instructions of his excellency the gov. general. The officer commanding the forces at Chepauk will obey such orders as he may receive from you. I am, &c. CLIVE.

Fort St. George, 15th July, 1801.

No. 4. Report of Messrs. Webbe and Close, explanatory of their Proceedings at the Palace of his late Highness the Nabob, in their Interviews or Negotiations with the Regents and Taje ul Omrah.—[N. B. In this document are contained the propositions from Taje ul Omrah, and from Najeeb Khan and Juke Ali Khan, required by the 4th and 5th orders of the honourable house. July 15th, 1801.—In conformity to your ldp's instructions, we proceeded to the palace of Chepauk, having previously caused a message intimating our approach to be communicated, through the channel of lieutenant-col. Mac Neil, to the principal officers of the late nabob Omdut ul Omrah. On our arrival at Chepauk, we were received by Nejeeb Khan, Tuckia Ally Khan, Kadar Nawas Khan, and Mr. Thos Barrett, who introduced themselves as the principal officers of the govt of his highness Omdut ul Omrah. Nejeeb Khan appeared to hold no distinct office, but to have been a companion of the family since the time of Anwar ud deen Khan, and to have been consulted generally on all occasions of interest to the nabob of the Carnatic. Tuckia Ally Khan was entrusted with the military affairs of the late nabob. Kidir Nawas Khan superintended the general and internal department of his highness's govt: but the most important department of his highness's govt, the administration of the revenues of the Carnatic, had been entrusted to the charge of Mr. Barrett. As that branch of the nabob's govt affected more particularly than any other the rights and interests of the company, we judge it to be proper to explain to your ldp, that Mr. Barrett is of the lowest tribe of Portuguese, equally destitute of education, manners, and knowledge. We enquired whether any particular arrangement had been made by the nabob for the administration of the affairs of his govt, in the event which had recently occurred; and having been informed that an authentic will, under his seal and signature, had been left by Omdut ul Omrah, we desired that it might be produced. Nejeeb Khan, who directed the conversation, made the usual objections, founded on the regency of the nabob's death, on the necessity of allowing a sufficient interval of time for the ceremonies of the occasion, and on the decorum of postponing to open the will until the heir appointed should be at liberty, in conformity to the usual practice, to attend to the transaction of public business. We replied, that the Brit. govt was aware of the prevailing usages observed by the professors of the Mahomedan religion on all ordinary occasions of this nature; that your ldp could have no wish that those usages should be unnecessarily transgressed; but that the affairs of a great govt, on which our request was founded, could not be regulated by the ordinary practice of individual families. Having in consequence been informed that the nabob had appointed his reputed son (Fadjul Omrah, commonly called Ally Hussain) to be his sole heir, we again urged the necessity of producing the will, and requested that the young man should be introduced to us. The Khans having retired to consider this demand, we learnt, during a desultory conversation with Mr. Barrett, that the nabob Omdut ul Omrah had become acquainted with the intention of Hussam ul Mulk to employ an armed force at the palace of Chepauk for the accomplishment of his views, at the expected termination of his highness's life; that the measure of stationing a body of the company's troops for the protection of the family, had in consequence been entirely acceptable to his highness, and (to use his own figurative expression) that the security, derived from that arrangement, had been the means of prolonging his highness's life. The Khans having been joined by Mr. Barrett, returned, assenting to our request; and, after a short delay, the young man was introduced with the will in his hand.

The will having been opened and read by Kadir Nawas Khan, was found to be an authentic instrument, expressing in clear, distinct, and explicit terms, the will of the nabob Omdut ul Omrah, that his reputed son (Ally Hussain) should succeed him in the possession of all his rights, possessions, property, and in the sovereignty of the Carnatic. The will also appointed Mahomed Nejeeb Khan, Salar Jung, and Tuckia Ally Khan, to assist the reputed son of Omdut ul Omrah in the administration of his affairs. The will having been read, we excused ourselves to Ally Hussain for an intrusion, which, although unseasonable, was indispensably necessary; and he immediately retired, returning expressions of civility. On the departure of Ally Hussain, we requested a private conference with the two Khans only, who had been appointed by the will of Omdut ul Omrah to assist the counsels of his son. After some preparatory observations on the importance of the subject, which we were desirous of discussing, and on the consequent necessity of superseding the ordinary forms observed in private families on similar occasions of misfortune, we proceeded, with the concurrence of the Khans, to state the nature of the written documents discovered at Seringapatam. Nejeeb Khan expressed the greatest degree of surprize at this communication, professed his entire ignorance of the subject, and protested that it was impossible for the nabob Omdut ul Omrah to cherish the intentions imputed to his highness. Some of the principal documents having been produced, Nejeeb Khan asserted, that they contained none but expressions of civility and compliment; that the marq. Cornwallis had repeatedly enjoined the nabobs Mahomed Ally and Omdut ul Omrah, to cultivate a friendly intercourse with Tippoo Sultaun; that the whole tendency of the correspondence produced was directed to that object in conformity to the injunctions of lord Cornwallis, and that the nabob Omdut ul Omrah had recently addressed himself to lord Cornwallis on the subject of these communications: the particular warmth of the expressions used by Omdut ul Omrah, in his letter addressed to Cholam Ally Khan on the 14th Mohurrim 1209, having been pointed out to Nejeeb Khan, he observed that it was nothing more than an expression of civility which might have been used on any ordinary occasion. The copy of the cypher having been produced, Nejeeb Khan took the opportunity of saying that the moonshy of the nabob was present, and could be examined with respect to the authenticity of the hand-writing; that although the cypher appeared, as was stated by us, to be a paper of a very secret nature, calculated to provide for the transaction of affairs of great importance, it might have been conveyed into the archives of Tippoo Sultaun by the enemies of Omdut ul Omrah; that, upon being furnished with the proofs of the supposed treacherous intercourse between Tippoo Sultaun and the family of the nabob Mohamed Ally, such explanations should be afforded, and such answers given, as the different cases might require, and that, the proofs being compared, the company might form a complete judgment. This discourse being apparently intended to confound the object of our deputation, we stated to the two Khans that in cases of disputed points between independent powers, neither party could erect itself into a judge of the conduct of the other party; that on those questions an appeal could be made only to the general practice of the nations of the world; and that such differences could only be decided by the means possessed by each party respectively to provide for its own security; that with respect to the present case, the most abundant proofs were in the possession of the Brit. govt, of the violation of the alliance between the company and the late nabob, and particularly of the express stipulations of the treaty of 1792; that the Brit. govt, being satisfied of the sufficiency of those proofs, had no intention of constituting itself a judge of the conduct of its ally: but that being prepared to appeal, if necessary, to the established maxims of the public law of nations, it had resolved to demand from the late nabob Omdut ul Omrah satisfaction for his violation of the alliance, and security for its rights and interests against the future operation of his highness's hostile councils; that the indisposition, which had terminated in the death of the nabob Omdut ul Omrah, had prevented the execution of the gov. gen's orders for this purpose; that although his highness's right to the support and friendship of the company had been entirely cut off by his violation of the alliance, the Brit. govt being still desirous of preserving the connexion so long subsisting, would be disposed to extend those sentiments to the reputed son of Omdut ul Omrah, if an adequate security could be established for the rights of the company in the Carnatic through the channel of an amicable adjustment. The two Khans repeated, that they were ignorant of the existence of the supposed secret intercourse between the nabobs Walajah Omdut ul Omrah and Tippoo Sultaun; and Nejeeb Khan in particular stated, that from the tenor of his intercourse with the family of the nabob, as well as from the expressions of the will, he did not consider himself at liberty, or in any way authorized to give answer upon so momentous a question, without consulting and obtaining the consent of the family and ministers of the late nabob.—We proceeded to explain slowly and distinctly to the two Khans the course of reasoning and the propositions contained in the declaration transmitted from Bengal, which the Khans having heard with great attention, they stated that they distinctly comprehended the object of the declaration, and the force of the reasoning; they admitted the conclusions drawn from the facts, provided the facts should be true; but at the same time strenuously asserted their disbelief of the hostile intercourse with Tippoo Sultaun, imputed to the nabobs Mahomed Ally and Omdut ul Omrah.—After a desultory conversation on this subject, in which the two Khans insisted on the reasonableness of their entering into the defence of Omdut ul Omrah's conduct in regard to the several points stated in the declaration, and in which we repeated the arguments founded on the practice of nations, and on the right of the Brit. govt to provide for the safety of its interests, we endeavoured to reduce this very long conference into the result of a single proposition, by demanding to know whether the Khans, on the part of Ally Hussain, were disposed to an adjustment of the claims of the Brit. govt, through the channel of an amicable negotiation.—They professed the greatest degree of respect and attachment to the Brit. govt, stated that they considered themselves and the whole family to be under its immediate protection; dwelt on the general impossibility of their proceeding by any other than amicable means in the settlement of the affairs of the Carnatic, or of the existing differences with the Brit. govt; but carefully avoided a direct answer to the proposition we had stated on that subject.—The day being far advanced, the Khans took an opportunity of urging the necessity of their attention to the funeral of the nabob Omdut ul Omrah, and to the preparations of removing the corpse to Trichinopoly.—This plea was urged in so forcible a manner, upon the grounds of public decorum, and of consideration for the feelings of the family, that we yielded without further discussion to the evident desire of the Khans to conclude the conference, without giving a positive answer to our proposition.—It was agreed, however, that an interview should take place on the evening of the next day, at which the Khans assured us that they would be prepared to give a specific answer to our propositions, after consulting the family and ministers of the late nabob upon the subject of this conference. In proceeding to take leave of the Khans, we assured them in the most unequivocal terms, that on the answer which they intended to give to our proposition would depend, whether the Brit. govt would acknowledge the claims of the reputed son of the late nabob Omdut ul Omrah to the support of the company, or whether the Brit. govt should proceed to take such measures as it might deem to be expedient for the security of its rights and interests in the Carnatic.—July 16th. At seven o'clock this evening we proceeded, according to appointment, to meet the two Khans at the palace of Chempauk. Before we proceeded to the direct object of the conference, we communicated to Najeib Khan and Tuckia Ally Khan, a Persian translation of the declaration. After perusing a considerable part of the paper, Nejeeb Khan observed, that it contained the same matter as was explained to him on the preceding day; that he entirely comprehended the course of the reasoning, and that he did not require any farther explanation on the subject. He repeated his conviction, that it was impossible for Omdut ul Omrah to engage in a correspondence injurious to the British interests; and stated, as a confirmation of his belief, the adherence of the nabob to the pecuniary stipulations of his engagements, and the probability that these means had been adopted by his highness's enemies to injure his reputation. In order, however, that the conclusion drawn from the propositions stated in the declaration, and the consequent determination of the Brit. govt, might be fully understood, that passage of the paper was read, and distinctly explained by us to the two Khans. We proceeded to enquire whether the Khans were prepared (according to the result of the conference of yesterday) to enter into a friendly negotiation, for the establishment of an adequate security for the right and interest of the Brit. govt. The Khans replied, that the whole family of Omdut ul Omrah was under the protection of the Brit. govt, and that it could feel none but friendly dispositions towards the company; at the same time, however, they persisted in denying the proofs of the violation of the alliance by Omdut ul Omrah, on the foundation of which the demand of the Brit. govt rested, and, by a strange inconsistency, proceeded to enquire the conditions on which we proposed to establish an amicable adjustment of our claims on the family of the late nabob. We proceeded accordingly to state to the Khans the inconveniences which had been experienced, from the effects of a divided govt; the difficulty of applying, under such a system, the resources of the Carnate to the exigencies of the public services; and the impossibility of introducing a regular form of internal govt, until the defects of the existing system should be corrected. We then informed the Khans, that the only remedy applicable to the errors of the present govt of the Carnate was, the substitution of one permanent authority, in lieu of the fluctuating authority which had hitherto subsisted; that the appropriation of the resources of the Carnate, during the government of the nabob, and under the pressure of actual war, had been found from experience to be incompatible with the objects of the alliance; and therefore the only adequate security for the rights and interest of the Brit. govt in the Carnate, against the dangers with which they had been menaced, was the entire and exclusive administration of the civil and military govt of the Carnate. We accordingly informed the Khans, that this condition would form the basis of the arrangement which it was our intention to propose to them. Nejeeb Khan observed, that such a proposition was calculated to frustrate the professed object of the arrangement; for if the entire govt of the Carnate should be transferred to the hands of the company, the station of nabob of the Carnate would be annihilated. We replied to the Khans, that the condition now proposed actually existed in the treaties of 1787 and 1792; and that although the entire civil and military govt of the Carnate had been transferred, under the operation of that condition, to the exclusive administration of the company, no doubt was entertained that the rank and dignity of Mahomed Ally and Omdut ul Omrah, as the nabobs of the Carnate, had been preserved; we therefore drew this conclusion, that the rank and dignity of the nabob of the Carnate could not be injured by extending the operation of that condition; and that the object of proposing an amicable adjustment, instead of proceeding to exercise the rights acquired by the Brit. govt, was manifestly founded in the desire of preserving to the family the rank, dignities, and splendour of the nabobs of the Carnate. The Khans admitted this argument to be conclusive, but without coming to any determination on the fundamental proposition stated by us, appeared to be desirous of knowing the general outline of the arrangement, which it was in the contemplation of the Brit. govt to establish. We thought it expedient to satisfy, by describing the principal parts of the plan intended by your ldp and by the govt genl, in the event of an amicable adjustment of affairs: but we apprized the Khans at the same time, that the intended arrangements, with respect to the family affairs and dependants of Omdut ul Omrah, would be regulated by the acceptance or rejection of the fundamental proposition; for in the one case the Brit. govt would be at liberty to consult the dictates of moderation, liberality, and friendship, but in the other case it would be compelled to adopt such measures of precaution, for the security of its rights and interests, as the hostile conduct of Omdut ul Omrah had justified, and as would be rendered necessary by the perseverance of his reputed son in the spirit of those councils.—The Khans entered into a desultory conversation on the long subsisting connection between the company and the family of the late nabob; in which they were more desirous of referring the pretensions of Ally Hussain to the stipulations of the treaty of 1792, than to the actual circumstances which had occurred. We thought it therefore not unnecessary to state again, that the right of Omdut ul Omrah to the support of the company, was founded on the express letter of the treaty of 1792; that the whole spirit of the alliance having been vitiated previously to the ostensible conclusion of the treaty of 1792, the nabob Omdut ul Omrah had, by his own conduct, annihilated the rights intended to be conveyed to him by that instrument; that consequently he left his reputed son in his own condition; that having placed himself in the relation of a public enemy, his reputed son had succeeded to that condition; that although the Brit. govt had suspended the exercise of its rights, it acknowledged no other claim on the part of Hussain, and that therefore, in admitting him to negotiate upon any terms, it was actuated by motives of generosity, unconnected with any right in the family of Mahomed Ally to resist its demand for security. The Khans made a civil answer to the substance of this communication, but at the same time indicated, in the strongest manner, that they were by no means disposed to accede to the fundamental proposition of the intended arrangement; they stated that it was a subject of so much importance, as to preclude them from giving an answer without a full consultation with all the branches of the family: they therefore requested that they might be permitted to postpone until the next day their final answer upon the subject of the two conferences.—In the actual situation of the family of the late nabob Omdut ul Omrah, we considered ourselves at liberty to accede to the request, under a formal intimation to the Khans, that as the arrangement of the affairs of the Carnate could not be protracted without material injury to the internal tranquillity of the country, we should expect to receive an answer so determinate as to enable the Brit. govt to proceed to adopt the measures suspended by the present negotiation. We accordingly took leave of the Khans, with an assurance that they would be prepared to deliver a final answer the next day.—July 17. We proceeded to the palace of Chepauk at three o'clock in the afternoon, according to the appointment of the preceding day. Nejeeb Khan and Tuckia Ally Khan proceeded to inform us that the whole family, and the ministers of the late nabob, had been assembled for the purpose of deliberating on the proposition stated by us on the preceding day; and that the result of their deliberation was a conviction in their own minds, that, notwithstanding the decided terms in which our proposition was communicated to them, the Brit. govt would still be disposed to accept a modification of the terms required for its security in the Carnate. They accordingly produced a contra-projet, which they desired might be submitted to your ldp's consideration. A translation of that paper is annexed to the report of this day's conference.—We informed the Khans that we possessed full authority from your ldp and from the govt genl, for rejecting, on the part of the Brit. govt, any proposal inconsistent with the extent of the security already required, and that our proposition for vesting exclusively in the hands of the company the entire administration of the civil and military government of the Carnate, contained the basis on which alone the proposed arrangement could be founded.

We reminded the Khans of the importance which they had, at an earlier stage of the conferences, attached to the extent of this proposition, and of the r considering their authority insufficient to decide so momentous a question. We warned them that the interpretation they were about to give to the will of Omdut ul Omrah, involved them in a heavy responsibility to his reputed son, which the terms of the will itself did not justify; and we stated for the r consideration, that whatever might be the result of these conferences, the effect to be produced on their own interests could bear no comparison to the effect to be produced on those of Ally Hussain.—The Khans replied, that the subject of the evidence discovered at Seringapatam, had been agitated in the Durbar for more than 12* months; that measures had been taken for justifying the conduct of Omdut ul Omrah, which they asserted to be innocent of any treacherous intention towards the Brit. govt; that our propositions, containing the fundamental basis of an amicable arrangement, had been fully discussed and debated; that they (the Khans) had fully considered the nature of the authority and of the responsibility which the will of Omdut ul Omrah devolved on them; that they were prepared to give a decided answer on the proposition, and that the paper delivered to us contained, finally and unequivocally, the only terms on which they could accede to our arrangement of the affairs of the Carnatic by negotiation.—Our endeavours to accomplish an am cable adjustment being thus defeated n limine, by the formal rejection of your ldp's fundamental propositions, we should have felt ourselves justified in bringing the negotiation to an immediate conclusion; but knowing the earnest desire of your ldp and of the govt genl, to obtain the security required for the rights and interests of the Brit. govt in the Carnatic, by an amicable negotiation, and considering the proposal of the Khans to be so extravagant as to be undeserving of serious attention, we judged it to be our duty not to exclude the reputed son of Omdut ul Omrah from an opportunity of declaring his genuine sentiments upon a point of so much interest to himself, and of relieving himself from the effects of the infatuated or treacherous counsils of his appointed advisers. We therefore informed the Khans, that in a question which appeared to relate exclusively to the interests of the nabob Omdut ul Omrah's reputed son, we were desirous of receiving from himself a declaration, which would determine his future situation, either as the acknowledged nabob of the Carnatic, or as a mere dependant on the bounty of the company. The extreme anxiety which the Khans discovered in attempting to evade this demand, confirmed in our judgment the expediency and necessity of persisting in it.—It would be tedious to detain your ldp with a repetition of the various subterfuges urged by the Khans to avoid a compliance with this request; all founded on his youth, (he is nearly 18 years old), his insufficiency to conduct a conference, the fears of his mother, and the regency of his father's death. It was not without a very long and tedious conversation, that we obtained from the Khans the appointment of a time for our receiving, from the reputed son of Omdut ul Omrah, his own determination on the proposition communicated to the two Khans. The interview was at length fixed for the next day.

Appendix to the Third Day's Conference.—Translation of a Paper delivered by Nejeeb Khan Behauder, Salar Jung, and Mahomed Fukia Aly Khan Behauder, to Mr. Webb and Lt. Col. Close, on the 5th Day of Rubee ool aul 1216 of the Heggra.

In as much as we are jointly employed in a business of trust, and are desirous of adhering to the will of our late lord and master, we have accordingly considered with great attention the matters which have been stated on each side during our conversations; and although we do not remember, word by word, what has been urged by each party, we yet recollect the substance of what passed. You explained to us that marquis Wellesley Behauder, had shewn himself displeased with the intention of the conduct of the late nabob, in maintaining a correspondence with Tippoo Sultaun, the late ruler of Mysore; and that in consequence the son of the late nabob, we mean our present benevolent and gracious master, had forfeited his right to the protection of the company. We cannot, gents. speak positively as to the writings alluded to, but from our knowledge of the temper, disposition, and sentiments of the late nabob, we are impressed with a full assurance that he was incapable of acting contrary to his own dignity, and the engagements of his alliance, which he ever respected; and indeed we ourselves know that he never corresponded with any power in Hindostan, unless by means of the company; and the company were well acquainted with the correspondence which did take place, and which consisted only of letters couched in warm expressions of congratulation or condolance. If, besides the correspondence of this description, any writings have come to light, containing the matters of which you have read to us a short abstract, we apprehend that they have originated with evil persons, for the purpose of shaking the friendship and union so long established between the late nabob and the company. Nor do we believe that the company, on mature consideration, can hold it to be true, that the late nabob engaged in a correspondence contrary to their interests; and, adverting to the amicable and friendly behaviour observed by the company till the last moments of the nabob, the whole world will be impressed that they entertained no such suspicions; and with us it is matter of regret, that at a juncture when the nabob is deprived of the means of justification, his reputation should be publicly injured. But, gents. without dwelling on these matters, we consider ourselves as being honoured with the office of agent on the part of the present heir, according to the will of his illustrious father; and we have to observe that you, gents. have seen that will, and been made acquainted with the power which it has vested in Sahib Zahah, the present heir. The said heir, according to the law and rules which hold amongst us regarding succession, is found to inherit the whole of the rights and state of his father, and is in every respect the true hereditary successor of his father. In this case he has specially derived protection from the treaty of 1792 A.D. and we have held ourselves bound on his part by the said treaty from the moment we entered on this great charge, namely, the care of the person and govt. of the said heir. Gents. without adverting to any of the contents of the above treaty, you have, on the part of the gov. gen. Behauder, demanded of us, who are the agents of the said heir, either to deliver the heir aforesaid and his kingdom, entirely into the hands of the gov. gen. or to communicate our inclinations respecting such an arrangement as would be assented to by the gov. gen. We were happy, gents. that you did not insist on an immediate answer to your demand; as in the interval that has taken place, we have minutely considered your demands, as well as the trust that has been confided in us; and we apprehend, that when you made the said demand, the treaty of 1792 A.D. was not in your contemplation, for the said heir, successor to the said nabob, is clearly included in the treaty aforesaid. In this case the said heir has become the protector of the agreements and stipulations of his illustrious father, and has succeeded to the right, to benefit by the stipulations of the comp. contained in the said treaty; and we are ready to abide in the fullest manner to every point that he has agreed to therein. We have not said that we were unwilling to agree to any treaty besides that above-mentioned; on the contrary, we are prepared to hear any demands that may be proposed, and to exert ourselves to the extent of our ability for the purpose of adjusting them. We do not perceive much defect in the means long established by the treaty, for promoting the security and union of both sides. In every event, if it can be modified for the interest of the comp. the aforesaid heir will be happy at all times to attend to any wish that you may communicate; nor would we say that we should consider ourselves fortunate in being the means of adjusting so desirable an arrangement. We must infer, that you could scarcely hope that the demand, at which you hinted at the first meeting, and so clearly explained at the second, that it could not be misunderstood, would be accepted; as, gents. you well know that we, who are charged with the care of the country, and the affairs of the heir, have no authority to engage in such disaffection and faithlessness, as to deliver up unconditionally the whole rights and property of our master, and commit him and his family, in a state of want and subjection to the company. We cannot therefore comprehend the substance and meaning of your demand, more than that it occurs to us that you have proposed a heavy demand to us, in the first instance, under the idea, that it might be diminished at future conferences; and that you might ascertain our sentiments touching a fresh agreement for renewing the friendship and union that has so long subsisted between the comp. and the nabob of the Carnatic. Gents. with the view to meet the just wishes of the comp. we have considered the objects and advantages which were often mentioned to the late nabob, and we have resolved to act in conformity to them to the extent of our ability; and regarding them as the best foundations for an arrangement, we now present a separate paper, containing a few correspondent propositions; and in the event of their being approved, they may be easily inserted in the treaty of 1792, A.D. The happy effects of which have been witnessed by the comp. and by us. We hope that in these propositions we have strongly demonstrated the will of the heir, as well as ours, to promote the true interest of the comp. without entirely sacrificing the rights of the heir, which are committed to our care; and we trust that, considering what we have stated above, our motive for bringing forward the propositions alluded to, must be clear beyond the possibility of doubt. Adverting to the responsibility we sustain, from the great affairs and interests in which we are engaged, we have to request that you will deliver to us in writing, any demands you may wish to state in reply, in order that we may be free from any imputations hereafter. We are confident that you will consider the delicate circumstances which have led us to this request, and allow them to plead our excuse. (Signed) Mahomed Nejeeb Khan,

Salar Jung,

Mahomed Tuckia Ali Khan Behauder.

The heir, out of his regard and friendship for the comp. will make over to the comp. as an act of favour, the whole of his rights, touching the pearl fishery.

anxiety of the two Khans to prevent our interview with the reputed son of Omdut ul Omrah, that their conduct might not be conformable to the wishes and intentions of that person, your ldp authorized and instructed us to communicate to Mr. Fitzgerald (the confidential physician of the late nabob) who had personal access to his highness's reputed son, the actual existence of the govr gen's orders, and your ldp's positive determination to execute those orders, for the purpose of obtaining an adequate security for the rights and interests of the British govt in the Carnatic. Such parts of the govr gen's orders as were sufficient to remove all doubt on this subject, were accordingly communicated to Mr. Fitzgerald, from his excellency's original dispatches. It being necessary, in conformity to this intention, that farther time should be allowed for the operation of this indirect communication, the interview appointed for to-day was postponed; and reason exists for believing that (as far as the opinion of Mr. Fitzgerald was allowed to have effect) the reputed son of Omdut ul Omrah, as well as his two advisers, Nejeeb Khan and Tuckia Ally Khan, were, in the course of this day, apprized of the actual circumstances in which they stood, through the channel of a confidential person, who could have no interest in augmenting the appearance of the danger, which actually menaced the immediate interests of Ally Hussain. Although this transaction forms no part of our public negotiation, we have judged it to be proper to include it in the official report of this day. It will demonstrate that no care was omitted, which could conciliate the mind of Ally Hussain, and of his appointed advisers.

July 19th. We proceeded about noon to the palace. We enquired whether a further consideration of the subject of our conferences had created in the minds of the two Khans any alteration of their sentiments delivered at the last interview? They replied, without hesitation, that it was not the intention of Ally Hussain to recede from the terms communicated to us in a written paper at the last interview: We then stated our belief, that under that declaration they were prepared for the serious consequences of the alternative, frequently described to them. The Khans replied, with much apparent composure and resolution, that they were prepared to meet those consequences, on their responsibility, under a perfect reliance on the protection of the comp. and on its adherence to the existing engagements. We reminded the Khans, that it was useless to recur to the stipulations of the treaty of 1792, the vital spirit of which had been annihilated, and that the violation of Omdut ul Omrah's engagement had constituted the right of the comp. to demand the security now required. The reputed son of Omdut ul Omrah being, at our desire, introduced according to the former appointment, we excused our intrusion on his grief, by explaining our unwillingness to receive from any person but himself the final rejection of a proposition, made with great indulgence to him, on the part of the Brit. govt, and involving consequences of the greatest importance to his immediate interests. We then stated, in a succinct manner, the nature of that proposition, with the conclusive rejection of it by his appointed advisers; and expressed our desire of knowing whether the motives of the Khans for thus rejecting, at such apparent hazard to his welfare, the friendship of the comp. were conformable to his own sentiments and resolution. He replied (the Khans being present) that he considered them to have been appointed by his father for the purpose of assisting him; and that the object of his own councils was not separate from that of the Khans. According to the plan previously arranged by your ldp for this probable event, we made known, without farther delay, your ldp's intention of holding a personal conference with Ally Hussain (previously to the final adoption of the measures then in your ldp's contemplation).—This communication was unexpected, and the Khans endeavoured to evade it by repeating the excuses they had used at the former interview; but, being assured that your ldp's orders in this respect admitted of no excuse, the Khans retired at the same time for the purpose of preparing the equipage of Ally Hussain. During this short interval, the young man, with much apparent anxiety in his manner, whispered in a low tone of voice, that he had been deceived by the two Khans.—Ally Hussain accordingly proceeded, without farther communication with the two Khans, to the tent of the officer commanding the troops at Chepauk, at which place we had the honour of a personal interview with your ldp.—After the first ceremonies of the meeting had subsided, the attendants of Ally Hussain, including Nejeeb Khan and Tuckia Ally Khan, were directed to withdraw, and the tent was rendered entirely private. Before your ldp's intention in this interview could be entirely explained, Ally Hussain interrupted the conversation by expressing his sense of your ldp's consideration. He then proceeded to state, of his own accord, that the conferences had been conducted by the two Khans without his participation in their councils; and that he disapproved the termination which had in consequence been given to the negotiation.—In consequence of this avowal, the entire substance of the conference was recapitulated to Ally Hussain, the nature of the proofs of the violation of the alliance was distinctly described, and the extent of the security required by the Brit. govt concisely explained.—Ally Hussain, after stating that he comprehended the whole of this important question, declared himself ready to conclude an arrangement with the Brit. govt, on the basis of the proposition communicated by us to the two Khans. He then proceeded to make enquiry into the secondary branches of the arrangement in your ldp's contemplation, particularly with respect to the provision for his personal expences, and to the extent of his power over the public treasure of his father, which he considered to be large. After a desultory conversation of some length, interrupted by the impertinency of Nejeeb Khan, Ally Hussain proposed that a treaty should be prepared by us, upon the basis of vesting the entire civil and military govt of the Carnatic in the hands of the comp.; and stated, that he would be ready to execute the instrument, with or without the consent of the Khans, at another separate conference, which was appointed for the next day, within the lines of the Brit. troops.

July 20th.—According to the appointment of yesterday, we proceeded to the palace of Chepauk; and Ally Hussain having been introduced to us, said, in a resolute tone of voice, and with more apparent firmness in his manner than we had before observed, that the two Khans had been appointed by his father's will to assist his councils; that he could not adopt a line of conduct inconsistent with their advice; and that therefore any further interview with your ldp was unnecessary.—These expressions we attributed to Ally Hussain's desire of concealing his real sentiments in the presence of the Khans; and proceeded to state, that the conference of yesterday having been interrupted by the impertinence of Nejeeb Khan, your ldp was resolved to bring it to a termination at the interview appointed for this day. We accordingly attended Ally Hussain to the tent, which having been again rendered entirely private, the young man stated, in the same tone of confidence, that this interview was unnecessary, as it was impossible for him to deviate from the sentiments already expressed by the two Khans. This unexpected change of sentiments in the mind of Ally Hussain having excited some surprise, your ldp desired that he should explain himself more distinctly. In reply he stated, that he was aware the sentiments now expressed by him differed entirely from those expressed on the preceding day; that the truth was he had seriously reflected on the subject of yesterday's conference; that the whole family had been assembled to deliberate on the state of his affairs; that he had in consequence given a better consideration to the actual circumstances in which he was placed; that he retracted the opinion communicated to your ldp yesterday; and that he considered it to be totally incompatible with his interests and honour to accede to the proposition, on the basis of which he had agreed to conclude the treaty.—We reminded him, by your ldp's direction, of the deception stated by himself to have been used by the Khans, and expressed our confidence that, notwithstanding this unaccountable change of his ostensible manner, the genuine sentiments of his mind were expressed in the conference of yesterday.—He said that this was not the case; that he had spoken at that time from an hasty impression; but that the sentiments, which he now declared, were the result of serious reflection, and of a conviction on his mind, that by pursuing this line of conduct, he should adhere to the intention of his father and to the real interests of his family. We stated in reply, that he deceived himself if he encouraged any expectation of securing the interests of his family on any other basis than that of an amicable adjustment, for the alternative choice was either to become the acknowledged nabob of the Carnatic, or one of many pensioners dependant on the bounty of the comp.; that the choice, which he now appeared to have made, was so inconsistent with prudence, as to justify our considering him to act under some improper restraint.—We proceeded therefore to explain, that he was now actually within the Brit. encampment; and that if he apprehended any consequences of personal danger or inconvenience from the pursuit of the genuine wishes of his heart, your ldp would immediately secure him against any insults he might apprehend, by keeping him under the protection of the comp.'s forces. He replied, that he acted from no impression of that description; but that the sentiments which he now expressed, contained the genuine feelings of his heart.—We expressed your ldp's and our own suspicion, that he had been encouraged by interested persons to disbelieve the existence of the orders from the gov't gen. under the authority of which the fundamental proposition of the negotiations had been stated to him, and we enquired whether he had received from Mr. Fitzgerald, any communication on that subject. Ally Hussain answered, that Mr. Fitzgerald had spoken to him on the subject; and that his determination was not governed by any distrust of our communications relative to the orders of the gov't gen. We explained our allusion to the advice of interested persons, by stating, that those who held tuncaws or other claims on the Carnatic, were deeply interested in persuading him to resist an amicable negotiation; because in the event of an amicable adjustment for vesting the civil govt in the hands of the comp. they could have no hope of recovering those claims; whereas those hopes would still be cherished as long as he should be persuaded to keep the affairs of the Carnatic in an unsettled state. We further stated, that the principles of persons of that description encouraged every expectation that they would be desirous of sacrificing the permanent interests and honour of his family to the attainment of their immediate advantage: We added, that such persons, as well as the general body of his father's creditors, would feel an interest in persuading him to reject the proposition now offered to him, and to cherish a belief that the measures of this govt would be disapproved by the court of directors, and that the arrangement, which he might compel your ldp to adopt, would be reversed. We warned Ally Hussain of the effects of such a fallacy, by assuring him that the orders of the gov't gen. were founded on a previous communication with the court of directors, and with his majesty's ministers; and on a knowledge that the sentiments of the govt at home concurred entirely with those entertained by his excellency and by your ldp, relative to the violation of the alliance.—We were the more earnest in urging this point, with your ldp's permission, on the attention of Ally Hussain; because the project, delivered to us at the 2d conference by the two Khans, contains manifest proof of having been translated from an European language; and because it is equally manifest, from the tenor of that paper, that the author of it was interested in excluding the exec. govt in India from participating in the administration of the funds, now allotted by treaty to the liquidation of the consolidated debts of the nabob Mahomed Ally.—Ally Hussain denied that he acted from any motives derived from the persuasion of others, and repeated that his choice was now founded on his determination to adhere to the councils of the Khans, appointed by his father's will to assist him, and finally to reject the arrangement which had been proposed to him. We enquired whether he clearly understood the consequences of that determination with respect to himself; he said, that it had been clearly explained to him; but that, notwithstanding the explanation, he assured himself of the favour and protection of the company, as well as of your ldp's paternal care. In proceeding to conclude the conference, your lordship desired Ally Hussain to prepare himself to receive your ldp's final and most serious resolution. It was then explained to him, that no pains had been omitted, which could warn him of the consequences he was about to incur; that the duties of humanity towards him, and the duties of attention to the national character of the British government, had been satisfied; that he had himself determined the situation in which he would hereafter be placed, and that your lordship, with concern for himself individually, now apprized him, that his future situation would be that of a private person, hostile to the British interests, and dependent on the bounty of the company. This declaration Ally Hussain received with a degree of composure and confidence, which denoted that he acted from no impression of fear; and a smile of complacency, which appeared on his countenance throughout this discussion, denoted an internal satisfaction at the line of conduct he was pursuing. Being asked if he wished to make any further observations, he said that he did not; and being also asked whether he had any objection to the introduction of the Khans into the tent, he said that he had none; which being accordingly done, he was directed by your ldp to leave the tent.

July 21st.—Your ldp having communicated to us your intention to open, if possible, a negotiation with the prince Azeem ul Dowlah; endeavours were accordingly used to establish a communication with him, but it was found that so strict a watch had been established over him by the adherents of Omdut ul Omrah, that no means appeared to be practicable for opening a private communication with him; while any attempt to effect it by open means, appeared liable to the serious objection of precipitating the fate of the young prince.

July 22d.—In this situation of things it was reported to your ldp, by the officer commanding the troops at Chepauk, that Nejeeb Khan and Tucky Ally Khan had already performed the ceremony of installing Ally Hussain in a private manner on the musnud of Arcot; and that they had resolved to install him in a public manner on the following day. Your ldp resolved to prevent a measure calculated to produce immediate commotion in the provinces of the Carnatic; for that purpose Lt. col. Mac Neil was directed to take entire possession of the palace of Chepauk with the Brit. troops; and to remove entirely all the guards of the late Omdut ul Omrah, who had been permitted to remain at their posts during the late negotiations. This measure established the immediate means of relieving Azeem ul Dowlah; and a party of the comp's troops was substituted at the hovel in which the prince was confined, in lieu of the guards stationed over it by the adherents of Omdut ul Omrah. As soon as the first surprise of the prince Azeem ul Dowlah permitted him to receive an explanation, that the guard was intended for his greater security and protection, he expressed his satisfaction at the change, together with the desire of being permitted to explain his situation.

July 23d.—On the morning of this day Lt. col. Mac Neil waited upon the prince Azeem ul Dowlah, for the ostensible purpose of excusing and explaining to him the cause of stationing a party of the company's troops over the place in which he resided. Lt. col. Mac Neil took this opportunity of informing the prince, that if he should have any desire of representing the state of his affairs to the Brit. govt, the means of doing so without danger had now been opened to him. In consequence of this communication, a time was appointed by your ldp's directions for our meeting the prince Azeem ul Dowlah. At the interview which ensued, the conversation on the part of the prince was confined to a statement of the injuries which he had sustained, and of the hardships he continued to sustain, from the depression of his fortune, and from the poverty of his circumstances. He requested, with much earnestness, that his case might be considered in the general arrangement of the affairs of the Carnatic, and appeared to limit his expectation to a more comfortable domestic arrangement for his family. Sufficient grounds, however, appeared in the course of the conversation, to satisfy our judgment that the prince was capable of sustaining a more important character, and that his sense of his own immediate interests would dispose him to meet with cordiality any overture on the part of the Brit. govt, for reviving, in his person, the alliance so long subsisting between the company and his family. The conversation ended with an assurance on our part of your ldp's immediate attention to Azeem ul Dowlah's difficulties, and to the provision of a more suitable accommodation for his family.

July 24.—An interview having been appointed for communicating to the prince this day the result of your ldp's consideration of his case, we met him at an early hour in the tent of Lt. col. Mac Neil. The conversation was opened by some distant observations of the state in which the affairs of the Carnatic had been placed by the death of the nabob Omdut ul Omrah; and the remarks of the prince continuing, in our judgment, to be favourable to the impression we had received of his understanding and disposition, we proceeded to explain to him the actual situation in which the whole house of Mahomed Ally had been placed, in consequence of the violation of the alliance by that prince, and by his successor Omdut ul Omrah. The curiosity of the prince being naturally excited by this conversation, connected with his previous knowledge of the manner in which the conferences with Ally Hussain had terminated, we proceeded to disclose to the prince the nature of the rights acquired by the comp.; the indispensable necessity of exercising those rights for the establishment of an adequate security for our interests in the Carnatic; and the great reluctance with which the Brit. govt would feel itself compelled to use its power for the attainment of that object, which could not fail of producing the entire humiliation of the house of Mahomed Ally. A long desultory conversation ensued on the different points of this question, the substance of which has been stated in an earlier passage of this report, and it ended in a declaration of the prince Azeem ul Dowlah of his acknowledgment of the right acquired by the comp. under the discovery made at Seringapatam; and of his readiness to afford, in the event of his elevation to the musnud, that satisfaction and security which your ldp and the gov. gen. had deemed to be necessary to the preservation of our interests in the Carnatic. Having accordingly described to the prince the entire outline of the arrangement proposed for the settlement of the affairs of the Carnatic, on the basis of this proposition, it was agreed that the arrangement should be prepared in the form of a treaty,

July 25.—Having accordingly prepared the draft of the treaty, we proceeded to the tent, for the purpose of discussing with the prince Azeem ul Dowlah the general principles, and the particular articles of the agreement proposed by your ldp. The prince having acceded to the fundamental articles; in conformity to his acknowledgment of the preceding day, directed his attention to that article which stipulates, that a fund shall be appropriated for the expence of maintaining the family of the nabobs Walajah and Omdut ul Omrah: he stated, that although it could not be incumbent on him to interrupt on this account an arrangement so beneficial to the different branches of the family, and to himself in particular; he yet felt it to be intimately connected with his reputation and honour to urge their situation upon your ldp's most indulgent consideration. We explained, in consequence, to Azeem ul Dowlah, that the motives of the Brit. govt for entering into any discussion for the purpose of establishing an amicable adjustment, could be founded on no other wish than that of preserving the family from the state of degradation, into which it was about to have been precipitated, by the faithless conduct and by the perverse spirit of the councils of its principal members; and we reminded the prince, that in making him the instrument of re-establishing the alliance, it was necessary to furnish him with the most powerful means of securing the attachment of the family, by rendering the amount of the stipends or jaghires to be allotted for its support dependant on the pleasure of the Brit. govt; which communication with his highness would proceed to apportion the amount to be appropriated for this purpose, according to the merits of the individuals concerned. In discussing that part of the treaty which stipulates the acknowledgment of the debts due by his ancestors to the company, the prince expressed his sense of the reasonableness of that stipulation; but stated distinctly and repeatedly that he did not consider himself involved by that article in any personal responsibility for the amount of these or of any other debts. We expressed our entire concurrence in his highness's interpretation of the article; and a clause was added to the article, for the express purpose of obviating any doubts on this point. The remaining clauses of the proposed treaty having been discussed and assented to, the prince affixed his signature to a Persian draught of the proposed treaty, binding himself to execute a more formal instrument at the period of his intended installation.—In concluding our report of this conference, we cannot omit to state to your lordship, the impression made on our minds by the decorous deportment, moderation; and good sense, by which Azeem ul Dowlah distinguished himself upon this sudden elevation from a state of penury and wretchedness to the possession of princely magnificence, honours, and rank.

July 26th.—This morning we had the satisfaction of presenting his highness the prince Azeem ul Dowlah in a formal manner to your ldp, and of subsequently conducting him, as the ostensible future nabob of the Carnatic, to the Ameer Baugh, the residence of his highness's father, the late Ameer ul Omrah.

No. 5. Treaty between the Company and his Highness the Nabob Mahomed Ali, dated in 1792; commonly called Lord Cornwallis's Treaty.

Treaty between the Hon. East India Company, and the Nabob of Arcot.—Whereas a certain engagement was entered into between the hon. English E. I. company, and his highness the nawaub of the Carnatic, bearing date 24th Feb. 1787, for the purpose of cementing an everlasting friendship with each other, and of contributing mutually towards the defence of the Carnatic, and countries dependent thereon; whereby it was stipulated that the said company should maintain a military force, and that the said nawaub should pay annually a certain sum of money arising from the revenues of the Carnatic, and should furnish sufficient and satisfactory security, under certain conditions expressed in the said engagement, for the regular payment of the sum stipulated to the said company: and whereas it appears by the representations of the said nawaub, contained in a certain letter addressed by him to the govt genl, &c. dated the 18th of the month Shawal 1206 Hejeree, (9th June 1792,) that the resources of the Carnatic are not competent to enable him to perform the stipulations in the said engagement; and whereas it further appears, that the security which the said nawaub agreed in the above-mentioned engagement to furnish for the due payment of the stipulated sum to the said comp. is in its nature inadequate to the end intended: and whereas certain agreements have also been entered into between the said comp. and the said nawaub, for the discharge of certain debts due by the said nawaub to private persons, it has been mutually agreed, in consequence of the above written circumstances, that the engagement aforesaid shall henceforth be considered by the contracting parties as annulled, and no longer of effect or in force: and in lieu thereof, the rt hon. Chs earl Cornwallis, invested with full powers on the part of the said hon. English E. I. comp. to direct and controul the affairs of the said comp. in the E. Indies, in the name of and for the said comp. their heirs and successors, on one part; and the nabob Wallah Jah, Ameer ul Hind, Omdut ul Moulk, Asoph ul Dowlah, Unevar ul Deen Khan Behauder, Zuffer Jung, Sepah Salar, nabob of the Carnatic, in his own name, and for himself and his successor his eldest son nawaub Omdut ul Omrah, Meyun ul Moulk, Assud ul Dowla Haseein, Ally Khan Behauder, Zool Sicar Zung, and his heirs and successors, on the other part, agree to the following articles, which shall be binding on the respective contracting parties for the purposes contained therein, notwithstanding all or any of the conditions stipulated in the engagement dated 24th Feb. 1787, to the contrary.—Art. 1. The friends and enemies of either of the contracting parties shall be considered the friends and enemies of both.—Art. 2. In order to execute the foregoing article in its full extent, the hon. E. I. comp. agree to maintain a military force, and the nawaub Wallah Jah Behauder agrees to contribute annually a certain sum of money hereinafter mentioned, as his share of the expence of the said military force; the said nawaub further agreeing that the disposal of the said sum, together with the arrangement and employment of the troops supported by it, shall be left entirely to the said company.—Art. 3. It is hereby also agreed, that for the further security and defence of the countries belonging and subject to the contracting parties in the Carnatic, &c. that all forts shall be garrisoned by the troops of the said comp.; and in the event of war breaking out in the Carnatic and countries appertaining to either party, and dependant on the Carnatic, or contiguous thereto, it is agreed, for the better prosecution of it, that as long as it shall last, the said comp. shall possess full authority over the Carnatic, except the jaghires belonging to the family of the said nawaub, amounting to star pagodas 2,13,911, which, on condition of the good behaviour of the jaghiredars of the said jaghires, and of their fidelity to the said nawaub and to the said comp. shall be continued to them, subject to the pleasure of the said nawaub only, and except also certain charities amounting to star pagodas 21,566, subject to the same conditions as are mentioned with respect to the jaghires, and shall collect the revenues thereof, the said comp. hereby engaging that, during such war, they will pay to the said nawaub one-fifth share of the net revenue arising therefrom; and that at the conclusion of the war, the Carnatic shall be restored to the said nawaub, except in certain cases, which are hereinafter mentioned.—Art. 4. The nabob Wallah Juh agrees to pay to the said comp. for the purpose of mutual defence, the sum of nine lacs of star pagodas annually, as his share of the expence for the military force, and also in consequence of certain agreements entered into by him with the said company, and guaranteed by the parliament of Great Britain, for the purpose of liquidating certain debts due by the said nawaub, a further sum of 6,21,105, star pagodas annually, which further sum of 6,21,105 star pagodas shall cease on the full liquidation of the debts above mentioned, and the sum of 9,00,000 of star pagodas only shall continue to be paid by the said nawaub to the said comp.—Art. 5. The said nawaub having agreed to pay the aggregate sum of 15,21,105 star pagodas, as mentioned in the 4th art. determines that the tributes or peshcush, payable by the Poligars, as more particularly mentioned in the schedule No. 1, hereunto annexed, shall be collected by the said comp. who agree to make the collection thereof at their own expence and risk, and that they will not increase the demand on the said Poligars beyond the sum mentioned in the said schedule, except in the case hereinafter mentioned, nor charge to the said nawaub, either the expence attending the collection, or any deficiencies that may arise thereon, but will give credit to the said nawaub annually for the aforesaid tributes or peshcush, in part payment of the sum of nine lacs of star pagodas above-mentioned, without any deduction whatever; although the contracting parties have, in the present instrument, agreed that the sum of 2,64,704 pagodas 20 P. 20 C. be deducted from the sum of 9 lacs of pagodas, as the amount of the tributes or peshcush from the Poligars; yet, should it on future enquiry appear that the said Poligars ought, by virtue of any existing and lawful engagements, to pay a larger sum, it shall be demanded of them, and any addition that shall thus be made to the sums mentioned in the said schedule, shall be deducted from the sum of 9 lacs, in like manner with the sum of 2,64,704, 20 P. 20 C. and a similar deduction shall in consequence be made in the Kistbundy hereinafter mentioned. It is however mutually agreed, that the diminution of this agree-gate sum, which shall take place on the full liquidation of the debts as specified in the 4th art. shall make no change in this art. which shall, notwithstanding such diminution, remain in full force.—Art. 6. The said comp. desirous of preserving the rights of sovereignty over the said Poligars to the said nawaub, engage, to the utmost of their power, and consistent with the realization of the tributes or peshcush from them, to enforce the allegiance and submission of the said Poligars to the said nawaub in all customary ceremonies, and in furnishing the Poligar Peons according to established custom for the collection of the revenues, the support of govt. and for the protection of the property of the inhabitants of the said nawaub's country, promising that all acts of authority shall be exercised in, and all accounts of revenue (of which accounts the said nawaub, if he so wishes, shall be ann. furnished with copies) shall bear his the said nawaub's name. For the better execution of this and the 5th art. the said nawaub promises to furnish to the said comp. that is to say to their representatives the president and council of Fort St. George, the necessary orders, under his seal and signature, addressed to each Poligar, and to the purport hereof, without delay.—Art. 7. After deducting from the above mentioned sum of 9 lacs of star pagodas, which forms a part of the aggregate sum of 15,21,105 star pagodas, mentioned in the 5th art. the amount of the tributes or peshcush from the Poligars, as specified in the sched. No. 1, the said nawaub agrees to pay ann. the remaining sum, being 8,35,295 : 15 : 54, together with the further sum of 6,21,105 for the purpose mentioned in the 4th art. making the sum of star pagodas 12,56,400 : 15 : 54,—at the following periods.—On the 1st Sept. 1,00,000.—1st Oct. 1,00,000.—1st Nov. 1,00,000.—1st Dec. 1,00,000.—1st Jan. 1,00,000.—1st Feb. 1,00,000.—1st Mar. 1,50,000 1st Ap. 1,50,000.—1st May 2,00,000.—1st June 1,50,400 : 15 : 54,—amounting to 12,56,400 : 15 : 54 star pagodas.—And it is mutually agreed, that on the full liquidation of the debts before mentioned, when the payment of the sum of star pagodas 6,21,105, shall cease by virtue of the 4th art. a reduction in equal proportion shall take place in the above instalments.—Art. 8. The said nawaub engages to make good to the said comp. the payments of the sums, according to the instalments of Kistbundy contained in the 7th art.; and if, contrary to his sincere intentions and exertions, any of the said sums shall not be fully paid at the expiration of 15 days from the time limited, in that case the said nawaub agrees, that the said comp. shall assume the management of and make the collection of the revenues from the districts mentioned in the sched. No. 2. according to the following conditions; and for this the present engagement shall be considered sufficient authority, the said comp. through their president and council at Fort St. George, giving immediate and explicit information, according to the tenor thereof, to the said nawaub, who shall, on the arrival of the comp's officers in the said district, recall all his officers, except one in each district: which officer shall remain at the Sudder Cutcherry, and shall be furnished ann. by the officer of the said comp. with copies of the Sudder Cutcherry accounts, of the gross collections, and of the net receipts, under the attestation of the officer of the said comp. and of the Sudder Omlah of the district.—1. The said comp. shall assume the management of such district or districts, the revenue of which, after deducting the charges of collections, shall equal the amount of the kist which shall have fallen in arrear.—2. The said comp. agree, that a deduction shall take place proportionably from the amount of each of the ten kists above mentioned, equal to the amount of the net rev. of the district or districts which shall have been assumed as above, such deduction commencing from the day that the assumption shall take place. It is also mutually agreed, that an acct called balance acct shall be immediately opened, for this and other purposes hereinafter mentioned, bearing an int. of 8 per cent. per ann. between the said nawaub and the said comp.; in which the said nawaub shall be debited for the balance accrued in his above stipulated payments, and also for the amount deducted as above from the ten kists, and shall be credited for the net rev. collected from the said district or districts, the said comp. continuing to exercise authority in, and to make the collections from the same, until, in consequence of the full liquidation of the debts and diminution of the ann. sum, to be for that purpose paid by the nawaub to the said comp. according to the 4th art. the said balance acct shall be equal on the debit and credit side, and nothing shall remain due to the said comp. then the said district or districts shall revert to the management of the said nawaub.—3d. Whenever the said district or districts thus assumed shall be restored, according to the above condition, it is agreed, that in case of any of the kists for the sum remaining (after the deduction of the sum of 6,21,105 star pagodas: that is to say, for the sum of 6,35,295 : 15 : 54, be not paid 15 days after the expiration of the time limited, the said comp. shall possess equal power to assume the districts mentioned in the said sched. No. 2, as in the 1st instance, and shall accordingly assume such district or districts, the rev. of which, after deducting the charges of collection, shall equal the amount of the kist which shall have fallen in arrear, from which they shall realize the balance that shall have arisen in the payment of the kists, and shall give credit to the said nawaub for the surplus and subsequent net rev. in part payment of the sum of star pagodas 6,35,295 : 15 : 54. And in this case the management of the district or districts thus assumed shall for ever continue in the possession of the said comp. any thing contained in the 3d art. of the present engagement to the contrary notwithstanding: And the said comp. agree to give the nawaub credit for the rev. arising therefrom.—4. In order to prevent any loss arising to either party from this measure, it is mutually agreed, that the district or districts which shall thus be assumed by the said comp. shall be entire, as mentioned in the said sched. and not parts of districts.—5. In consequence of this measure, whereby the districts mentioned in the sched. No. 2, become responsible for any arrears that may accrue in the payment of the above stipulated kists, the said nawaub agrees that he will not grant tunkaws or assignments on any acct on the revenues thereof; and if, contrary to this condition, any tunkaws or assignments should exist, where the said districts or any of them shall be assumed by the said comp. such tunkaws or assignments shall be declared by the said comp. and the said nawaub to be of no value, nor shall they remain in effect.—6. It is agreed between the contracting parties, that the above described balance acct. shall be ann. adjusted, and a committee, consisting of 4 respectable and capable persons, of which 2 shall be nominated by the said comp. and 2 by the said nawaub, shall assemble on the 1st of Aug. of every year commencing with 1795, for the purpose of adjusting and drawing out a fair and equitable statement thereof.—Art. 9. In case the said nawaub shall at any time have occasion for any number of troops for the collection of his revenues, the support of his authority, or the good order and govt of his country, the said comp. agree to furnish a sufficient number of troops for that purpose, on public representation being made by the said nawaub to the president and council of Fort St. George, of the necessity of employing such troops, and of the objects to be obtained thereby. And the said nawaub agrees to defray the additional expence of such troops, so long as they may be employed at his request. This additional expence being the sum over and above the expence of such troops while in garrison or at fixed quarters; and it shall be at the option of the said nawaub to reimburse the said surplus expence, either on the conclusion of the service on which such troops may have been employed, in money, or to add it to the debit side of the acct called balance acct, and more particularly explained in the 2d condition of the 8th art.—Art. 10. The said nawaub shall receive regular information of all negotiations which shall relate to declaring war or making peace, wherein the said comp. may engage, and the interests of the Carnatic and its dependencies may be concerned; and the said nawaub shall be considered as an ally of the said comp. in all treaties which shall in any respect affect the Carnatic, and countries depending thereon, or belonging to either of the contracting parties contiguous thereto; and the said nawaub agrees that he will not enter into any negotiation or political correspondence with any European or native power, without the consent of the said comp.—This treaty, consisting of 10 arts, and having 2 scheds annexed thereto, marked No. 1, and 2, shall be in force and have effect from 12th of July 1792, (corresponding with the 22d day of the month Zekaida 1206 Hejeree); and the contracting parties having affixed their respective seals and signatures to 2 counterparts on the dates undermentioned; that is to say, the Rt hon. Charles earl Cornwallis, K.G. govr gen. &c. shall affix his seal and signature to one counterpart, on the part of the hon. Eng. E. I. comp.; and the nawaub Walla Jah Behauder, nawaub of the Carnatic, shall affix his seal and signature to another counterpart, shall be exchanged.

By the first condition of the 8th art. of the said treaty, it is agreed, that the said comp. shall assume the management of such district or districts, the rev. of which, after deducting the charges of collection, shall equal the amount of the kist which shall have fallen in arrear. No. 6.—Treaty between the Company and Azeem ul Dowlah; dated 31st July 1801.

Treaty for settling the Succession of the Soubahdarry of the Territories of Arcot, and for vesting the Administration of the Civil and Military Govt of the Carnatic Payen Ghaut in the United Comp. of Merchants of England trading to the East Indies.—Whereas the several treaties, which have been concluded between the united comp. of merchants of England trading to the East Indies, and their highnesses, heretofore nabobs of the Carnatic, have been intended to cement and identify the interests of the contracting parties: And whereas in conformity to the spirit of this alliance, the said comp. did, by the treaty concluded on the 12th July 1792, with the late nabob Walajah, relinquish extensive pecuniary advantages acquired by the previous treaty of 1787, with the view and on the condition of establishing a more adequate security for the interests of the Brit. govt in the Carnatic: And whereas subsequent experience has proved that the intention of the contracting parties has not been fulfilled by the provisions of any of the treaties heretofore concluded between them: And whereas the munsub of the Soubahdarry of the territories of Arcot has now become vacant: And whereas the right of the prince Azeem ul Dowlah Behauder, founded upon the hereditary right of his father the nabob Ameer ul Omrah Behauder, to succeed to the rank, property, and possessions of his ancestors, heretofore nabobs of the Carnatic, has been acknowledged by the Eng. E. I. comp.: And whereas the said comp. and the prince Azeem ul Dowlah Behauder, have judged it expedient that a new treaty shall at this time be executed, for the purpose of supplying the defects of all former engagements, and of establishing the connection between the said contracting parties on a permanent basis of security in all times to come: Wherefore the following treaty is now established and concluded by the rt hon. Ed lord Clive, govr in council of Fort St. George, by and with the sanction and authority of his excellency the marq.

Wellesley, K. P. govr gen. in council of all the Brit. possessions in the E. Indies, on behalf of the said united comp. on the one part; and by the nabob Walajah Ameer ul Omrah, Mader ul Mulk, Ameer ul Hind, Azeem ul Dowlah Behauder, Showkut Jung Sepah Salar, nabob Soubahdar of the Carnatic, on his own behalf, on the other part; for settling the succession to the Soubahdarry of the territories of Arcot, and for vesting the administration of the civil and military govt of the Carnatic in the united comp. of merchants of England trading to the E. Indies.—Art. 1. The right of the Nabob Azeem ul Dowlah Behauder to succeed to the state and rank, and the dignities dependent thereon, of his ancestors, heretofore nabobs of the Carnatic, is hereby formally acknowledged and guaranteed by the hon. E. I. comp. to the said Azeem ul Dowlah Behauder, who has accordingly succeeded to the Soubahdarry of the territories of Arcot.—Art. 2. Such parts of the treaties heretofore concluded between the said E. I. comp. and their highnesses heretofore nabobs of the Carnatic, as are calculated to strengthen the alliance, cement the friendship, and identify the interests of the contracting parties, are hereby renewed and confirmed; and accordingly the friends or enemies of the one party shall be considered to be the friends or enemies of both parties.—Art. 3. The hon. comp. hereby charges itself with the maintenance and support of the military force necessary for the defence of the Carnatic, and for the protection of the rights, person, and property of the said nabob Azeem ul Dowlah Behauder; and with the view of reviving the fundamental principles of the alliance between his ancestors and the English nation, the said nabob Azeem ul Dowlah Behauder stipulates and agrees, that he will not enter upon any negotiation or correspondence with any Europ. or native power, without the knowledge and consent of the said Eng. comp.—Art. 4. It is hereby stipulated and agreed, that the sole and exclusive administration of the civil and military govt of all the territories and dependencies of the Carnatic Payen Ghaut, together with the full and exclusive right to the revenues thereof (with the exception of such portion of the said revenues as shall be appropriated for the maintenance of the said nabob, and for the support of his dignity) shall be forever vested in the said Eng. comp.; and the said comp. shall accordingly possess the sole power and authority of constituting and appointing (without any interference on the part of the said nabob) all officers for the collection of the revenues, and of establishing courts for the administration of civil and criminal judicature.—Art. 5. It is hereby stipulated and agreed, that one-fifth part of the net rev. of the Carnatic shall be ann. allotted for the maintenance and support of the said nabob and of his own immediate family, including the Mahel of his late highness the Ameer ul Omrah, the said 5th part shall be paid by the comp. in monthly instalments of 12,000 star pagodas; and, whatever circumstance may occur affecting the net rev. of the Carnatic, the said instalments shall not be less than 12,000 star pagodas. Whatever balance of the said 5th part may remain due at the expiration of each year, shall be liquidated upon a settlement of the accounts; and the said 5th part shall be at the free disposal of the said nabob, consistently with the principles of the said alliance.—Art. 6. The 5th part of the revenues, as stated in the preceding art. shall be calculated and determined in the following manner: viz. all charges, of every description, incurred in the collection of the rev. the amount of the jaghire lands, stated in the 13th art. of the treaty of 1787, at pagodas 2,13,421, and the sum of pagodas 6,21,105, appropriate to the liquidation of the debts of the late Mahommed Ally, shall, in the first instance, be deducted from the revenues of the Carnatic, and after the deduction of those 3 items shall have been made, one-fifth part of the remaining net rev. (including the Poligar peschush, which shall always be calculated at the sum of star pagodas 2,64,704:20:6, according to the treaty of 1792) shall be allotted for the maintenance of the said nabob, and for the maintenance of his highness's dignity.—Art. 7. Whereas it was stipulated by the 4th art. of the treaty of 1792, that the sum of 6 lacs, 21,105 star pagodas, should annually be applied to the discharge of certain registered debts due by the late nabob Mohammed Ally to his private creditors, under agreements concluded between his highness and the hon. comp. and guaranteed by the parliament of Gr Britain, until the said registered debt should be liquidated; the hon. English comp. accordingly hereby charges itself with the ann. payment of 6,21,105 pagodas from the revenues of the Carnatic, until the remainder of the said registered debt shall be liquidated.—Art. 8. Whereas certain debts are due to the said comp. by the ancestors of the said nabob: and whereas it is expedient, in order that the present treaty may include a complete arrangement of all affairs depending between the said comp. and the said nabob, that an adjustment should be made of the abovementioned debts; wherefore the said nabob formally and explicitly acknowledges the debt, commonly called the cavalry loan, amounting with its interest to star pagodas 13,24,342:6:47, and also the portion of the registered debt, heretofore paid by the said comp. to the creditors of the late nabob Walajah (according to the annexed schedule) to be just debts: and whereas, exclusively of the abovementioned debts, other unadjusted debts also remain, which were referred to the adjustment and decision of the gov. gen. in council of Bengal: and whereas the said unadjusted debts have not been determined according to that intention, the said nabob hereby engages, that whenever the said determination shall be made, his highness will acknowledge to be a just debt, the amount of the balance which shall be so declared to be due to the said comp. It is not, however, the intention of this art. to cause any diminution from the 5th part payable to the said nabob, but, on the contrary, it is specified that no deduction shall be made from the revenue on any account whatever, excepting the 3 items stated in the 6th art. previously to the determination of his highness's proportion.—Art. 9. The English comp. engages to take into consideration the actual situation of the families of their highnesses the late nabobs Walajah and Omdut ul Omrah Behauder, as well as the situation of the principal officers of his highness's gov't; and the British gov't shall charge itself with the expence chargeable on the revenues of the Carnatic, of a suitable provision for their respective maintenance. The amount of the above mentioned expences to be defrayed by the comp. shall be distributed with the knowledge of the said nabob, in such manner as shall be judged proper.—Art. 10. The said nabob Azcem ul Dowlah Behauder shall, in all places, on all occasions, and at all times, be treated with the respect and attention due to his highness's rank and situation as an ally of the British gov't, and a suitable guard shall be appointed from the company's troops for the protection of his said highness's person and palace.—Art. 11. The entire defence of the Carnatic against foreign enemies, and the maintenance of the internal tranquillity and police of the country, having been hereby transferred to the Brit. gov't, his said highness engages not to entertain or employ in his service any armed men without the consent of the Brit. gov't, who will fix, in concert with his highness, the number of armed men necessary to be retained for the purposes of state. Such armed men as his highness may, in consequence of this art. engage in his service, shall be paid at the exclusive cost and charge of the said nabob.—Art. 12. The hon. E. I. comp. shall, in conformity to the stipulations of this treaty, enter upon the exclusive administration of the civil and military gov't of the Carnatic, on the day of and his said highness the nabob shall issue orders to all his civil and military officers, to transfer the district or districts under their respective charge to such persons as shall be appointed by the said comp. to manage the said districts; and also to deliver to the persons appointed, all records, accounts, and official papers, belonging to their respective cutcherries or officers.—This treaty, consisting of 12 articles, having been executed by Ed. lord Clive, gov. in council aforesaid, on the one part, and his highness Azcem ul Dowlah on the other part, is hereby mutually interchanged; the said Ed. lord Clive engaging that a copy of the said treaty shall be transmitted to Fort William, for the purpose of being ratified by his excellency the marq. Wellesley, gov. gen. in council; and that as soon as the ratified treaty shall be received from Bengal, it shall be delivered to his said highness, who will then return to his ldp the copy which he now receives.

In the hand-writing of Azcem ul Dowlah.—
(God is gracious.)—I Azcem ul Dowlah having perused and fully comprehended the several articles of the above treaty, have approved and consented to the whole of the said articles. In witness whereof I affix my proper signature:

THE BEIZ OF AZCEM UL DOWLAH.

Separate and secret Article.—Whereas his highness the nabob Azcem ul Dowlah, by the 8th art. of the treaty now concluded, has acknowledged the debt called the cavalry loan, due by his highness's family to the said comp. amounting to pagodas And whereas no account has been yet taken of the public treasure of the late gov't; it is stipulated and agreed, that his highness the nabob Azcem ul Dowlah, shall immediately enter upon an investigation of the state of the public accounts and treasure, and that if, in communication with the Brit. gov't, the said treasure shall be found adequate to the purpose, a portion of it shall be immediately applied to the entire liquidation of the said debt, called the cavalry loan, in ready money.

No. 7. Declaration of the Rt Hon. the Gov. in Council of Fort St. George, by and with the Authority of his Excellency the most noble the Gov. Gen. in Council of all the British Possessions in the East Indies, dated 31 July, 1801.

An alliance of the most intimate union and friendship has long subsisted between the hon. E. India comp. and the family of their highnesses Mohammed Ally and Omdut ul Omrah, late nabob of the Carnatic Payen Ghaut : by the aid of that alliance his late highness Mohammed Ally was enabled, under Providence, to support his pretensions to the possession of the Carnatic at the death of his illustrious father, to defeat the power of his enemies in arms, and finally to establish his authority in the govt of Arcot and its dependencies, on the foundations of the British power. For the defence and protection of the valuable possessions thus acquired by the united arms of the English comp. and of the nabob of Arcot, various treaties and obligations have been established, by which it was intended that the interests, security, and power of both parties in the Carnatic Payen Ghaut should be cemented and identified. In conformity to the faith and spirit of these engagements, the hon. comp. has invariably applied, not only the resources derived from that alliance, but the whole power of the Brit. empire in India, to maintain the govt of the late nabobs of the Carnatic against all their enemies, and has caused them to be acknowledged by foreign states as the allies of the Brit. nation. By these means, and by the unabated exertion of its whole power, the Eng. nation was enabled, during the war which continued from the year 1780 to the year 1783, to support the pretensions of the nabob Mahomed Ally, and to rescue his dominions from the violence of Hyder Ally Khan, and of his successor Tippoo Sultaun, who, by the assistance of the French nation, had been enabled to conquer a considerable part of the Carnatic, and to establish their authority over the greatest portion of the territorial possessions of the said nabob. To support the authority of the nabob Mohammed Ally, and to secure the British interests in the Carnatic, it became expedient for the contracting parties to enter into specific engagements for the maintenance of an adequate military establishment. The Eng. comp. accordingly bound itself by a treaty, bearing date Feb. 1787, to maintain the whole military force required for the protection of the territories of the allies; in consideration of which engagement the nabob Mahomed Ally agreed, among other conditions, and under certain penalties therein specified, to pay an annual subsidy, amounting to 15 lacs of star pagodas. According to the farther stipulations of that engagement, rendered necessary by experience for the mutual safety of the contracting parties, the Eng. comp. in the year 1790, charged itself with the administration of the civil govt, in addition to the military defence of the Carnatic, in a critical juncture of affairs, when the ambition and implacable enmity of the late Tippoo Sultaun, compelled the British govt in India to resort to arms for the support of its rights, and for the protection of its allies. At the conclusion of the war, in 1792 (the successful and glorious termination of which tended in the most direct manner to secure the safety and prosperity of the possessions of his highness the nabob of the Carnatic) the Brit. govt. restored the civil govt. of the Carnatic to his highness, thereby manifesting the strictest adherence to the stipulations of the existing engagements of 1787; but the Brit. govt did not confine itself to the mere discharge of the stipulations of its existing engagements; its views were extended to an enlarged and liberal consideration of the principles of the alliance subsisting between the comp. and the nabobs of the Carnatic. At that period of time, the nabob Mahomed Ally, relying on the friendly disposition of the Brit. govt, represented, in the most urgent manner to the marg. Cornwallis, the inadequacy of his highness's resources to discharge the pecuniary engagements of the treaty of 1787; and the govt. acting in conformity to the spirit of the alliance and friendship so long subsisting between the nabobs of the Carnatic and the Eng. comp. relieved his highness from the burthensome terms of that engagement, thereby surrendering the pecuniary rights acquired by the comp. under the treaty of 1787, for the purpose of promoting the tranquillity, comfort, and interests of the nabob Mahomed Ally. With this liberal view of the principles of the connexion established between the Brit. govt and nabob of Arcot, an indulgent modification of the treaty of 1787 was framed; and by a subsequent treaty, bearing date in July 1792, the pecuniary contribution of his highness the nabob of the Carnatic, towards the general defence and protection of the rights and possessions of the allies, was diminished from 15 to 9 lacs of star pagodas. The spirit of moderation by which the Brit. councils were guided in respect to this alliance, was unequivocally manifested by a farther stipulation for the purpose of securing to the nabob Omdut ul Omrah, the son and presumptive heir of the nabob Mahomed Ally, the succession to the territories of his father, on the terms and conditions of the treaty of 1792. In return for this relinquishment of a considerable portion of its pecuniary resources, the Eng. comp. obtained no other advantages than an extended renewal of the territorial security, already provided by the treaty of 1787, for the performance of the nabob Mahomed Ally's pecuniary engagements, and a repetition of his highness's previous obligation not to contract alliances, nor to enter into correspondence with any European or native power, without the knowledge and concurrence of the Brit. govt; conformably, therefore, to this indulgent modification of the treaty of 1787, the govt of the Carnatic was restored to the nabob Mahomed Ally: on the death of his highness the nabob Mahomed Ally, in the year 1795, the nabob Omdut ul Omrah succeeded to the possession of his father's territories, according to the provisions of the treaty of 1792. The nabob Mahomed Ally, as well as his son and successor, had repeatedly granted tuncaws or assignments of revenue on the districts pledged to the company in direct violation of the treaty of 1792, and to the manifest injury of the territorial security provided by the comp. for its interest in the Carnatic. The Brit. govt, however, continued to extend to their highnesses the indulgent operation of the beneficial conditions of the treaty of 1792, by abstaining from the exercise of the just rights acquired against their highnesses under the express stipulations of that engagement, and under the acknowledged interpretation of the law of nations. Under these circumstances the Brit. govt might justly have required from the house of Mahommed Ally, not merely the exact and rigid observation of the treaty of 1792, but a zealous and cordial attachment to the spirit of an engagement, under which the nabobs of the Carnatic had found the most ample protection, accompanied by the most indulgent and liberal construction of every stipulation favourable to their separate interests, and by the most lenient relaxation of those penal articles, the obligation of which their highnesses had respectively incurred by violating the article of the treaty of 1792, relative to the grants of tuncaws or assignments of revenue in the districts pledged to the company. It is with the deepest concern that the gov. in council is compelled to declare, that those ancient allies of the comp. the nabobs Mahommed Ally and Omdut ul Omrah, have been found not only deficient in every active duty of the alliance, but unfaithful to its fundamental principles, and untrue to its vital spirit. In the full enjoyment of the most abundant proofs of the moderation, indulgence, and good faith of the hon. comp. the nabob Mahommed Ally and the nabob Omdut ul Omrah, actually commenced and maintained a secret intercourse with Tippoo Sultaun, the determined enemy of the Brit. name, founded on principles and directed to objects utterly subversive of the alliance between the nabob of the Carnatic and the comp. and equally incompatible with the security of the Brit. power in the peninsula of India.

After the fall of Seringapatam, the Brit. gov. obtained possession of the original records of Tippoo Sultaun; the correspondence of that prince's ambassadors, during their residence at Fort St. George in attendance on his sons the hostage princes, in the years 1792 and 1793, established sufficient ground of apprehension, that their highnesses, the late nabob Mahommed Ally and the late nabob Omdut ul Omrah, had entered into a secret intercourse with the late Tippoo Sultaun, of a nature hostile to the Brit. interests in India. The enquiries of the Brit. gov. have been since directed to ascertain a fact so intimately connected with the security of its rights in the Carnatic. The result has established the following propositions, by a series of connected, written, and oral testimony.—1. At the very period of time when the nabob Mahommed Ally appealed to the generosity of the Brit. gov. for an indulgent modification of the treaty of 1787, his highness had already commenced a secret negotiation for the establishment of an intimate intercourse with the nabob Tippoo Sultaun, without the knowledge of the Brit. gov. and for purposes evidently repugnant to its security and honour.—2. The nabob Omdut ul Omrah (who was empowered by the nabob Mahommed Ally to negotiate the treaty of 1792 with the British gov. and who actually negotiated that treaty for himself and for his father) was actually employed at the same period of time, under his father's authority, in negotiating for himself, and for his father, the terms of the said separate and secret intercourse with Tippoo Sultaun.—3. The tendency of the said intercourse was directed to the support of Tippoo Sultaun in victory and triumph over all his enemies.—4. In December 1792, the nabob Mahommed Ally imparted secret information to Tippoo Sultaun, regarding the sentiments and intentions of the Brit. gov. in India, with relation to the hostile views and negotiation of Tippoo Sultaun at the courts of Poonah and Hyderabad; and on the first intelligence of the war between Great Brit. and France in 1793, the nabob Mahommed Ally imparted secret information to Tippoo Sultaun, respecting the views and power of France in India and in Europe, and respecting the intended operations of the Brit. forces against the French possessions in the Carnatic. And the nabob Mahommed Ally conveyed to Tippoo Sultaun secret admonitions and friendly advice respecting the most favourable season, and the most propitious state of circumstances, for the violation of Tippoo Sultaun's engagements with the hon. comp.—5. The nabob Omdut ul Omrah was employed by his father or one of the agents to convey secret intelligence, friendly admonition, and seasonable advice to Tippoo Sultaun, through the confidential agents of Tippoo Sultaun, who were furnished with instructions from the said sultaun of Mysore, to receive such communications from the said nabob of the Carnatic, and from the nabob Omdut ul Omrah.—6. A cypher was composed and actually introduced into the separate and secret correspondence between the nabobs Mahommed Ally and Tippoo Sultaun; the original key of the said cypher, discovered among the records of Seringapatam, is in the hand-writing of the confidential moonshee (or secretary) of the nabob Mahommed Ally and of the nabob Omdut ul Omrah; and the said cypher was delivered by a confidential agent of the nabob Omdut ul Omrah to the ambassador of Tippoo Sultaun, for the express purpose of being transmitted to Tippoo Sultaun.—7. The terms employed in the said cypher, particularly those intended to designate the Brit. gov. and its allies, the Nizam and the Marhatta state, united in a defensive league against Tippoo Sultaun, contain the most powerful internal evidence that the communications proposed to be disguised by the said cypher, were of the most hostile tendency to the interest and objects of the said alliance, and calculated to promote the cause of Tippoo Sultaun in opposition to that of the said allies.—8. The nabob Omdut ul Omrah, under his own hand-writing, in Aug. 1794, corroborated the evidence of his intention to complete the purposes herein described, of the secret intercourse which he had negotiated with Tippoo Sultaun; and the continuance of the same intention is manifested by letter from the nabob Omdut ul Omrah, and from his confidential agent, addressed to the supposed agent of Tippoo Sultaun in the year 1796, subsequently to the nabob Omdut ul Omrah's accession to the gov. of the Carnatic under the treaty of 1792.—9. At the commencement, and during the progress of the late just, necessary, and glorious war with the late Tippoo Sultaun, the nabob Omdut ul Omrah, to the utmost extent of his means and power, pursued the objects of his secret intercourse with Tippoo Sultaun, by a systematic course of deception, with respect to the provision of the funds necessary to enable the Brit. troops to march into Mysore, as well as by a systematic and active opposition to the supply and movement of the allied army through different parts of the said nabob's dominions.—10. The stipulations contained in the 15th art. of the treaty of 1787, and the 10th art. of the treaty of 1792, by which the nabobs of the Car-

natic were bound not to enter into any political negotiations or correspondence with any European power or state, without the consent of the govt of Fort St. George, or of the comp. formed a fundamental condition of the alliance between the said nabob and the comp.; and the violation of the said stipulations necessarily involved the entire forfeiture, on the part of the nabob, of all the benefits of the said alliance.—11. The nabob Mohammed Ally, and the nabob Omdut ul Omrah, have violated the said stipulations, and have thereby forfeited all the benefits of the said alliance; and the nabob Mohammed Ally, and the nabob Omdut ul Omrah, having violated the said stipulations for the express purpose of establishing an union of interests with Tippoo Sultaun, thereby placed themselves in the condition of public enemies to the Brit. govt in India.—It is manifest, therefore, that the intentions of the nabobs Mohammed Ally and Omdut ul Omrah, having been uniformly and without interruption hostile to the Brit. power in India, and that those intentions have been carried into effect to the full extent of the actual power possessed by their highnesses respectively, at the several periods of time in which they have acted in pursuance of their system of co-operation with the enemy. By acting on these principles of conduct, the nabobs Mohammed Ally and Omdut ul Omrah not only violated the rights of the comp. but by uniting their interests with those of the most implacable enemy of the Brit. empire, actually placed themselves in the relation of public enemies to the Brit. govt, dangerous to the extent of their respective power, and active according to the means and opportunities afforded to them by the circumstances of the moment, and especially by the most severe exigency and pressure of war; every principle, therefore, of public law release the Brit. govt from the intended obligations of the treaty of 1792; and every consideration of self-defence and security authorized the comp. to exercise its power in the manner most expedient for the purpose of frustrating the hostile councils of the late nabob of the Carnatic, modelled upon the artful example, actuated by the faithless spirit, and sanctioned by the testamentary voice of his father. In proceeding to exercise this right, it was painful to the Brit. govt to be compelled to expose to the world all these humiliating proofs of the ingratitude and treachery of the nabobs Mohammed Ally and Omdut ul Omrah, towards that power which has uniformly proved their guardian and protector; and in acting from the impression of this sentiment, the Brit. govt was more desirous of consulting its own dignity, than of admitting any claims on the part of those infatuated princes to its generosity and forbearance.—In conformity to this spirit of temperance and moderation, it was the intention of the Brit. govt to have made a formal communication to the nabob Omdut ul Omrah, of the proofs which had been obtained of his highness's breach of the alliance, with a view of obtaining, by the most lenient means, satisfaction for the injury sustained by the Brit. govt, and security against the future operation of the hostile councils of the nabob Omdut ul Omrah. Circumstances of expediency, connected with the general interests and policy of the Brit. govt, interrupted the communication of this document to the nabob Omdut ul Omrah; the intermediate illness of his highness protracted the execution of that intention, and his subsequent death frustrated the wish of the Brit. govt to obtain from that prince satisfactory security for the rights pledged to the comp. in the Carnatic. The death of the nabob Omdut ul Omrah has not affected the rights acquired by the Brit. govt under the discovery of his breach of the alliance. Whatever claim the reputed son of the nabob Omdut ul Omrah may be supposed to possess to the comp's support of his pretensions to the govt of the Carnatic, is founded on the grounds of the right of Omdut ul Omrah to the assistance of the comp. in securing his succession to the nabob Mohammed Ally in the govt of the Carnatic, was founded on the express stipulations of the treaty of 1792. The result of the propositions stated in this declaration has established abundant proof, that the fundamental principles of the alliance between the comp. and the nabob Omdut ul Omrah, as well as the express letter of the treaty of 1792, had been absolutely violated and rendered of no effect by the nabobs Mohammed Ally and Omdut ul Omrah, previously to the ostensible conclusion of that instrument. It is manifest, therefore, that the nabob Omdut ul Omrah could derive no rights from the formal ratification of that treaty, the vital spirit of which had already been annihilated by the hostile and faithless conduct of his highness, and that the nabobs Mohammed Ally and Omdut ul Omrah, by forming an intimate union of interests with Tippoo Sultaun, had actually placed themselves in the relation of public enemies to the Brit. empire in India. Whatever claims to the comp's protection and support the reputed son of Omdut ul Omrah may derive from his supposed father, had been utterly destroyed by the hostile conduct of Omdut ul Omrah; it follows, therefore, that the reputed son of Omdut ul Omrah has succeeded to the condition of his father, which condition was that of a public enemy; and, consequently, that at the death of Omdut ul Omrah, the Brit. govt remained at liberty to exercise its rights, founded on the faithless policy of its ally, in whatever manner might be deemed most conducive to the immediate safety and the general interests of the comp. in the Carnatic. Before the Brit. govt proceeded to exercise this right, founded on the violation of the alliance, and on the necessity of self-defence, it was desirous of manifesting its attention to the long established connexion between the comp. and the house of Omdut ul Omrah, by sacrificing to the sentiments of national magnanimity and generosity the resentment created by his highness's flagrant breach of the alliance. In the spirit of those councils, therefore, with which it had been the intention of the Brit. govt to demand satisfaction and security from the nabob Omdut ul Omrah, and to avoid the publication of facts so humiliating to the family of that prince, the Brit. govt communicated to the reputed son of Omdut ul Omrah, knowledge of the proofs now existing in the possession of the govt at Fort St. George of the violation of the alliance, at the same time the Brit. govt manifested a consistent adherence to the principles of moderation and forbearance, by opening a latitude to the reputed son of Omdut ul Omrah to form, by means of an amicable adjustment, that satisfaction and security which the hostile and faithless conduct of his supposed father had entitled the Brit. govt to demand, and which the dictates of prudence and self-defence compelled it to require. The reputed son of Omdut ul Omrah, by and with the advice of the persons appointed by his father's will to assist his councils, has persisted in opposing a determined resistance to this demand, thereby exhibiting an unequivocal proof that the spirit which actuated the hostile councils of the nabobs Mahommed Ally and Omdut ul Omrah, has been transmitted with unabated vigour to the supposed son of Omdut ul Omrah, secured in its operation under the sanctimonious forms of their testamentary injunctions, and preserved with religious attachment by the ostensible descendant of that prince. Frustrated in the hope of obtaining, from the reputed son of the nabob Omdut ul Omrah, reparation for its injuries and security for its rights, the Brit. govt. is now reluctantly compelled to publish to the world the proofs of this flagrant violation of the most sacred ties of amity and alliance, by the nabobs Mohammed Ally and Omdut ul Omrah, and the hereditary spirit of enmity manifested by the reputed son of Omdut ul Omrah to the interests of the Brit. govt. The duty and necessity of self-defence require the Brit. govt. under the circumstances of this case, to exercise its power in the attainment of an adequate security for its rights; justice and moderation warrant, that the family of Omdut ul Omrah shall be deprived of the means of completing its systematic course of hostility; wisdom and prudence demand, that the reputed son of Omdut ul Omrah shall not be permitted to retain possession of resources dangerous to the tranquillity of the Brit. govt. in the peninsula of India. Wherefore the Brit. govt. still adhering to the principles of moderation, and actuated by its uniform desire of obtaining security for its rights and interests in the Carnatic, by an arrangement founded on the principles of the long subsisting alliance between the comp. and the family of the nabob Mahommed Ally, judged it expedient to enter into a negotiation for that purpose with the prince Azeem ul Dowlah Behauder, the son and heir of Azeem ul Omrah, who was the second son of the nabob Mahommed Ally, and the immediate great grandson by both his parents of the nabob Anwer ul Deen Khan, of blessed memory. And his highness the prince Azeem ul Dowlah Behauder having entered into engagements for the express purpose of reviving the alliance between the comp. and his illustrious ancestors, and of establishing an adequate security for the Brit. interests in the Carnatic, the Brit. govt. has now resolved to exercise its rights and its power, under Providence, in supporting and establishing the hereditary pretensions of the prince Azeem ul Dowlah Behauder in the soubahdarry of the territories of Arcot, and of the Carnatic Payen Ghaut. And, for the more full explanation of the grounds and motives of this declaration, the rt hon. the govt. in council, by and with the authority of his excellency the govt. gen. in council, has caused attested copies and extracts of several documents discovered at Seringapatam to be annexed hereunto, together with an extract from the treaties of 1787 and 1792.—By order of the rt hon. the govt. in council.

J. WEBBE, Chief Sec. to Govt.

Fort St. George, 31st July, 1801.

Appendix to the Declaration of the Right Hon. the Governor in Council of Fort St. George, bearing date the 31st July, 1801.

No. 1. Extracts from a letter from Gholaum Alli Khan and Ali Rezza Khan, to Tippoo Sultan; dated the 26th Tuckee, 1220, (15th June, 1792.)

The following conversation took place at a visit made by the princes to the nabob Wallajah on 21st Tuckee, 1220, (10th June, 1792).—We presented Nuzzurs of eleven gold mohurs to the nabob Wallajah, of which his highness took one, and rising, embraced us and said, "May God long preserve Tippoo Sultaun, who is the pillar of the religion of Mahomed. Night and day I used to be absorbed in this contemplation, and to pray for his highness's prosperity; I call God to witness this fact, because the confederacy of three allies was for the subversion of the Mahomedan religion. It is solely to be attributed to the Divine goodness, that the prayers of us sinners have been accepted. Believe it true, that I from my heart desire the welfare of the sultaun."—When the princes and we took leave of the nabob Wallajah, and were going away, he came up to us, and with a great deal of warmth desired us to stay, as he had something to say to us. We replied we were ready. He then told us, that his life was now drawing to a close; that for what had hitherto taken place between his highness and your majesty there was no remedy; but now, merely out of a regard to the faith (of which your majesty was a pillar) he was desirous of establishing a cordial harmony with your majesty; and if we, having in view the claims of both parties (upon our endeavours) would in the presence of God exert ourselves for this purpose, the Almighty would reward us, and both parties would reap the benefits of this event, which were great and numberless; that although his highness wanted to prevent the war between your majesty and the three allied states, yet that Nizam Ali Khan, at the latter period of his life, was thus preparing for futurity, by exerting himself for the destruction of religion. It was solely from a regard to the faith, that his highness did not encourage the measure, and that he now declares that, in a thousand points of view, it was advisable that perfect harmony should reign between your majesty and his highness. We replied, that we would undoubtedly report all this to your majesty.

Farther Extract.—On the 24th of Tuckee (13th June, 1792) Wallajah, Omdut ul Omrah, and Hussien Nawauz Khan, youngest son of Wallajah, Id Cornwallis, and gen. Meadows, came to visit the princes. They sat two hours (about three quarters of an hour English) and talked a great deal with them. His highness took occasion to observe, that we considered him to have been an enemy, whereas he declared in the presence of God, that he was not, and is not; that, on the contrary, he was a friend and well-wisher; and that he had opposed the breach between your majesty and the three allied states to such a degree, that every one decided in his own mind, that inwardly your majesty and his highness were one; and he desired us to ask Id Cornwallis and gen. Meadows, who were present, whether he said true or not.

No. 2. Extract of a Letter from Gholaum Alli Khan and Ali Rezza, to Tippoo Sultaun; dated 3d of Sumree of the year Schir, 1220, A. N. Mahomed (21st June, 1792.)

We had the honour to receive your majesty's most gracious letter, dated 8th Turkee (28th May, 1792) giving cover to a slip of paper, upon which were written two couplets on the 28th Turkee. We have from the first understood the writing, your majesty knows of, as your majesty has explained it, and when occasion requires, will act in conformity to your majesty's commands. Your majesty has desired that we will not disclose this subject to any person. God is our witness that we have, from the commencement of our service to the present time, inviolably kept your majesty's commands, which we consider as a religious obligation: and we declare to your majesty that we have not divulged, neither will we divulge them to any one: we are the servants of God, the disciples of Mahomed, and the dependants of your majesty, during our lives, and never will. An observance of the secrets of our masters is enjoined by the Khoran. By the grace of God, and through the blessing of the salt of your majesty, the King of Kings, we have never infringed, and never will infringe, this injunction in the slightest degree upon any occasion.

No. 3. Translation of an Arzee from Alli Rezza Khan and Gholaum Alli Khan, to Tippoo Sultaun; dated the 4th of Sumree of the year Schir, 1220, A.N. Mahomed (22d June, 1792.)

On the 14th Jaffree (23d July, 1792) we had the honour to receive by two messengers your majesty's letter, dated 8th Sumree (26th June, 1792) enclosing a slip of paper containing a couplet. We were before acquainted with the meaning of the couplet, as explained by your majesty, and accordingly have before this written to your majesty in conformity thereto, and will still continue as occasion may require, to write to your majesty. Your majesty desires that we will not divulge the circumstance to any one. Refuge of the world! we consider the concealment of the commands and secrets of our superiors in the light of a religious duty; not to divulge the orders of princes is enjoined by the Khoran, and this is a duty imposed upon all servants by the word of God. Who would be so forgetful of his God, and regardless of religion, as to sacrifice, by a disclosure of secrets committed to his charge, his present and future happiness? In the presence of Almighty God, we declare to your majesty, that from the time we entered your majesty's service to the present moment, a term of 11 years, none but Almighty God is or shall be privy to the commands with which you have entrusted us. Such is our fidelity, that Divine Providence may perhaps, through its blessings, prosper us in this and a future state, and keep us supported in respectability and credit near your majesty. All farther particulars will be fully made known to your majesty from the arzees which we have successively dispatched to you. The princes, who are in health, beg to offer their most humble respects to your majesty. (A true translation.)

N. B. EDMONSTONE.

No. 4. Extract from a Letter from Gholaum Alli Khan and Alli Rezza Khan, to Tippoo Sultaun; dated the 16th of Jaffree of the year Schir, 1220, A.N. Mahomed, (4th Aug. 1792.)

On the 8th Tehejeh (29th July, 1792) the nabob Wallajah sent a messenger to us by Mahomed Abdoolah Khan, that the following day, being that preceding the Eed, he would, if we desired it, pay a visit to the princes, as he was very anxious to see his sons (as he called them). In reply, we begged he would give our respects, and represent to his highness, that the houses of the princes, and they themselves, were his own, and that the princes were his guests; that he was their superior, and his company there would afford them much happiness; but that, if he wished it, we ourselves would most readily attend him. Accordingly, at one pans of the following day (about 9 o'clock) Wallajah, accompanied by Omdut ul Omrah and Hasein Newauz Khan, paid a visit to the princes, and taking them upon his knees for about two hours, blessed them, and said, May God long and permanently preserve the shadow of Tippoo Sultaun extended over you and me, since in this age the preservation of religion depends upon him alone. I have passed my 80th year, and in that time many are the things I have seen and done, and experienced. What is passed is passed, and God only knows what futurity may bring to light. At present the maintenance of religion rests with Tippoo Sultaun, and may God preserve and keep him victorious and triumphant. I do not say this merely in your presence; but I say it, taking to witness Him who knows all that is hidden. Night and day, after the prayers of the day, and on Friday after public devotion, I offer up my prayers (meaning for Tippoo Sultaun) and require the people also to do the same. His highness spoke to us also in terms of great warmth and friendship, and after sitting two hours went away. As Wallajah had paid a visit to the princes, it became necessary that they should return it, and consequently they waited upon him the next day, which was the Eedoo Zoha (or Feast of the Camel); the nawaab, accompanied by Omdut ul Omrah and the other sirdars, came out to meet them as on the feast day, and having assisted the princes in alighting from their palanquins, took them within the house, where he repeatedly caressed them both, and said, "God preserve the sultaun in safety, for through him alone these rituals and observances of the faith (alluding probably to the Eed) yet remain." He then observed to us, "In my first conversation with you, I spoke to you upon the subject of establishing a friendship and harmony between me and Tippoo Sultaun. Have you intimated it to him, and have you received a favourable answer?" We replied, that we had set forth to your majesty, word for word, the friendly sentiments his highness had expressed, and that your majesty had written in reply, that friendship, union, and brotherly regard, had, from the beginning, been established among the professors of Islamism, as was evinced by the testimony of the holy book, agreeably to the prescriptions of which your majesty wished that cordial friendship and attachment should, without prejudice or partiality, be established between the followers of the faith, as the means of supporting the religion of Mahomed; and that your majesty added, "God preserve the nawaab Wallajah, who is a prince, and one of the leaders of the faithful, and a pillar of the faith. At the term, 'a pillar of the faith,' the nawaab could not suppress his tears, and said, 'I am what I know myself to be.' Tell the Sultaun, that he is the pillar of the faith; and may God preserve him and grant him a long life, since I and all Mussulmen derive support from him; for otherwise the
